CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1891

No. 455

TO OUR PSEUDO-SOCIAL REFORMERS.

HANDS off! Ye senseless meddlers, who would fain
Change our old social rules and ancient ways,
Disturbed by the transitory blaze
Of mushroom institutions, that certain
Seeds of decay too sure to prove their bane!

Hands off! nor, covetous of their praise,
And full of crudities of modern days,
Seek to refine our purest gold in vain.
The might and splendour of a yonder race,
May charm and captivate the thoughtless mind;
But think, oh think our proud descent we trace
From Aryan sires, the pride of human kind.
We live,—we hope to see a brighter day,
While Greece, Rome, Babylon—! where are they?

II.

Be patient, brothers! We are down, 'tis true,
But ups and downs, and downs and ups again,
Make up all life—of nation as of men:
We are down, we yet may rise anew.
The fittest still survive, and so we do;
And sturdiest links in Bein's mystic chain
Through Æons long we Atians shall remain,
If foreign modes and manners we eschew.
Preserve intact your cherished social rules,
Your simple manners, and our grand old faith,— Shunning the ways of noisy travelled fools,
Whose ways but lead to ruin and to death.
Thus still domestic Peace, our honest pride,
Fixe like the pole-star, in or homes abide.

RAM SHARMA.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

New Year's Day dawned in Calcutta with the Proclamation Parade of about 5,000 troops of all arms under the supreme command of Major-General Viscount Frankfort, Commanding the Presidency District. During the day, the Fancy Fair at the Zoo attracted as many visitors, and later on the Races many more. Towards evening, the Senate House presented a busy scene of degree-holders exercising the new power given them by Lord Lansdowne of nominating two Fellows to their University. The evening closed with a state dinner at Government House which was saddened by the unexpected news of the death, at Darjeeling, of Mr. Edwal James Sinkinson, Secretary to the Government of India in the Department of Finance and Commerce. For the natives the end of the latter Xmas as it is popularly known was pallid by the sheets of the Gazette of India Extraordinary.

Honours of the Day. The List of Titles and Honours conferred on that day will be found elsewhere:

ABOUT two dozen, including a lady—Miss C. M. Bose—degree-holders were in the running for the two nominated Fellowships of the Calcutta University. The lady was not in the reckoning—for “gentlemen” only were wanted. The successful canvassers are Baboo Jogendra Chunder Ghosh, M.A., B.L., and Baboo Mohender Nath Roy, M.A., B.L.

FOR the titled perpetuity entailed on him, the Maharaja of Pathuria-ghatta is for once lavish with his purse to the extent of—Rs. 10,000, as a donation to the Mayo Native Hospital. Many expend to win their spurs, but he most wisely waits till they are won.

THE Light Brigade Relief Fund amount to £6,533-2-10, the contribution through the Englishman being £1,354. The proprietors of the Empire Palace (Limited) paid a cheque for £600 being the result of a subscription opened by them and of a morning performance organized at the Empire.

RAJA Sir T. Madava Row had an attack of paralysis. It is satisfactory to learn, however, that he is gradually recovering.

It appears that the Muktagacha Municipality must be ruled by the local Acharjyas. Of the six elected members, five are of this family, and of the three nominated, Government returns two more of the same family.

Truth writes:—

“The greatest annoyance and disgust were occasioned to some of the passengers on the P. and O. steamer Sutlej on her last voyage out by the presence of an Indian cook from the Queen's Household among the second-class passengers. I should be the last to say a word against proper consideration being shown for a servant of the Queen or anybody else; and I should be the first to condemn any demonstration against him by his fellow-passengers merely because he was a servant. But this individual seems to have been a low-caste Oriental of the most filthy habits, who, I am told, never changed his clothes between the Albert Docks and Bombay, and who evidently delighted in the annoyance he caused to his fellow-passengers. It would hardly be the Queen's wish, if she knew the truth, that such a being should be forced into the cabin of three English gentlemen, whose only offence was that of being second-class passengers.”

THE high Priest of the Buddhists in Ceylon favors cremation. He finds no objection either religious or other to the adoption of the Hindu practice of the disposal of the dead. In fact, he says, “it would simply be a revival of a custom universal among our ancestors.” The Hon'ble P. Romanathan started a proposition to form a Cremation Company and the High Priest has sanctioned the move.

THE Archbishop of Avignon received a legacy of 48,000*fr.* to build a chapel. Treating the money as his own, he kept it for his own personal use. Government has intervened and the Deputy for the Department of the Rhone has set the law in motion against him.

Here is another instance of how a woman in the midst of Christian civilization, a Countess—Caroline Bismarck—has been sentenced to life imprisonment and murder of her step-daughter aged 14. The daughter was subjected to horrible treatment. An examination of the body after death showed that she had received a blow from a hard instrument. It was plain, besides, that she had been driven to death's door, if not death. Her body was emaciated to a degree sufficient to kill her. The Countess aggravated her offence by denial. She actually charged her step-son aged 15 with paying for counselling her with the death. The jury unanimously found her guilty. In that country, they are practical in their methods of punishment. Without being barbarous, they spit their sentence to the offence and the offender. Thus, in this case, the Court spared the Countess' life, but awarded her 15 years' imprisonment and a fasting day every month of that period to remind her of the day of the girl's death. This is a quality in psychology worthy of the neighborhood of Beggars' Cove. And what humanitarianism is weak to object to it!

A scarcely less horrible account follows—of seven cold-blooded murders including and culminating in suicide.

Lawless as it is, or used to be, the rule in the border States and Territories. Here is the story of the death of a border hero: His birth was not of, but double.

The owl hooted at his birth, an evil sign;
The night crow cried, a long luckless time;
Dogs howled, and hideous tempest shook down trees,
The raven rook'd her on the chimney's top,
And chattering pie in dismal discords sung.

William Joplin, who had been engaged to her, arrived at Fort Smith, Arkansas, to marry a farmer's daughter, Miss Miller. The father was opposed to the match and, to prevent the wedding, took away his daughter home at the village of Jenny Lind. (As the proposition before the name is equivocal, we may as well tell the reader that Jenny Lind in this connection is a place not the renowned vocalist.) Joplin was exasperated and bent on marriage or murder. He bought a shot gun and made straight for Jenny Lind. It was some way off and he wanted a horse. Luckily he got himself and unluckily for him, he met another farmer with a pony and wanted the loan of the animal. The owner refusing, Joplin blew out his brains, and in his hurry to meet his love, gave the dead farmer no burial but threw the body on the road side. Then he rode furiously. The horse was exhausted. He left it to its fate and ran to the village of the Millers. Arriving there, he entered a cheese shop—for what purpose it does not appear—and there shot at the doctor who was fatally wounded. Next he proceeded to make short work of the Millers. The first victim was his love whom he killed immediately, then he shot dead her mother in the abdomen. The last Mr. Joplin dispatched was the father of the girl whom he met outside. To end the tragedy, Joplin killed himself.

About the same time, in the middle of December, a public street in Paris was the scene of a brutal murder. One Luasson, just returned from three years' imprisonment, was refused admittance to his home or the wife refused to live with him. They were altercationing in the street, when the husband fired four shots at the wife with a revolver, and as she lay dying on the ground, ripped open her abdomen with a large knife. He then attempted suicide, either out of remorse or to escape the punishment of the law.

THOSE are the European method. The Asiatic are different.

It is reported from Trevandrum that a Hindu, a young mason of the Low caste was enamoured of a girl. The father of the girl would not entertain the mason's proposition to marry the daughter. The young man took the matter seriously to heart, and meditated his own death but no vengeance on his inamorata or her family. To give effect to his feelings, arms being prohibited in India by law, he ended himself by eating of some poisonous fruit.

Here is now the receipt of a Hindu woman gave to her imprisoned lord and husband. The Bangladesh of Chittagong reports:—
"A Babu Ram Chunder Bose is an inhabitant of Bikanipore in Dacca. He was formerly a schoolmaster and postmaster of Bikanipore in Chittagong. Unfortunately, a postal bag containing Rs. 60 was found missing, and for this offence, he was sentenced to 4 years' rigorous imprisonment. From the day poor Ram Chunder was imprisoned, his beloved take a drop of water out of grief of her attention from food."

A PARIS jury would not convict a man who shot his wife's lover in the following circumstances:—

"Georges Stoezel, a clerk at Mulhouse detected last May his wife's infidelity with Henri Simendinger, his friend from childhood. Litter started for America. Stoezel purchased a revolver, followed to Paris, and wait for him at the St. Lazare Station, and had a altercation with him. Simendinger, after first denying the charge, and by admitting it and by picking Stoezel, who thereupon shot him. Stoezel expressed regret for the act, stating that his intention had been to fight a duel but he lost all self-control. He protested he would willingly die to bring Simendinger back to life."

WE received last week the following telegram from Bombay:—

"In a crowded public meeting it was resolved to-day that the Social Conference should not be allowed the use of the Congress Hall. Protest addressed to Mr. Hume was read and adopted unanimously."

THIS is what that unlicked cur with a leonine prenomens, Ashburner, writes of our poor sainted widows:—

"The real reason why the Indian widow declines to be reformed by philanthropic legislation is that she is a chartered libertine. She is allowed greater latitude of conduct. Society is very tolerant of her frailties; they are ignored, condoned, and she is by no means inclined to relinquish the Bohemian freedom of an amateur member of the demi-monde."

The foul-fancied well-dressed Pict! And this is what comes of seeking foreign interference in our social and domestic institutions. Certainly, it is writings like these that put back the dial-hand of progress far more than irrational conservatism. These unauthorized sharpshooters—brigands of conversy—simply make for anarchy without stopping in the war. They cause pain but do not contribute to the struggle.

In the Hungarian town of Unfkirchen, in the county of Batanya one thousand cases of influenza occurred, or one in every 24 inhabitants. The disease took various forms. Sometimes the symptoms were like typhus. In other cases, there was copious hemorrhage from the intestines and from the nose.

In connection with the unfortunate mobbing of the missionaries in the town of Bankura on the Saturday last, the Indian Daily News make the following pertinent remark:—

"We have often urged that one of the most needed lessons in India is that of toleration. It is required both in public and private life, in social and religious matters. The Congress might do something by way of example in educating the people to tolerance of opinion, only it has the disadvantage of being one-sided. It lacks the practical instruction that is conveyed by conflict of opinion in opposition. If there were an element of antagonism in the Congress, where agreeing to differ could be practically illustrated, there would be great gain. The lesson is much needed in public life, and not less so in social relation in this country. It is the want of this that occasions the disturbance that take place from time to time between Hindus and Mahomedans or between the divisions of the sects. In England and America there is far greater diversity of religious sects, and they manage to live in peace, if not in harmony, in spite of difference of view. There the principle of toleration is so far set upon that the perversion of one man to another sect occasions by little remark, and rarely or never produces violent outbursts. A Churchman may turn Roman Catholic without having his head broken, a Roman Catholic may become a Wesleyan or an Independent without being assailed by an unruly mob. Why cannot similar changes take place in India without a district being thrown into ferment, heads broken, and possibly life sacrificed? The reason is that this very alphabet of public life has not been taught or learnt, and until it is, there is little hope of enlightened progress either in politics or religion."—I. D. N. Dec. 31, 1890.

Perched on his pulpit, our friend forgets for the nonce the darker incidents of civil and religious life in his noble country, but his homily is good and well-timed and we have no naughty wish to detract from it weight by ugly reminders. The cold debating club with which Mr. Hume is amusing himself and country, has special need of the great lesson of toleration which our contemporary preaches. Will it be believed that the conclave of wire-pullers omitted the courtesy of inviting Reis & Rayet to their performance? The base beggars!

THERE is always something in that pseudo-Bengali mediocrity of and wild politics, rank theosophy and down-right rascality, the Mirror. Something "to warn" if "to comfort" to amuse and edify—to horrify or sicken if not to amuse. Our contention began the New Year characteristic—with a blazing bare breast described with stout.

Baboo Bhooboneswar was originally a clerk in the office of the Commissioner of Patna, where he improved his education as well as received his training in business under the fostering care of the then Personal Assistant to the Commissioner, Baboo Doorgagatty Banerjee, now Collector of Calcutta. And when the Nautwa Raj wanted a manager the great Personal Assistant told his assistant to apply for the post and recommended him to it. It is due to Baboo Dutt that never in his elevation he forgot his benefactor or early friends. Even after Baboo Banerjee left Behar, the Dewan at the height of his master's favour cherished his old feelings to him. And so with others.

THE Native Passenger Ships Commission have closed their sittings here. We hope after the conclusion of their inquiry they will be able to present a report which, while safeguarding the general interest, will scrupulously abstain from undue and unnecessarily vexatious interference with the business of the carriers. The question referred to them for consideration deeply affects the safety and comfort of a large class of men, and notwithstanding all done by Indian Navigation Companies to secure proper accommodation and breathing space, there is an irresistible tendency to over-crowding which cannot be effectively overcome without legislative pressure. Instances have frequently occurred where this overcrowding has led to most lamentable results, and we cannot sufficiently commend the firm attitude which, in the interests of humanity, the Government of Bengal have assumed on the subject. That firmness was doubtless one of the or objectionable, it should, it seems to me, have openly prohibited these annual meetings; but after it has been held for six successive years in the chief cities of India, it is rather late in the day to set its face against the movement, which has now reached a stage when it has become a national institution in the country.

If the Government had thought fit to openly prohibit the Congress at the start, this writer would have been among the foremost to inveigh against the Government for stalling a poor weak infant at its birth, which was of no consequence whatever, a thing which being without influence as without authority, was not worth powder and shot. When at a time like this when the Congress is claimed to have become a great and powerful body—to be, in the shibboleth of the camp, a national institution—these writers openly decry the Government for weakness in issuing the order as if the officials no, beg the Congress' pardon, the bureaucracy—are trembling in their uneasy seats before the prodigious apparition how much more liable to the charge of feebleness would the Government have been if they had interfered with the preliminary exercises! Whether the monster is now, as the writer avers, too powerful to be meddled with, or not, is a question. The writer simply begs it in saying that the Congress has become a national institution.

"That the principle of the Congress is neither dangerous nor objectionable is manifest from the notorious fact that on the last occasion of its meeting in Calcutta the Marquis of Dufferin specially invited the delegates to visit his Excellency at Government House. Lord Dufferin was not only a statesman, but a diplomatist of the highest rank; and it is altogether unlikely that his Excellency would have officially recognised the movement, if he had detected in it any element whatever that was hostile to the Government."

After the unprecedented and indecent backing from the Congress pick of the native press and platform to which the late Viceroy was exposed, for his rashness in counselling the Congress into the path of success, it is always amusing to see Congress writers and orators treating Lord Dufferin with ordinary politeness. But what shall we say of the assurance that cites the much abused nobleman as the principal witness in behalf of the movement? Surely, the statement cannot be allowed to go forth to the world without notice or comment that the late Viceroy "officially recognised the movement." It is a very apt statement ingeniously, though far from ingenuously, put forth. The late Viceroy did officially recognise the Congress and did not. If to notice the gathering of a mob of more or less hisping politicians and political tuft hunters, and sight-seers as a fact and note it as a phenomenon of the India of to-day—of to label it as a movement of a microscopic minority bent on a leap into the unknown and to reason the rash enthusiasts and blind followers of the band out of their mad intent, be to officially recognise the Congress, then surely the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava recognised the Congress. Otherwise not. If his Lordship recognised the movement why then was he so plentifully bespattered with abuse in the Congress organs and by Congress orators? The truth is that every effort was made to procure his recognition, but the Viceroy was too wary to be caught in the trap. The means adopted were not all of the fairest. And notwithstanding failure, success was claimed. And a myth of official recognition was promoted and cherished wherever feasible. Many doubtless were deluded by it into joining and paying. These wild puppets and their knowing wirepullers are up to anything for a purpose. Or else we should not now, at the end of 1890, or beginning of 1891, hear that in 1880, on the occasion of the Calcutta Congress, "the Marquis of Dufferin specially invited the delegates to visit His Excellency at Government House." Lord Dufferin did nothing of the kind. On the contrary, he specially and specifically refused to invite the delegates to visit him at Government House or anywhere else. And if the Congressists notwithstanding gave out the contrary, it was their business and like them, and if by such pretences they obtained some measure of popular support, they in the long run thereby discredited themselves and estranged official sympathy from the movement.

The National Congress is over and the delegates are debauched or departing. The Assembly meets again next year either at Nagpore or at Madras. A resolution was also passed for a meeting—if feasible of 100 delegates the year after at London.

The Social Conference included representatives of the Congress. It was soon enough evident that the house was divided. With true poetic justice, it was headed by a divided party. Between a mixed Vaisya and a pure Sudra. The chair of the conference of Indians who were not sure of their own minds, but double-barrelled too, and fired in opposite directions. Baboo Narenra Nath Sen, who, being earlier in the field, was first installed, advocated the Vedas and Vedic study. Nothing like the Vedas for all the ills that affect the Hindu society of the day, according to this oracle. The Hon'ble Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, the Chairman elect, however, turned up at last, and spoiled Sen Babajee's game. He spoke with all the bluntness of his people. With more truth than discretion, he inveighed against the pretensions set up for the Hindu scriptures and particularly denounced the teachings of the Vedas as unsuited to modern times. It was no use complaining. These Social Evil men had sown the wind and reaped the tempest. After all, it was a gain to them to hear another story of the objects of their blind love. At the worst, they must thank their own wisdom in calling to their head a well-known anti-Vedist. But, poor fellows, they had not left much margin for choice.

THE proposal for enhancing the Calcutta University examination-fees has been postponed, pending enquiry by a Committee into the needs of the University and the best means of providing for them. The regulations for the F.A. and B.A. examinations have also been amended, the 66 per cent. of attendance at lectures in each subject being retained, and a new rule has been introduced with the object of ensuring punctuality in the admission of students. This rule is "If a student fails to enter an affiliated institution before the 1st August in any year, his attendance for that year shall not, except with the special sanction of the Syndicate, be counted."

AN unhappy disturbance disgraceful to the administration marred the serenity of the season at Bankura. A Brahman boy of the Kach Kuchia mission school having embraced Christianity it was resolved to signalise Christmas day with his baptism. The friends of the boy Kalidas, headed by a relative, who is a pleader, and followed by a mob of natives went to reason him back or rescue him at any rate, but they were not allowed to see him before baptism. Then it was too late. The mischief was done. Still they tried some little persuasion, but the neophyte was not to be so soon divorced from his new passion. They next had recourse to the law. A charge of wrongful confinement of a minor was laid against the pudras. The Indian Daily News newsletter from Bankura, avowedly written by a missionary, vaguely says:—

"The Sub-Inspector, sent to inquire into the matter, proved so powerless to execute his duty, so entirely in the hands of the mob, he had brought with him, that the Deputy Magistrate in charge of the station, during the absence in the molasses of the English Collector, had to be sent for. He satisfied himself that neither confinement nor minority could be rightly alleged; and so dispersed the crowd."

The two following days passed off quietly, with the visits of friends to take the fugitive back to home. In the evening of the 27th, the Rev. Mr. Spink, who baptised Kalidas, and the Rev. F. W. Smith of Rangunge, left the station in a carriage. On their way, they were mobbed with stones and brickbats. Popular demonstrations of war in this country are mere sound and fury signifying nothing beyond an effervescence of feeling, though they may be accidentally drawn into serious mischief. There is usually vastly little light under the most bellicose appearances. The tongue is the chief instrument most employed. Unfortunately, the halloo-baloo—the incessant cries of mar! mar! kut! kut! which rent the air, proved too much for the nerves of the poor unsophisticated missionaries. They left the carriage and, without attempting a united resistance or a strategic retreat together through the crowd, fighting if necessary, the two Englishmen separated and, in fear and trembling, fled for their lives, each by himself as best as he could. Mr. Spink had the advantage of pyvique over his brother in trouble, and he succeeded in pressing through the crowd and bearing down opposition and taking shelter in a native apothecary's shop where European medicines were dispensed. His less powerful companion was less fleet too, apparently, and somewhat lagged behind. This gave the rioters their advantage and they used it with all the more spurt for the ship that Mr. Spink had given them. He was making his way when one of the "braves" felled him by a base blow from behind. The foe down, the courage of the cowards was up, and they now dared to lay hands on him. The hoarse advances to the charge were louder than ever, and missiles and stones hurled pell-mell. Their wit was fired too at the rare opportunity of a more serious intent, they called for ropes and ashes to give him a decoration of contempt—the “mild Hindu” substitute for the heroic Western operation of tar and feathers. Meanwhile, one more wise than the rest started a doubt about the identity of the victim of popular feeling. His name being asked and given, they declared that that was not the offender they sought for. They had no business with Smith. It was Spink who had taught their children to forsake their gods and they wanted to teach him a lesson or two in popular Hinduism. So Smith was dismissed with some apologies, and the more respectable saw that he was not molested till he obtained refuge in the same dispensary where Mr. Spink had preceded him. Mr. Spink himself had not been left unmolested in his place of shelter. The doctor gave the fugitive welcome and saved him with generous gallantry and wise single-mindedness. He shut his door against the crowd and defended him against repeated assaults. It is a melancholy satisfaction that this disgraceful incident was relieved by the exhibition of good conduct by a few of our countrymen—those whose interference saved Mr. Smith—and by, above all, the brilliant courage and tact of the brave good doctor.

We wish there had been no complaint against the Police.

THE native assistants of Messrs. Mackinnon, Mackenzie and Company's Calcutta office have seized a good opportunity to do a graceful act in complimenting a worthy man, who has not only been uniformly kind to them but who has also lately done a service to the people. To-day, they presented an address to Mr. Mackay conveying to him their congratulations on his being honored with a Companionship of the Indian Empire. The address was enclosed in a finely chased silver casket made by Boseck. Mr. Mackay is highly popular among his subordinates, and his late St. Andrew's Dinner speech has justly enhanced his reputation as a man of real sympathy for our countrymen.

THE Star Theatre Company deserve to be congratulated on the moral influence they are undoubtedly exercising on native society by bringing forward plays like Baboo Amrita Lal Bose's Tarubala. The performance has a special interest at the present time, when the integrity of our social institutions is threatened by go-ahead reformers bent on newshaping all things upon Western models. Tarubala is a pathetic picture of a long-suffering Hindu wife, whose trials at the hands of an English-speaking husband, brimful of ideas of romantic love gathered from English poetry and the European literature of fiction, are deeply affecting, while Shanta is a very ideal of a Hindu widow heroically resigned to her fate. The whole play was represented with great spirit and fidelity from the beginning to the end. The Star is a good place of entertainment which well repays a visit.

WE lately drew public attention to the frightful misgovernment prevailing in one of the leading Mahatta States in Central India. We are glad to see the subject has attracted the notice of the Indian Daily News. With an adequate sense of its importance, our contemporary opened its broadsheet of the 30th December with a leading article, which we reproduce in another part. We hope our other contemporaries—those in especial who care to see native states maintained in their integrity—will give their independent consideration to the matter, and that journalists nearer the scene will keep a sharp watch on the Prince and parasites who are ruining the country, and Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—These remedies are unequalled throughout the world for bad legs, wounds, foul sores, bad breasts, and ulcers. Used according to directions given with them there is no wound, bad leg, or ulcerous sore, however obstinate or long standing, but will yield to their healing and curative properties. Many poor sufferers who have been patients in the large hospitals under the care of eminent surgeons, and have derived little or no benefit from their treatment, have been thoroughly cured by Holloway's Ointment and Pills. For glandular swellings, tumours, piles and diseases of the skin there is nothing that can be used with so much benefit. In fact, in the worst forms of disease, dependent upon the condition of the blood, these medicines, used conjointly, are irresistible.

keep the public informed of all their proceedings. If such misgovernment goes on, it is vain to expect that these States will be maintained.

Hyderabad is another great State—the greatest indeed—which, we are afraid, needs equal watching. But one at a time is enough.

WE draw the attention of the Calcutta public to the Proclamation given by the Census Officer, which appears in our advertisement. The taking of a census is a most important matter. It serves many useful purposes. But it is not more important and useful than it is difficult. In view of this difficulty, it is the duty of all and every person to co-operate in the proper execution of the business. The intelligence and public spirit of the residents of the capital of the Empire will be put to the test on this occasion. We trust our fellow-citizens will stand the trial as befits them, and be all equally animated with a common endeavour to make the Census, in Calcutta at any rate, thoroughly reliable.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE YEAR.

WITH the New Year this journal steps on the tenth year of its life. For being saved from infantile death—the too common fate no less of human ventures than of humanity—we bow in gratefulness to the Great Fountain of Life. Next to Him, are we thankful to our friends, subscribers and readers, whose support, after God's blessing, is our coveted reward. Our thanksgivings this year are of more than the conventional kind. For being spared to this day, we have reason to be profoundly grateful. The Old Year was a period of sore trial to us. Our life hung upon a thread, and Death was almost hovering over us. Nor was this all. Scarcely was the danger to life averted than another blow was aimed immediately at our liberty and mediately at life. For the first time in our long journalistic connection, we were involved in a libel suit. This event is too fresh to require more than a bare reference. Suffice it to say that we emerged from this ordeal with, we hope, our character unscathed.

The Old Year, if it involved ourself in the meshes of a legal trial, was an unhappy year for the journalistic world in general. It was preeminently a year of trial to newspapers. From the great Times downwards to the smallest Indian vernacular print, defamation suits against editors of newspapers were the order of the day. In India, the Pioneer, the Morning Post, the Tribune, the Phoenix, the Rast Goftar, and not a few other papers of less note were among the victims of the glorious uncertainty of law and the remaining barbarism of the law of libel.

Another gloomy aspect of the year was its abnormal meteorology. There were phenomenal storms in the United Kingdom and the United States, attended with unprecedented loss of property and, in a lesser extent, of life. There were great and destructive floods in many countries, not excepting our own. In Bengal, the damage to crops would have had terrible effects were the weather not more seasonable in the subsequent months. Even with this, however, the outlook is not without cause of anxiety in some of our districts. In some parts, like the neighbouring Sunderbans, there has been a bumper harvest. In Calcutta, we experienced singular extremes of cold as well as of heat.

Among the darker shades in the picture of the Old Year, a peculiar prominence must belong to the Influenza. This disease made a tour of the world, visiting both the shores of the Atlantic, not forgetting out-of-the-way nooks and corners of the globe. It was no respecter of persons, but struck down high and low with an impartial hand. Among its more notable victims "at home," were two Anglo-Indian celebrities, Lord Napier of Magdala and Sir Michael Westropp. This mighty Genghis of disease did not omit to invade our country, and if it did not kill so many as it did in colder climates, it made a longer military occupation, making ominous circuit of the land in a leisurely manner.

The year 1890, like 1880, will be remembered as a year of strikes. There were strikes here, there and everywhere, among coal stokers, gasmen, miners, railway employes, police employes, and other classes of ill-requited laborers, and labor demonstrations on a large scale gave anxiety to more than one Government. The subject of the amelioration of these classes, however, occupied the earnest attention of our ruling men. The young Emperor of Germany has shown a great interest in the question. A Labor Conference sat at Brussels which has made several recommendations for improving the condition of the working classes.

The year saw some of the greatest conflagrations that ever took place, the most notable loss by fire being the complete destruction of the University of Toronto, one of the noblest public edifices in Canada—the chief place of liberal education in the Dominion—library and all.

Nor was the year without its crop of scandals. The Cleveland Street scandal, of the previous year, which bespattered dirt on the highest notabilities by its ugly disclosures, was followed in the next by our Indian Munro's raid into the Hells disguised as fashionable clubs. The year ended with a litigation resulting in the all but complete wreck of a great name—we mean Mr. Parnell. The political effects of the O'Shea-Parnell divorce suit are already manifesting themselves in the tottering leadership of the Irish Party and Mr. Parnell's loss of some of his greatest and staunchest political friends.

The year's obituary, if not a heavy list, is not the less a most painful one. Our greatest loss in India is of the veteran editor, and par excellence, Friend of India, Mr. Robert Knight. The most notable death in Europe is that of Cardinal Newman. Among other names of eminence or of Indian interest may be mentioned those of Dion Bouicault, Professor Thorold Rogers, Lord Cairns, Judge Sir Henry Manisty, Sir William Gull, the eminent physician, Sir Rivers Thompson, Mr. Colman Macaulay, Sir Barnes Peacock, Sir Louis Jackson, Lady Rosebery, Sidiq Hossein Khan, Babu Gyanendra Mohun Tagore, Babu Mohes Chunder Chowdry, and Rai Bepin Behari Dutt Bahadoor.

There were in our country, besides the sensations of newspaper libel prosecutions, several others of a stirring character. The trial of the Bank cases of Solomon and Shama Charan Sen, the failure of justice in the trial of O'Hara, and the nasty details of the case of Hurry Mohun Maiti, kept the public mind in a continued strain of excitement. The case of Hurry Mohun Maiti has furnished advocates of social reform with a fresh weapon in their armour. In Calcutta, the operation of the new Assessment Sections of the Municipal Act gave rise to great public discontent. The gold mania having held its ground in Calcutta for months has just begun to subside.

The greatest political event of the year was the retirement of Prince Bismarck from public life. Whatever its real cause, the outward demonstrations of honor with which it was accompanied made the termination of a career of unique grandeur look as only a natural one. The Government and the people vied with each other in expressing their admiration of the great man. Nor has his interest in German affairs ceased with his office. From his retreat his voice is heard whenever occasion arises or German interests require his words of advice or warning. Of incidents of less importance, were the Anglo-German Convention and England's cession of Heligoland to Germany. The Dark Continent occupied more than ordinary attention from European Potentates, and collisions of interest between neighbouring Powers which at times, as between Portugal and England, threatened to lead to war, have been averted by arbitration.

The year has been an auspicious one for the Uncovenanted Civil Service. Its great champion, Mr. King, M. P., visited the country and met with a cordial reception wherever he went. He obtained a Select Committee of the House of Commons to enquire into the grievances of this important branch of the Indian Civil administration and the recommendations of the Committee have given satisfaction to those concerned.

The subject of University reform engaged much attention during the last year. Lord Lansdowne showed his interest in the subject of high education not only by appointing Dr. Gurudas Banerjee as the first Native Vice-Chancellor of the oldest Indian University but by conceding to the graduates a new privilege of electing a proportion of the Fellows from among themselves. The liberality of the Viceroy has encouraged a strong party in the Senate to consider the whole question of the constitution of the University. Several changes have been proposed and the elective principle is likely to be recognised to a larger extent. At Bombay, the reform movement has taken a more practical turn and the methods of examinations are proposed to be improved, while in the Punjab a great controversy went on between two parties in the University, one for lowering the standard of the examinations and the other for keeping it intact. The latter party was almost wholly represented by Dr. Rattigan and though right, his views appear to have small chance of general acceptance. No small sensation was caused by disclosures of fraud in connection with the Calcutta University examinations. The Syndicate was indignant but the Senate did not much care if its own regulations were broken and the Syndicate drew in its horns.

The English and the Indian Budget were both highly prosperous. There was in both countries improvement in the revenue above the original estimates and there was a surplus. But here the parallel ends. For while the English Chancellor of the Exchequer availed himself of a surplus to remove or reduce many of the taxes, nothing of the kind was to be expected in India. Far from any relief of this kind, some fresh taxation has been passed and we are told to be content with some technical explanation which is offered in regard to the Famine Insurance Fund.

The success of six native candidates in passing the Indian Civil Service this year has naturally caused a flutter of joy among our countrymen. The protracted agitation for the repeal of the Silver plate duties has at last prevailed. The duties as well as the system of Hall-marking have been abolished.

The most important political event in regard to our country was the introduction of Lord Cross's India Bill in the House of Lords. It was a fair measure which conceded much of what the Congress and Indian politicians demand. But the Congress leaders feared their occupation would be gone. Accordingly, they set up an agitation against the Bill simply because it did not adopt their plan of election, with the result that the Bill, after passing the House of Lords and through Committee, was abandoned in the House of Commons. Having achieved this feat, the Congress saw the error committed and through Mr. Bradlaugh they have now prepared a draft Bill which they ask Government to accept on the ground that it follows the scheme of Lord Cross.

The year has been one of many changes in the personnel of our Provincial Governments. With the exception of the North-Western Provinces, the Panjab and Assam, the other local Governments and Administrations have all changed hands. Lord Reay left his Presidency amidst an unprecedented demonstration of popularity. Lord Connemara, though his rule came to an abrupt close under painful circumstances, was also highly popular as a Governor. Nor had Sir Stuart Bayley in Bengal, Mr. Mackenzie (since knighted in just recognition of his services) in the Central Provinces, and Sir Charles Crosthwaite in Burma been less popular. The legal membership of the Supreme Council is also about to pass into other hands, Sir Andrew Scoble's successor having already been nominated.

The year will be memorable in the Hindu world for the virtual abolition of the Doorga Pooja holidays. This act of the Government of Bengal is a violation of all traditions, an inconsistency with its own express views of a not much earlier date and a blow at the heart of a whole people.

Early in the year India resounded with the rejoicings and sportive entertainments held in honor of the visit of her Royal Prince Albert Victor. Before the year closed, the country received with the cordiality to a great stranger another great Prince in the person of the heir to the Czar of Russia.

The honor of a baronetcy was conferred on Sir Dinshaw Petit and of a Knighthood on Baboo Romes Chunder Mitter.

The Vizianagram donation of Rs. 50,000 for Dr. Sirkar's Science Laboratory is munificence of an order quite deserving a place in our outline of the year.

THE CENSUS AND THE MUNICIPALITIES.

At the last meeting of a municipality which shall remain nameless, one item of business put in by the clerks was the appointment of Census Supervisors and Enumerators. We say put in by the clerks, advisedly, for it is the clerks and other ministerial officers who conduct the municipal affairs in more than one place. Some Chairman in addition to his want of capacity labours under a serious want of leisure, from large business or constant litigation or distractions of other kinds. The Chairman, however, had called the meeting with a different object, namely, to get a vote of thanks before the dissolution of the Board. He and his clerks were thus working at cross purposes. They wanted the Census, while he only cared for his thanks. He was balked in his expected vote of thanks. The Commissioners who would rather give him a vote of another kind, spared the infliction but firmly refused to give him a certificate of which he was sure to make political capital. Foiled in his business, he did not care for the other business on the agenda paper and wanted to put them off. But the Census was urgent and something must be done at once. When this business could not well be avoided, the Board was startled to see that a mass of letters on the subject from the district Magistrate had been coming in for the last two months and not one had been seen by the person to whom they were addressed. He did not even know that he had been appointed ex-officio Superintendent and was wondering in what capacity he was to act in the matter. On a Commissioner expressing in a pleasant way his surprise at such extraordinary conduct on the part of the Chairman in respect of a matter of such importance, nothing abashed, he immediately shifted the blame to the office, while the truth was the office was all the while the de facto Chairman. It had the hardest task to catch hold of him, he was so constantly on the move on his private account. Amusing incidents not unoften happened when the office had actually to chase him from place to place for getting signatures to urgent papers but getting instead a good scolding for the intrusion. But our story is not ended. When the Census could not be put off, he began to grope his way through the business miserably as usual, and with the absent-mindedness due to his missing a vote of thanks till it excited the pity of a Commissioner who came to his rescue and gave him some useful hints. This good Samaritan of a Commissioner, however, spoiled a nice game by his officiousness and he had only scowling looks from the rest of his colleagues for his pains. They would have very well enjoyed the discomfiture of the imbecile over a rather tough work like the Census. And as for the Chairman—will it be believed, there were no thanks from him either. On the contrary, the ingrate would gladly send his mentor to the bottomless pit if he could. Of such fairness and truth and honor and gratitude is the redoubtable Mayor of the municipality we refer to composed. We have hundreds of such illustrative morceaux, and may in the public interests give publicity to them if necessary, but we stop for the present, only asking Mr. Bolton to spare us the unpleasant necessity. Such is the intellectual and moral calibre of more than one Lord Mayor we know of. Everything is Brummagem about them. It is a wonder how they manage to escape detection from astute official eyes. But those nearer about—Municipal Commissioners—have found them out, and appraise them at their true value. We have refrained from exposing them by name, but if by influencing the Government nominations they aspire to get another term of power, we would be untrue to our calling to remain silent.

SHAKESPEARE AT THE CORINTHIAN.

LAST week and this, at the Corinthian Romeo and Juliet was three times repeated. Each time it drew a full house which testified from time to time its enjoyment of the play in rapturous applause. This was due partly to the popularity of the piece and partly to the excellence of the acting. It is a great advantage on both sides when the story at least is familiar to the audience. It is all the better where the very language of a drama is known. It is impossible in this busy bustling world of ours, for ears of ordinary power to catch every syllable that falls from the most stentorian actor. Yet, in the legitimate drama—in which the effect does not depend on sensational incident alone or on vulgar realism or mere mechanical "properties"—it is of the highest consequence to catch every syllable. This is preeminently the case with Shakespeare, who is as great a Poet in general as a Dramatist, whose noble language, though it may sometimes seem far too good to be in character, yet in point of fact brightens not only the pleasure of the audience but also the dramatic effect. His slightest whispers are of the utmost consequence and forward the end in view. Yet who ever by power of ear alone was able to follow the most distinct stage utterance throughout? It is fortunate that most people are familiar with the text of the principal plays. It is to this familiarity more than to any other cause, we attribute the public enthusiasm here for Romeo and Juliet and the comparative indifference to Richard III. If we are not mistaken, both in this country and elsewhere, the latter play and indeed all the histories, with perhaps the single exception of Henry IV., are far less known than the former, which is universally read. That chef d'œuvre of Shakespeare's youthful genius, as it is regarded by so many, is a general favorite with youth. The budding heart drinks deep the nectar of love in its pages. In this play, Mr. Miln surprised the public with his versatility and elasticity. Who dared to hope that the great Brutus or the magnificent Hamlet could make such a capital Romeo! The character was against his grain, as it must be, we suspect, against the grain of every great tragedian. A war with nature can at best be a drawn battle. It was interesting to see how far thought and care and management could go. It was a wonder how Mr. Miln, a man of stern heroic mould and voice used to command, could whittle down his anatomical emphasis and soften his sinewy rigidity and subdue the whole imperial tenor of mind into the compass of a youthful aristocratic lover. Herr Bandmann too attempted Romeo, reducing his formidable proportions to a marvellous degree, but, notwithstanding all his capacity as an actor, notwithstanding the charming Miss Louise Baudet as Juliet, the representation seemed a burlesque on Shakespeare. Mr. Miln's cause was not anything so desperate. He is no burly giant like the German. His Romeo is seriously worth seeing. For, as regards the delineation of the passion, no dandy or dude Romeo such as we ordinarily see, specially at private theatricals, can satisfy the judgment. And this is Mr. Miln's peculiar province. The plot demands acting of a high order. The ladies are steadily improving since the opening night. We might make some minor criticism of a rather external kind, but we would not, considering that perfection is a costly thing, and these accomplished strangers have not been so uniformly well patronised as they might expect in a great city boasting culture and taste.

Last three evenings, Calcutta was treated to a first class representation of Richard III. Here Mr. Miln was in his element, and his whole company supported him with commensurate spirit. Mr. Nunn, though wellknown as an actor to the Calcutta public, surprised every body by his success as Richmond unto the warlike end. Messrs. Montgomery and Atholwood too did their parts well. Miss Louise Jordan acquitted herself in her sad rôle excellently, not excepting her difficult part in the wooing at the funeral. Even the little girls who personated the young princes acted marvelously. Both the cast and the external get up were all that could be desired. From beginning to end, this great play was happily performed without a single flaw and was throughout received with thunders of applause, Mr. Miln being repeatedly called out before the drop scene. His Richard was simply grand and memorable.

To night, the company revert to comedy. With the assistance of amateurs, they perform the beautiful play of Much Ado About Nothing. It would be interesting to see Mr. Miln in light comedy. He appears as Benedick, while Miss Jordan personates Beatrice, one of the most charming of Shakespeare's heroines.

In another column, is an advertisement announcing two Lectures from the great actor now in our midst, Mr. George C. Miln. This gentleman may be relied upon to make an impression as a Lecturer. After his great success on the stage, he would not venture on the platform, if he did not feel sure of his powers. In fact, he is no novice but has acquired fame as a speaker and lecturer in America and Australia—both famous for eloquence. One at least of the Lectures will be a repetition of what has proved eminently successful in those Continents. The first Lecture on Shakespeare will be illustrated by views, and must be exceedingly useful to those who care to acquire a vivid idea of Shakespeare the man, so necessary to the full comprehension of Shakespeare the Artist and Author. We hope our countrymen will attend in force. The students of our colleges ought not to miss such a rare opportunity.

POLITICAL WORK IN THE LUSHAI COUNTRY DURING THE PAST SEASON.

I. Situation of affairs on 27th April. General Tregear left Fort Tregear on the 27th April. The situation of affairs was then as follows:

Vantura and Dokola. Vantura, who had been arrested and fined 50 guns and 500 maunds of rice, escaped from custody on the 17th April, when only 30 guns and 200 maunds of rice had been paid and five captives still remained in his and his brother's villages.

The missing Kahar. A Kahar had been missing since the 19th April, when he left Upper Kolodyne to go to Shertok camp.

The southern villages. The southern villages had refused to come in, and Thonglien, who was the leader in the raid on Prenkyne village in 1888, still had the majority of the prisoners in his village. Nothing was known of this part of the country.

The Mollianpui. Though the Mollianpui Chiefs had all shown their friendly intentions by sending coolies to assist in building Fort Tregear, yet only two of their villages had been visited. Little was known about them.

The Javzes. Nothing was known of the country north-east of this place or the tribes inhabiting it.

II. The missing Kalar. On 3rd May information was received that this man had been killed by a man called Paklala of Boorla, and on the 14th May the blanket, lotahs, &c., of the deceased were recovered through the agency of Dopura. Owing to the sickness of the garrison no punishment could be inflicted on Boorla at the time, and the matter was subsequently handed over to the Political Officer at Haka by orders of Government.

III. Vantura and Dokola. Several attempts were made to obtain the remainder of the fine commuted by General Tregear's orders to four gyaals and the surrender of the captives; but though the Chiefs sent friendly answers, they sent nothing more. Captain Shakespear then heard that the people were saying that it was not our custom to burn a village twice, and that there was no fear of our again attacking them, so they did not care. He therefore began to ask other Chiefs whether they would give shelter to Vantura and Dokola's people when the villages were burnt in the next cold weather, and went so far as to offer the country now occupied by them to another Chief who was complaining of want of room. The first result of this was that some households asked leave to move to Darbilli and others thought of following. The Chiefs, seeing that they would soon be deserted, sent in to ask for an abatement of the terms. This was refused, and on the 13th September two female captives were surrendered and on the 22nd September two more and three gyaals were sent in. The fifth captive was said to have died; but on it being explained that it was found to be false a further fine would be inflicted, they admitted that the child was alive, but said that as it was purchased from Lienpunga, the owner objected to surrender it. However, on the 6th October the child and the remaining gyaal were sent in, thus completing the submission of Vantura and Dokola.

Fine on Lembu. It came out that when Vantura escaped he went to Lembu's village, and was sheltered there with the knowledge of the Chief. A fine of 2 guns and 100 loads of rice was inflicted, but the rice was remitted on the prompt payment of the guns on the day the fine was inflicted.

IV. The northern villages. These gave much trouble. Most unfortunately General Symons had agreed to their being under Haka and remaining under the influence of the Tlan Tlang Chiefs, and therefore the Chiefs were not anxious to come into Fort Tregear, and every attempt to get hold of them was frustrated by their friends, who invented one excuse after another to prevent the messengers reaching the villages, and thus saved their friends the awkwardness of refusing to obey Captain Shakespear's summons. But at length Mr. Lyall placed a strong card in Captain Shakespear's hand by sending him Thonglien's brother and another relative, who had been prisoners in Arracan for five years. They arrived on the 5th September, and an interpreter accompanied by men from Lalthama's who knew the southern Chiefs, started at once. The result was that on the 4th October all the southern Chiefs or their representatives came in and agreed to obey all orders and to send in captives as soon as the rivers were passable. This they did on the 30th October, thus opening all the country between Fort Tregear and Arracan to us. A map of this tract was made from information received.

Fine of Lalhuama. It transpired that Lalhuama had two of the captives, and had concealed the fact and tried to escape punishment by asking Captain Shakespear to swear friendship. He was sent for and fined Rs. 50 for this deceit, and made to surrender the captives.

V. The Jabows. A good deal of information was obtained about these people. An attempt was made to get them in, but as it appeared that they were subject to the Tashons, and therefore under Haka, no further efforts were made in this direction.

VI. The Mollienpui. All the Mollienpui Chiefs were sent for, and on the 18th May all except three attended, and were told the orders of Government, which they agreed to obey. The three Chiefs who were not present at the durbar were Jaduna, Kaplehya, and Kapchumi. The first was excused on account of his age, and the two last, mere boys, came in later. Every effort was made to strengthen our hold over this tribe, and the result was that when Captain Shakespear wished to make a tour of their villages, they willingly provided him with coolies and cleared the route for him. This tour was most successful. The party of 25 rifles reached Jaduna's village, which is 31 miles in straight line from Fort Tregear and due west of Fort White, on the 6th November. The Mollienpui Chiefs seemed fully determined to obey all our orders, and the reception of the party by the people was most friendly. A map was made showing all the country traversed, most of which was unsurveyed.

VII. The attempted raid on Narchip. A raiding party under Nikoala's son, a Jahow and Ruthorgunga, a Hooleno, numbering 120 guns, which had started to raid Narchip, a village near Patleia's, hearing of Captain Shakespear's march, returned without attacking the village. They arrived at Jaduna's while Captain Shakespear was there, and he interviewed the chiefs and obtained their promises that they would not raid on our territory again, and that they would admit us into their villages. No attempt at exacting any fine was made, as Captain Shakespear did not wish to risk embroiling Jaduna with his neighbours, as when the Chiefs were brought to see him they were Jaduna's guests, but they were clearly told that if they entered our territory again for raiding purposes, their villages would be burnt and their crops destroyed.

VIII. Vutai's descendants. On Captain Shakespear's way to Jaduna's he had to pass through Lalbuta's village. Lalbuta is a grandson of Vutai. Captain Shakespear sent to tell him that he had nothing to fear as long as he assisted the party that was coming. On arrival Captain Shakespear was informed that all Vutai's sons and grandsons wished to submit and be placed on the same footing as the Mollienpui. Subsequently Raltenga, Chief of Kolly-lung, a grandson of Vutai, and Kairuma's son, who came to represent his father, made their submissions. The other Chiefs, who were too far off to come into Lalbuta's while Captain Shakespear was there, were ordered to come into Fort Tregear during December.

MISGOVERNMENT IN INDORE.

When the Government from any motive whatever takes charge of a Native State, there is often a disposition to put the worst possible construction upon the action. We do not say that the Native Press outsteps its province in keeping a watchful eye upon the Government, and is jealous of interference where there is no real ground for it. We do not find fault with their sharp criticism of the political officers, who are apt to presume upon their position as Sir Lepel Griffin did in Bhopal, and others whom we need not name in other States. Having regard to this attitude of the Native Press, it may be assumed that there is something radically wrong in any case in which that Press or any influential portion of it calls for interference. While we deprecate unnecessary interposition, it cannot be tolerated that any wilful man who happens to be at the head of a State shall do as he pleases, irrespective of the rights of the people over whom he tyrannises. There must be some check on his arbitrary proceedings and on his tyrannical whims. It must be to the advantage of the people to have some fixed principles of justice in the administration; and not that they shall be harassed and beaten, imprisoned, and tyrannised over until they seek refuge in flight or suicide. Such a state of things is said to exist in Indore; and one of the ablest, and not least patriotic, of the Native papers, one that stands up alike for the rights of prince and peasant, calls upon the Government to protect the people from the arbitrary and outrageous conduct that has long marked the course of the head of the Indore State. We have ourselves frequently drawn attention to the deeds and the omissions of the Maharajah Holkar, in the hope that one of two things might result:—either that he would see the error of his ways and mend, as the course most creditable and safe for him; or that the Government, however reluctant to interfere, would act up to the duty of doing so as the paramount power. We believe the Maharajah has not been without frequent warning which has not had the desired effect, and the time has come when he should be relieved of the power which he possesses only to abuse. He flouts the decisions of courts of justice, and coerces its ministers. He prosecutes and abuses his officers until they refuse to serve him. It is even said that he personally administers chastisement to them; or, in other words, brutally treats them and destroys his own self-respect and theirs at the same time, if they continue to be the instruments of his outrageous will. To escape this they fly from his territory, and when he frustrates that object they seek refuge in suicide. Surely there is cause enough here for the Government to intervene. But if they do so, there would no doubt soon be a cry raised by interested parties, and the Government would be denounced for interference. But, as we have stated, one paper at least calls upon the Government to interfere as a matter of duty, and to give to the people of the Indore State some such protection as is found in the courts of justice in British India, and the better governed of the Native States. There is some reason to believe that the Government have given intimation that there is a limit to forbearance, and surely that point is reached when such a paper, as the one we have referred to, asks the Government to do its duty to the people who are subject to such tyranny, and the officers of the State who find it impossible honestly to serve, and are punished and outraged if they refuse. There has been something very "uncanny" about the present Maharajah even before he attained the gudde; and it is a question whether he ought to have been allowed to do so. But it was thought right and fair to give him a trial, and he has not proved worth the consideration that was given him; and the duty seems again to devolve upon the Government to protect the people.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

TO BE OR NOT TO BE.

—Alas, they are seeking Death in life, as best to have !
They are binding up their hearts away from breaking,
With a cerement from the grave.

E. B. BROWNING.

I TOLD a gifted child of Art,
Of one, who like himself, could see
The grand and beautiful with heart
To recognize its majesty :

I said, " My friend was sick and weak,
And daily toiled for daily bread "—
He listened, but he did not speak,
And then I added, " He is dead."

He fixed on mine his earnest eyes,
Without a tear their gaze to dim,
And said, with voice more sad than sighs,
" My very soul is glad for him ! "

Warm to my lips an answer sprung,
But ere they parted in reply,
He said, in his strange foreign tongue,
" What is there for us but to die ? "

How often a few earnest words
Reveal a heart's whole history,
And from the bosom's inmost chords
Remove the veil of mystery !

To thee, O Painter ! from thy youth,
Time must have been a teacher stern ;
Experience, with the force of truth,
Compelled thy thrilling soul to learn

False lessons, which the loving eyes
Of God's own angels shall disprove ;
Whose holy fingers weave the ties
Which bind thee to eternal Love.

Die !—no—far rather learn to live—
Live—for thy great and glorious Art !
And to less gifted spirits give Impulse and Insight from thy heart !

E.

TO-DAY.

LET dotards grieve for childhood's days,
And only those look back
Whose wasted wealth or shattered health
Betrays a shameless track :
I cannot join in mourning time
For ever passed away—
For whilst I look on Nature's book
I'm thankful for to-day !

The trees are still as fresh and green
As ever branches were,
And still, in primal vigor seen,
They wave their arms in air ;
The rivers sing the self-same song
That they have sung for aye,
Whose burden, as they glide along,
Is, " God is here to-day ! "

There's not a bird upon the bough,
Or leaf upon the tree,
But in the summer twilight now
As sweetly sings to me :
The bleakest wind that winter blows
Can chase disease away,
And shower blessings in the snows
That hide the earth to-day.

And everywhere a thousand gifts
Invite us to rejoice—
To grieve no more the days of yore,
But raise a thankful voice ;
That tell us, though the world were fair
In years removed for aye,
The earth and sky, and sea and air,
As lovely are to-day.

Then tell me not that childhood's days
Alone are fraught with joy—
That manhood's fancy cannot raise
The structures of the boy :
The childish mind is lost in dreams
Of pictures far away,
But man beholds majestic themes
In wonders of to-day.

O ye, whose eyes upbraiding rise,
Pronouncing fate unjust—
Who walk the earth with cherished hopes
Low trailing in the dust—
Discard a false, unmanly thrall,
Nor own so weak a sway,
But hope in him who gave you all,
And thank him for to-day.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

SIR Charles Elliott left Calcutta yesterday for a short and simple tour in Cuttack. He returns on the 15th. He is accompanied by Mr. Lyon, his Private Secretary, Colonel Mc Neile, the Secretary in the Marine Department, Mr. Finucane, the Director-General of Agriculture, and Mr. H. R. Reilly, the new Settlement Officer for Orissa.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has exempted, during the Bindna festival only, home brewed pichwai from all the provisions of the Bengal Excise Act VII. of 1873 as amended by Act IV. (B.C.) of 1881, which relate to its manufacture and possession within the districts of Bardwan, Bankoora, Beerbhoom, Midnapore, and Moorshedabad, so far as the aboriginal tribes are concerned.

SUCH is the delicate regard alike for woman and truth in Europe, that an etiquette has been established against asking a lady her age. The Chivalry of Christendom will not allow the slightest qualification to the perfection of womanhood. It is the fair sex and glorious. Individually they are but visible embodiments of Truth and Tenderness, Beauty and Good, all of them. As youth is a necessary factor in beauty, the inquiry into age is fraught with risks. The chaste angels of stark reality who disdain to paint themselves or bolster up their attractions with extraneous help might, with their loyalty for truth, give awkward responses, to the injury of the fine theory. Hence the restriction. But though ladies may not be asked, they are not prohibited from declaring their age. Indeed, in their excessive attachment to the truth they volunteer confessions. Like murder, woman will be out. There can be no question about the truth or fidelity of a lady. When most wayward or wrong, she is right and true, as she is immutably "fair" through all variations of features and complexion and vicissitudes of years. The uninitiated may, of course, not know. These want telling to read between the lines and beneath the words. The key of the matter is the fact that woman is figurative—passionately so. She delights in figure. When she is accused of dealing in enigmas, she is only pleasing herself with a favorite figure. That pet is irony. She often willingly tells her own age, and much more into the bargain. In doing so she does not necessarily deviate from the truth, though she may deliver herself in irony.

Such a case seems to be recorded in the following little paragraph which is going round the world:—

"A fascinating young lady being asked recently, as she returned from the circulating library with the last new novel, if she had ever read Shakespeare, tossed her pretty head and answered, 'Shakespeare? of course I have; I read it when it first came out.'"

It were unchivalric to suggest that the lady did not know herself. In gentlemanly etiquette, she was only amusing herself. She indirectly gave the measure of her age and learning by pretending to be a British patrician who had read the author in the first folio edition.

The fashionable English "gents" and ladies in Calcutta may well be supposed to be exhibiting the same long knowledge and appreciation of their and the world's greatest dramatist by keeping away from the Corinthian Theatre at the present season.

BABOO Shama Chinn Law, of the Pantunia Law family originally of Chinsura, died on Saturday last, a victim of Government. He will be remembered in Calcutta for the Rs. 60,000 for the Eye Infirmary of the Medical College Hospital and the Rqship he had expected on three different occasions, but did not get.

MR. Henvey left Indore for England on the 1st instant. The Maharaja of Rutlam and the Prime Minister of Indore came to the railway station to see him off. There was a guard of honor too supplied by the Indore State. Mr. Crosthwaite took over charge of the Central India Agency on the 30th December. He, we doubt not, will keep a strict watch over Indore. He takes there with him a high character.

IT is 37 years that the first survey of the Godhra Rutlam Railway was made. It was only on the 3rd January last that the Governor of Bombay cut the first sod. Surely, this express speed is enough to make one giddy. Is it intended to move the trains at this rate?

GOVERNMENT has replied to the Cambay sufferers' memorial and in these terms:—

"The Governor in Council recognises fully the unusual importance of the painful incidents to which you refer; and if the rumours accepted by your memorialists as to the conduct of the troops, and the excessive mortality and injury to people, had not already been disproved by careful and impartial inquiry, he would have recognised on receipt of your memorial the need for further inquiries. But as matters stand the various measures suggested by you had already been anticipated, and the decision of the Government had actually been conveyed to His Highness the Nawab on the 11th October. Under these circumstances, and since absolute confidence has been re-established, the Governor in Council is apprehensive that no benefit would result from a departure from the well-known rule which treats the affair of a Foreign State as matters to be discussed with reserve, and with especial respect and consideration for the position of the sovereign in subordinate alliance with Her Majesty. I am, however, to assure the citizens of Bombay, who have joined with you in forwarding this memorial, that whilst British interests will be safely guarded, the rights of His Highness the Nawab, and above all, the liberties and happiness of His Highness' subjects, will be severally respected and promoted."

THE Sessions Judge of Meerut, Mr. Markham, has confirmed the sentence on Sejjad Hussain, the editor and proprietor of the Tut-i-Hind. He must, therefore, pay the fine of Rs. 500 and undergo six months' imprisonment. The Judge refused to interfere with the order of the lower Court on account of "the vicious and vindictive nature of the libel and the grossness of the abuse contained in it."

CAPTAIN A. C. Yate and Mr. De Wint, author of "Through Siberia," are trying in Europe to get up an expedition to Lhasa.

TWO Mohamedans have been arrested on a warrant on a charge of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, for having built the house in Junbh Street, Bombay, which lately collapsed. Bail has been refused. The case was fixed for the 9th.

A CASE in Bombay brings to prominence one of the thousand and one anomalies that still exist in the Criminal Jurisprudence of India. The Coroner having committed a man to the sessions, Mr. Hamilton, the Magistrate, would not entertain the charge against the prisoner. What was the good of entering into a useless inquiry? so he declined. The High Court, however, disagreed with the Magistrate, saying he ought to have done his work all the same.

A GREAT sea-robbery has taken place in the Farthest East, reminding one of other times. All Great Britain was shocked by a telegram received from Shanghai on the 11th December which appeared in the Standard of London as follows:—

"A strange story of piracy comes from Hongkong. A body of Cantonese pirates made their way on board the Douglas Lane steamer Namoa, disguised as passengers, killed Captain Pocock and the two officers, looted the valuable treasure that was on board, and then escaped on junks. British gun-boats have set out in pursuit of the fugitives."

THE next Pledership Examination begins on the 24th February next at the Senate House of the Calcutta University, and the Mooktearship Examination on the same day at the same place and at Patna, Dacca, Cuttack, Gouhatty and Sylhet.

THE Collector of Customs notifies that rock salt imported in more than one vessel may be stored in one golah, notwithstanding that it is covered by several bonds, provided all the lots belong to the same person or firm. After the salt has been landed, the bonders will be required to execute one bond covering the total amount, and the other bonds will be cancelled.

IN the Elections to the French Senate, the Republicans have wrested eight seats from the Reactionaries. M. Jules Ferry has been elected for the Vosges.

THE vice of the official classes exchanging certificates has reached the bone of the body politic. The army itself has not escaped the taint. Luckily, the veteran Commander-in-Chief has been roused to purge Her Majesty's Forces wheresoever located throughout the globe. The Adjutant-General of the British Army has issued the following notice to the Generals of all military districts at home and abroad:—

"The attention of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief having been called to the fact that special orders of a laudatory nature are occasionally issued on the departure of staff officers on relinquishing their appointments, I am to acquaint you that the publication of such order is unusual and contrary to the custom of the service, and is not approved by His Royal Highness."

A DEATH from hydrophobia from the bite of a cat is reported from Poole. Of the several persons bitten, one was a boy of five. The child purled and coughed like a cat but did not complain of pain until the night of his death. The medical evidence shewed that death was the result of hydrophobia and that the case was hopeless from the commencement. Not necessarily. In Bengal at any rate, we should have taken the poor child to Chandernagore for the Gondaipara treatment.

AT Dresden, a man named Wolff sells what he calls sterilised milk or milk in which by the mixture of some chemicals bacteria cannot exist, because the matter which nourishes them has been destroyed, thus rendering milk incapable of propagating disease. Notwithstanding the process it is made to go through, the milk is said not to lose its taste and keeps sweet for several days. But will it nourish equally with the dreadful fluid of Nature? The next development will be the manufacture of milk.

THE case of soldiers' outrage ending in loss of life at Malikpore, has ended in the usual manner. Sir Meredyth Plowden, on the 19th December, sentenced Sergeant Cross to twenty one months for causing grievous hurt and Gunners Scaff and Blades to rigorous imprisonment for nine months for causing hurt.

WE are glad to learn from Le Petit Bengali that their representative, M. Alype, Deputy for India, has presented to the Chamber a petition from the inhabitants of Chandernagore praying for the reestablishment of the Court of first instance in that minute French colony. Cannot our contemporary publish the document?

THE Governor General in Council mourns in the Gazette in black the sudden and premature death of Mr. E. J. Sinkinson, who entered the Finance and Commerce Department in June 1877 and for the last three years was Secretary to the Government of India in that Department. Mr. J. F. Finlay has been appointed substantive pro tempore Secretary and Mr. A. Kensington, Deputy Secretary.

A FORCE to be called the "Miranzai Field Force" has been sanctioned for operations in Miranzai on the Kohat border. It is divided into three columns under command of the Brigadier-General Sir W. S. A. Lockhart, K.C.B., C.S.I., Commanding the Punjab Frontier.

WE read:—

"Mr. H. Marks, the editor and chief proprietor of the Financial News, failed to convince a jury that he was grossly libelled in the pamphlet which Mr. Butterfield wrote and published about him a considerable time ago. Such an array of iniquities as Mr. Butterfield charged against Mr. Marks has seldom been urged against a public man. He was charged with buying a farm for £10,300, and offering it to the public for £50,000 as a gold and diamond bearing property, although neither gold nor diamonds were ever found on it, with pulling the concern in the Financial News, and selling his shares to the public who believed in the morality of his journal, with living with a woman named Koppel in New York, with deserting her after she had had a child, with appropriating her jewellery, and with locking her up as a lunatic. Mr. Marks employed the ablest criminal lawyer and the ablest counsel, and the judge summed up strongly in his favour, but the jurymen had formed their own opinion, with the result that Mr. Marks and his paper have received a blow, which (says another London paper) all friends of financial and commercial, to say nothing of private, morality, will agree is not one whit too severe."

Holloway's Ointment.—Miners and Workers in the Goldfields. This invaluable and renowned Ointment is extensively used and patronized by such people to their very great advantage. Being in small compass it is portable and easy of application. When used in conjunction with Holloway's Pills in accordance with the clear and concise directions for use which accompany each pot and box, there are but few of the diseases which afflict mankind that will not yield to the sanative powers of the combined remedies. Holloway's Ointment and Pills do not deteriorate by keeping nor by change of climate, and as they contain no deleterious mineral drug, they can be used with the most perfect safety under the most adverse climatic and sanitary conditions.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

BOTH the Irish Viceroy and Secretary appealed to the newspapers on behalf of the distressed in Ireland, where the Poor Law restricts outdoor relief to the smallest holders of land. They both deprecate reckless charity which encourages the able-bodied to keep away from relief works to the prejudice of the weak. They ask for meals and clothes to the poor school children.

SIXTEEN American war-ships have been ordered to rendezvous at San Francisco next month.

NOTWITHSTANDING the report that the Scotch railway strike had ended, there was a riot at Motherwell, in Linarkshire, on the 5th. A number of strikers occupied the railway tenements, and on their refusing to leave the premises, troops and police were brought in who fired with blank cartridge. The signal boxes were looted and much damage was done. Public sympathy is with the strikers, as evidenced by subscriptions for them amounting to £6,000. There was a meeting of miners at Hamilton, the assembly numbered 10,000 and passed a resolution of sympathy with the strikers and another for nationalization of railways.

THE negotiations between Mr. Parnell and Mr. O'Brien are not yet closed. There are hopes for a settlement of their difference.

THE Red Indians have not yet exhausted their fury. A force under General Miles surrounded four thousand Indians at Whiteley Creek, and sent a request to open negotiations. They showed fight and tore to pieces the request. Later on, however, five of the principal Indian bands arrived at Pine Ridge and submitted. This peaceful submission and prospect of peace was disturbed by a report that the Sioux Indians were attacking the troops at Shoshone, Idaho, and burning the towns, the Whites fleeing.

THE new law (Act XL of 1890) for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals comes into operation from the 15th January 1891, in the Town and Suburbs of Calcutta as defined respectively by Sec. 3 of Act IV. (B.C.) of 1860 and by the notifications published under Section 1 of Act II. (B.C.) of 1860. From the same date too, Sections 1, 4 and 5 of Act I. (B.C.) of 1860 cease to have effect in the said localities. To the public in general, the notification would have been explicable if they were told that the prohibition applies to the local limits of the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal and to the portions of the suburbs to which the Police Act (II) applies. It would have been better still if the boundaries buried in law books and old Gazettes were reproduced on this occasion for general information. In busy times as the present, it would have been desirable if the principal provisions of the new law were republished and explained how it is meant to be worked with reference to the old law. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals ought, at any rate, to clear the intentions of Government. For the information of our readers, we may mention that the sections of the old law repealed by executive order refer to the definition of the word "animal," to the penalty for permitting diseased animals to go at large or die in public places and for employing animal unfit for labor. In the last year's Act, animal has a more extended signification and means any domestic or captured animal. It also prescribes punishment for letting astray diseased animals. From the 15th January, the process called "phuka," whether it causes pleasant titillation to the cow or not, becomes penal and punishable with a fine of Rs. 100 or 3 months' imprisonment, or both.

It is a wise and graceful concession of Lord Lansdowne to the educated classes of the country to allow the graduates of our University to elect two of them as Fellows. Although these Indian Fellowships carry no pecuniary advantages, the barren distinction is not a little prized. This was demonstrated beyond question at the election which took place on Thursday se'ennight. The flower of our University men offered themselves as candidates. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed. And the public mustered in great force to witness the Swayambara of Learning.

The Englishman reports:—

"The Senate House last Thursday was crowded with a large number of Native gentlemen who assembled to watch the proceedings in connection with the election of two Fellows of the Calcutta University. During the early part of the forenoon there was scarcely any work done, but as the day advanced the voting became brisk, and the excitement intense as the hour for the election arrived. Mrs. C. M. Bose was among the list of candidates proposed for election, but her name was struck off, as it was declared that only gentlemen would be eligible for election."

So these ex-colleagues are not only graduates but, like military officers bearing Her Majesty's commission, ipso facto gentlemen. Surely, these degrees are not bad things, after all, is it not? There are graduates and graduates, there are Bachelor Bachelors and Chamber Masters. Are they all gentlemen, without distinction? Then, by what authority? Who has invested them with the charm of gentility? There is nothing in the University Act or Regulations to that effect. Has Lord Lansdowne touched them with his wand of nobility? Or, is it seriously and rigorously meant that "only gentlemen would be eligible"? Then might the Viceroy be accused of giving with one hand and withholding with the other. Then might it be long at any rate before a couple of eligible candidates were found. And what is the Varsity, or, for that matter, the Viceregal, definition of a gentleman? It is unfortunate that the English have almost dropped the word "woman" in speaking of members of the fair sex of a certain position in society, so that the designation which befits the mother of mankind is considered an outrage if applied to a paltry Mrs. Goose or a Miss Pig. Let us not aggravate the situation by ostracising its masculine counterpart. Let us resist the encroachments of snobbishness and unnaturalness as long as possible.

We quote from our contemporary:—

"The following are the names of the candidates:—Messrs. Abdul Rahim, M.A., and Abdul Salam, M.A.; Babus Banya Nath Basu, M.A., Jogendra Nath Bhattacharya, M.A., B.L., Mohun Mohun Chatterji, M.A., B.L., A. Chowdhuri, M.A., Barrister-at-Law, Kristo Lal Dutt, M.A., Jogendra Chandra Ghosh, M.A., B.L., Surgeon Major K. P. Gupta, M.A., M.B., Heramba Chandra Maitra, M.A., Nilkanto Mozoomdar, M.A., Opendra Nath Mitra, M.A., B.L., Aushantosh Mookerjee, M.A., B.L., Nilamber Mookerjee, M.A., B.L., Pandit Pran Nath, M.A., B.L., Bepin Chandra Roy, D.L., Kedari Nath Roy, M.A., C.S., Mohendra Nath Roy, M.A., B.L., Rajendra Nath Sastri, M.A., Gouri Prasad Sen, M.A., B.L., and Chunder Naram Sinha, M.A."

At 5 P. M. the voting was formally closed, and at about 7 P. M. Mr. Nash, Acting Registrar, declared that Babus Jogendra Chandra Ghosh (son of the Hon. Mr. Justice Chandra Mathur Ghosh) and Mohendra Nath Roy, had secured most votes. These names have been admitted to the Vice-Chancellor for election as Fellows of the University, pending the approval and sanction of His Excellency the Viceroy and Chancellor. During the course of voting when excitement was at its height, some 100 graduates of the University affixed their signatures to a letter addressed to the Secretary to the Government of India, requesting him to convey their warmest thanks for the high privilege he has been pleased to confer on them of permitting the election of two of their body for appointment as Fellows of the Calcutta University."

Almost all the gentlemen were good men, and many of them, like Dr. Jogendra Nath Bhattacharya, Mr. Chowdhuri, Dr. Gupta, Mr. Mozoomdar, Mr. Aushantosh Mookerjee, Mr. Nilamber Mookerjee, Pandit Pran Nath, and Mr. Gouri Prasad Sen, are of the highest calibre, who ought all to be on the governing body of the University. The best of them would be better there than the successful pettingers and leeches, and other nondescript tub hunters who have found themselves in it. With such candidates before the selection, it is not to the credit of the electorate. For all that, we admit that the lucky young gentlemen are respectable graduates. Baboo Roy in especial, said to have had a brilliant academic career.

Sir Charles Elliott presided at a meeting at the Town Hall on Wednesday, on the occasion of the delivery of a lecture by Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar on "The Influence of the Study of the Physical Sciences on Moral Conduct." It is strange that no notice of the lecture appeared in the morning papers nor any invitations issued. Still the gathering was full. There were present the Hon'ble Sir Andrew Scoble, the Law member, Sir Alfred Croft, the Director of Public Instruction in these Provinces, and the Hon'ble Dr. Gaudas Banerjee, the Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University. We reproduce the lecture elsewhere. It was delivered with the Doctor's usual earnestness and eloquence. On the conclusion of the lecture, the President on behalf of the meeting thanked the learned lecturer with a few well chosen words, indicating the direction of the wind which took shape in the Bill introduced by the Law member in the Supreme Legislative Council yesterday. Sir Charles said:—

"I am sure that I am expressing the feelings of the whole assembly in offering to Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar our thanks for his interesting, instructive and eloquent address. My Hon'ble colleague occupies a very leading position in the scientific world which entitles him to speak with authority, and I trust none of the young men here present will forget the weighty advice he has given as to the influence which science ought to have in all departments of our moral life. He first dealt with it as regards our duties to ourselves—to our own bodies and to the bodies of the other sex with whom we associate; and I think it is noticeable that where political reformers have been afraid to give advice, the true scientific man does not hesitate to speak out boldly as to the importance of the reform in the minimum age of cohabitation, which is one of the burning questions of the day. I trust also that I am not wrong in assuming from the applause with which you received his remarks that you agree to his views and will endeavour each of you in his own circle to carry them out."

The second part of the discourse related to our duty to each other and enforced the important doctrine of the conservation of forces, shewing how nothing that has once existed ever wholly perishes, and how all our acts influence our neighbours and our surroundings and create an echo which rolls on through the future and produce effects which often we could neither foresee nor desire.

The third and most eloquent and perhaps the most important part of the address related to our duty to God: and here it was a great satisfaction to me to listen to the lecturer taking so firm a stand on the doctrine that all scientific discovery and investigation point more and more clearly to the existence of a great First Cause. He reminded me of those noble lines of Browning's,

How admiration grows as knowledge grows!

How imperfection means perfection hid!

It is often said that the effect of the introduction of Western science to the Eastern mind is to shatter all existing beliefs and to leave behind only a bitter atheism or a sad agnosticism—but here we have the leading scientific man in Calcutta declaring to us that science leads to a firm belief in the Deity and a devout attitude of mind before the great First Cause.

For the whole of his lecture and above all for this last portion of it, I beg to return the thanks of this meeting to Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar.

DOWNSIDE seems to prevail largely in the office of the Comptroller of Post Office, and there is naturally acute dissatisfaction among the clerks. Since Mr. Sandell's appointment as Comptroller, the evil has increased to an extent to lead the discontented spirits in the office to freely communicate their grievances to the press in spite of the discipline which usually makes them a long-suffering class. In filling up vacancies, Mr. Sandell pays scant regard to the claims of deserving men already in the office. Outsiders, especially from Bombay and Assam with which Mr. Sandell was formerly connected, are brought in, and what is worse, these outsiders are often quite innocent of all knowledge of auditing and accounts business. The consequence to the superseded assistants is aggravation of injury. They have not only to put up with the disappointment caused by these outsiders being appointed over their heads, but to work for them in addition to their own proper duties. One of such appointments to which strong objection is taken is that of one Mr. O'Byrne.

Mr. Sandell is also sharply criticised for having introduced a new system of adjusting accounts the working of which is far from satisfactory. There are heavy arrears of work in almost every branch of the office and everybody except Mr. Sandell feels that it must be discarded in favor of the former system. But Mr. Sandell has yet to be disenchanted of his hobby. He evidently yet thinks the system to be good and that it only requires fair play. What is required to work it efficiently is a strong office-staff and so he has applied for a sanction of Rs. 30,000 to enable him to strengthen his establishment. The sanction is really needed to experiment with his system but the ostensible ground for the demand is, we hear, something different. The sanction is sought on the plea of an increase of Money Order business, which, admitting there is great expansion of the Money Order system, does not require such large expenditure. We dare say Sir David Barbour will be fully satisfied of the grounds for the expenditure before he sanctions it.

These complaints do not necessarily affect the Comptroller's ability and vigour. If he has disturbed the department by overriding claims, without being yet able to grapple with the money order book keeping, he has imparted new life and energy into the office. He uses his own eyes and exercises his own judgment, and if he has imported his own protégés from a distance, he has struck down the former unwholesome régime, with its favoritism and unreality.

THE world has long since been told on the unimpeachable authority of a famous English rhetorical and historical pamphleteer, and others who are neither rhetorical nor historical have echoed the sentiment till it has become an accepted article of faith, that the baseness of the Bengalees has no bounds, that it would be difficult for the dwellers of the pure regions of the cold North to conceive the length and breadth of that baseness, that to India in general and to Bengal in particular belongs the unenviable preeminence in guilt, that a Bengalee has distanced all the race of Adam in iniquity and infamy. Who does not remember that masterpiece of chaste eloquence, to wit, "What the Italian is to the Englishman, what the Hindoo is to the Italian, what the Bengalee is to other Hindoos, that was Nuncomar to other Bengalees." "What the horns are to the buffalo, what the paw is to the tiger, what the sting is to the bee, what beauty, according to the old Greek song, is to woman, deceit is to the Bengalee. Large promises, smooth excuses, elaborate tissues of circumstantial falsehood, chicanery, perjury, forgery, are the weapons, offensive and defensive, of the people of the Lower Ganges.".....and much more to the same purport? Of course, the Paradise of Righteousness is in the Islands of the Blest in the Atlantic Ocean. Perfection has her habitat in special in Britain and her dependencies at home, including we dare say Jersey and Guernsey.

Here, then, is a fruit of the modern Eden in a famous contemporary dramatist who died towards the end of last year, as described by one who knew him—the thick darkness of the Heathen Maharaja will doubtless throw into stronger relief the dazzling light beaming in the Christian author:—

"Dion Boucicault was marvellously constructed, in that nature, which lavished her choicest gifts upon his mind, utterly neglected to endow him with a heart or a sense of principle. Many men lie upon occasion. Boucicault lied habitually when he had nothing to gain by the lie, and the truth would have served his purpose better. Many men lead fast lives; Boucicault gloried in his shamelessness, and boasted of a depravity which even he never attained. Many men, at middle age, neglect the wife of their youth: Boucicault is the only man of whom I have heard or read, who, to save a paltry alimony, went into court, and swore that the lovely and accomplished lady whom he had wed in her bloom, who had borne him four children, and by whose side he had spent twenty years of happiness, had never been his wife, but had only been his mistress. Many men are vain; but not many have carried vanity to such a point as to declare—as Boucicault did some years ago to your correspondent—'There have been but three great dramatic authors in the English language—Shakespeare, Sheridan, and Boucicault, and I am not sure which posterity will decide was the greatest of the three.'"

MR. Miln's company will for the first time represent Othello tonight. Tomorrow, Sunday, at 8-30 P.M., Mr. Miln will lecture on "William Shakespeare: His Life and Genius." The programme for the next week will be found elsewhere. Lady Elliott and the Maharaja of Cooh Behar have accorded their patronage for two nights. As the Miln season is drawing to a close, we hope those who have hitherto kept away will make amends.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, January 10, 1891.

HINDU LEGISLATION IN THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

At yesterday's meeting of the Supreme Legislative Council, Sir Andrew Scoble brought in a measure which has been a topic of considerable public discussion for some time past. It is a Bill to amend Section 375 of the Indian Penal Code and to provide a more effective protection to both married and unmarried girls from the evils of sexual intercourse by raising the age of consent from 10 to 12 years. In explaining the necessity of the Bill, the Hon'ble Law member made a statement which, from the point of view of the Government whose duty it is to protect its subjects from known evils, must be regarded as a sufficient justification. Indeed, with the objects of the Bill in the abstract it is impossible for any civilized being not to sympathize. The barbarism of premature sexual intercourse is too repugnant and cruel a vice to expect quarter from any respectable quarter. At the same time, we cannot help saying that so far as the Bill affects married persons, it is a small reform which could well have been left to work itself out from within instead of being forced by pressure from without. There are already unmistakable indications of an improvement in public ideas and sentiments on the subject of marriage. Education of men and women which is advancing with increasing strides is powerfully doing the work of the social reformer and legislator, and it would be a really interesting thing to wait and see what left to itself and unassisted by legislative interference it could do in the way of our social improvement. Without any intention of countenancing the unreasoning clamour of opposition with which the Bill is sure to be received by people in general, we therefore cannot but express ourselves unable to support the Bill. That the evils do exist for which it is intended to be a remedy, we admit, but unfortunately they are evils of a class which the law in nine cases out of ten fails to reach. Neither the Hon'ble member in charge of the Bill nor the Viceroy is sanguine of much direct good from the measure. They nevertheless justify it for the educative influence it is expected to exercise upon our society. There is considerable force in this view, but a constantly fluctuating law—now one thing and ten years hence altered and made another thing—is a rather weak instrument for impressing the popular mind. For the rest, the educative operation of the law cannot but be retarded by the custom of early marriage which prevails, while the practical difficulties of enforcing it will encourage illicit sexual intercourse, the effects of which must be demoralizing upon the domestic circle. It is also unfortunate, as the Hon'ble Mr. Nulkar himself confessed, that the proposed amendment of the law should be made at a time when a heated controversy has been going on between the conservative and the reform party in our country. The coincidence, though it may be accidental, is likely to give rise to misapprehensions as to the true objects of the Bill. For all these considerations, we are fain to be generally in accord with the opinion which Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter passed on the subject. Sir Romesh spoke well and with great force not only from the point of view of a Hindu but like a practical man of experience and a jurist. Our difference is of course confined to the part of the Bill affecting married persons. The other part aimed at the prevention of premature prostitution admits of no objection.

The Viceroy's speech on the occasion as an exposition of the policy and views of the Government on the subject of legislative interference with our social customs, cannot fail to be as reassuring to our countrymen, as it will be profoundly disappointing to ardent reformers. The English agitation for social reform in India has evidently failed of its object, and if it happens that one of the reforms proposed in the English committee's programme has been accepted by the Government of India, viz., that for raising the age of consent, Lord Lansdowne takes care to avow that the Bill now before his Council has an origin independent of any such source. His speech is an earnest vindication of the Government of India from the charge of indifference to social reform so lightly laid at its door by people who have no conception of the practical difficulties which beset the subject in this country. Even such a great Indian writer, experienced Indian ex-official and moderate reformer as Dr. W. W. Hunter does not escape mild criticism at the Viceroy's hands, for taking up the rôle of a Reformer on his retirement from the service of the Government. One of the reforms recommended by Dr. Hunter was to facilitate widow marriages by "depriving Hindu ecclesiastical law of its power to legally punish women for the exercise of their civil rights." How impracticable this remedy is, the Viceroy in a vein of quiet humour shows:—

"Now, I think Hon. Members will agree with me that when we speak of Hindu ecclesiastical law, and of legislation for the purpose of depriving it of any of its powers, we should keep before us a clear conception of that which is meant by the expression 'Hindu ecclesiastical law,' and fortunately the writer of the papers from which I am quoting has himself supplied us with an adequate definition, for he proceeds to explain that by the term 'Hindu ecclesiastical law' it is his intention to sum up 'the complex growth of ordinance, usage, and procedure which forms the religious side of the caste system, as distinguished from its social and commercial aspects.' The struggle therefore upon which the Indian Legislature is invited to embark is a struggle with no less an opponent than the whole system of Hindu religious caste. The hopelessness of such a contest in reference to issues of this kind even if we were not deterred from it by other considerations, becomes evident if we consider the nature of the penalties by which the edicts of this so called ecclesiastical law are enforced. What then are those penalties? We are informed by the same authority that the penalties which the Hindu ecclesiastical law, as thus defined, inflicts upon a couple who have the courage to avail themselves of the Marriage Act of 1856 are three-fold. The first of these penalties is, he explains, a social one. The married couple and such of their friends as have abetted their marriage are cut off from social and domestic intercourse with their families and caste people. With this penalty the writer frankly admits that 'it would be practically impossible for the British Law to interfere.' We may therefore assume that whatever legislation we may resort to this penalty with all its terrors—and it is not easy to over-estimate them—will remain in force. It is explained, however, that there are also two religious penalties, 'the woman is denied admission to the temple for the performance of her habitual religious duties, as if she were living in open sin,' and besides this 'an act of excommunication may also issue against the married couple and their abettors, which completely cuts them off from all rights and privileges to which they were entitled as members of a Hindu caste.'

It is against these penalties that we are asked to protect those who are liable to them, and I gather from what follows that it is intended that such protection shall take the shape of a change in the law which would render my attempt to enforce such penalties punishable under the Penal Code.

We have anxiously considered this suggestion, and the conclusion which forces itself upon us is, first, that we should not be justified in attempting so far-reaching an innovation as that which would, for example, be involved in compelling the admission of any person to the places of worship of the Hindus in opposition to the religious scruples of the rest of the community. And in the next place we are convinced that any attempt to resort to such legal compulsion would be absolutely illusory so long as the social excommunication, with which it is admitted that we should be powerless to interfere, remains in force. The social and the religious excommunication are two forms of one and the same thing, and, so long as Hindu opinion remains what it is upon these subjects, any attempts to remove either religious or social disabilities in cases such as that under discussion are, we believe, predestined to failure. If any change is to be made in these respects, it must come from within, and not from without, and must be the result of an alteration in the public opinion of the people of this country, and not of a social innovation forced upon them by the British Government. Signs are, I am glad to say, not wanting that among the more enlightened and better educated classes such an alteration is already in progress."

The rest of the English programme of reform meets with no less searching examination from our Viceroy. It is only on this one point of the age of consent that the Government of India have, from their own independent information and judgment, arrived at a decision agreeing with the demand of the reformers. The Government have evidently brought forward this present Bill after great deliberation. The subject has occupied their attention for a long time and, we believe, it is the unfortunate case of Hurry Mohun Maiti which is the immediate occasion of the present Bill. In view of a painful incident like this, and the light it threw alike upon the state of married life in this country and of the law dealing with it, the Government, could scarcely remain quiet. But one swallow does not make summer, and it is one thing to take some action and another thing to rush into legislation to change the social institutions of an ancient people. The unfortunate English agitation has also prejudiced the subject. Otherwise, the action taken is characterised by moderation. Our only difference is that the proposed amendment of the law without being restricted to the case of unmarried women is extended to a sphere in which, like the existing provision of the law, it is sure to be inoperative.

THE MUNICIPALITIES AND THE OLD CHAIRMEN.

SOME of the Municipalities in the neighbourhood of Calcutta are in a crisis. This is notably the case in Baranagar and Rajpur. Go where you may in these corporate Towns—this is the common complaint. In the former, the Chairman is a bustling, jostling, imposing figure, but unfortunately, for purposes of business, only an ornamental figure head. Among the upper and more intelligent classes, there is a strong desire for a change of personnel. The continuance for another three years of the present incumbents is dreaded as a calamity. Who can avert the doom? The prime requisite is a strong body of Commissioners, but how or where to get this? So far as the law is concerned, it gives little hope. With the ridiculously low qualification hastily legalised for the voters, the elections have naturally resulted in the return of men but one step removed from the voters themselves. The majority of the elected candidates may be fairly described, without meaning any disrespect, as uneducated men or raw youths. The mischief done by the elections might be somewhat neutralised, if the Local Government appointed the remaining one-third of the Municipal Commissioners with more than ordinary care and circumspection. But the chances of this, under the practice in vogue, at any rate in the district of the 24-Pergunnahs, are extremely uncertain. The Government makes the appointments upon the recommendation of the Divisional Commissioner, who, as a rule, adopts the nominations submitted by the Magistrate, who, in his turn, takes his cue from the last Municipal Chairman. It is thus that the channel is tainted at the source. We showed in a late issue the danger of this procedure, and we could give Mr. Bolton no better advice than to keep the Chairmen at arm's length when he makes his own enquiries into the matter. This is the more necessary in the case of municipalities which have failed to show a good record of work and progress. We understand he is already making inquiries for himself independently of interested parties, and if this is the case, it is a departure from the usual practice in his district, probably forced on him by his knowledge of the character of some of those parties.

If some of these municipalities have failed, the man of all others most responsible for the failure is, perhaps, Mr. Forbes, the late Magistrate of the district. He is a strong as well as an able officer, held in esteem by the Government, but he made a mistake in his selection of the Municipal Chairman in more than one place. The selections were practically his, as we shall show. He went upon the idea that the dissensions which had marked the first stage of the elective municipalities and given him so much trouble, were due to the election to the office of Chairman of persons whose chief claim lay in their education and who did not occupy commanding social positions or possess wealth, and he jumped to the conclusion that these dissensions would disappear if elections of men with the latter qualifications could be made in the future. So he made a tour of his whole district in search of the kind of persons he had in his eye, and, having found them, he set to work how he could secure their certain election. This was achieved by means of the nomination of the proportion of Commissioners reserved in the hands of Government. Commissioners who would support a particular man's candidature for the office of Chairman are easily found, and upon this plan Mr. Forbes went on, working from one town to another, in hopes of thereby inaugurating an era of peace after a period of friction and dissension.

We do not say that the end Mr. Forbes had in view was not of great importance. It was a very desirable object, but the means he adopted missed their aim. In ascribing the dissensions to certain disqualifications in the persons of the first period, he was also correct, but he was wrong in considering this to be the only cause. These dissensions were general over the country, and a more thorough examination of them would have led him to seek their origin in some more general cause. We quite admit with Mr. Forbes that the possession of wealth and social position is highly desirable in the holder of an office of such honor and responsibility. So far we agree with the official view, but we go farther and hold that if the choice lay between one of the two qualifications—wealth or intelligence—we would certainly go in for the latter in respect of offices to which one cannot do justice without a fair degree of intellectual qualification.

It is here we are at issue with the ordinary official view. Not that we are blind to the advantages of wealth as a qualification in itself for offices of trust. Far from it. On the contrary, we would gladly accept an unlettered Raja or Zemindar able and willing to spend thousands of rupees in public improvements, making amends by his liberality for deficiency of talent. But such cases of overflowing wealth or hereditary and acknowledged position of ascendancy are few. A Zemindar of Mymensing who gives forty thousand in a charity and sixty thousand for a new road, may well be complimented with a District Board Vice-Chairmanship or a Municipal Chairmanship by the District Magistrate, and he will be borne with even as an ornamental figure-head. The educational qualification may well be dispensed with in such cases. But these are exceptional cases. We have not often such cases to deal with. What generally happens is to have to decide upon the rival claims of men, both of ordinary social position, with or without education. It is ordinarily a case of education versus uneducation, and though no man could possibly make a mistake in deciding upon a case so definitely put, the issues are often confused by slight differences of external condition, with the result that mistakes are committed with disastrous effects upon public affairs.

SHAKESPEARE AT THE CORINTHIAN.

AT the close of last week, the Corinthian reverted to comedy. On Saturday, Shakespeare's much admired Much Ado About Nothing was played and the performance was repeated on the following Monday and again on Tuesday. The audience was poor and unsatisfactory. It was certainly worse than at Richard III. The reason of this extraordinary disappointment was the same in both cases. This was mere ignorance. The public did not know their author. Our theatre-going citizens and citoyennes stayed away from a play which they had not read beforehand, or, at least, not read well enough to remember. The popularity of Shakespearean performances is a good test of the culture of a population. Greater cities than Calcutta—more enlightened communities than the community of Bengal—wince under the ordeal. London and New York—even Paris and Boston—habitually send their gaping multitudes to the representation of the modern plays of sensation or of vulgar realism and, even better, to extravagant burlesques and madder extravaganzas at which the eye is dazzled with colour and light, while the mind is entirely neglected. The theatre, as a business, obeys the laws of political economy, like any other Demand governs supply. The "Caterers" provide what is ordered or will readily sell. Thus, the legitimate drama is offered at rare intervals, by way of a variety. Even there in the capitals of Civilization, it is not often that the public are tried with exhibitions of High Art. When Shakespeare or Fletcher or Otway is brought on the stage, and appreciated, it is the name of a great actor or the attitudes of a famous beauty on the boards that draws, rather than the fidelity of rendering of a great author. What wonder that Shakespeare or the lesser Shakespearean plays should be a drug in Calcutta! It all depends upon the popularity of the author, and of the piece. It is no use pretending to be interested in what one does not know. This is specially the case in the High Drama, above all, in Shakespeare. There are in these plays very few appeals to the senses and the superficial imagination. The interest centres in the development of character in action and in the accuracy of the representation, if not to the record, at least to the actor's conception of the record. In either case, familiarity with the record is a condition sine qua non of appreciation of the performance. To our shame, Calcutta has displayed gross ignorance as well by staying away as by attendance. The occupants of the dress circle and the stalls on the Much Ado About Nothing nights were a sorry lot. Many of them had not the decency to hold their tongues during the performance, and, from the buzzing talk some of them kept up, they were innocent of the business going forward before their eyes. Fortunately for all concerned, the ignorance does not extend to all Shakespeare. It is a relief to know that the Merchant of Venice, Macbeth, and Hamlet are popular. The Native Town at any rate saved the general credit to some extent by sending its representatives on the evenings on which these master-pieces were played.

Mr. Miln shows equal facility in comedy and in tragedy, and his company is efficient in both. They only want a superior low comedian to make them a crack company for any audience in India or the Colonies, however exacting. Much Ado About Nothing was carefully produced, with all accessories complete, and most happily performed, in nearly all its parts. Mr. Atholwood as Don Pedro, with a fine person nobly dressed, was every inch a Prince, in doing as in seeming. Mr. Nunn, to our mind, did not do so well as the Bastard, and no great shame if not. Mr. Eyre as Friar Francis kept up the high reputation of Friar Laurence. Mr. Nicoll's Dogberry was spirited rendering of the author. Capt. Wood as Balthazar was the very picture of an Italian companion of nobility—a gay cicisbeo of a Princess rather than a mere attendant on a Prince. Anyhow, he was charming to see and to hear. The other actors and actresses all did their parts well. The centre of attraction were of course Benedick and Beatrice, Mr. Miln as the former left nothing to be desired, and Miss Jordan proved a worthy foil to the shallow cynic. The woman-hater who had not suspected the depths of his own heart was most admirably rendered by the actor so great in tragedy.

In Hamlet, which was again introduced on the stage any in Miln was, of course, in his element, and his colleague duty to the seen to have improved greatly since we saw him in this sub-performance. The Prince of Denmark is a tragic-histrionic art. Mr. Miln's rendering is all the more awful mystery, in seeing as he does not quite follow the record, but the inherent right pursues a medium course of his own.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE STUDY OF THE PHYSICAL SCIENCES ON MORAL CONDUCT.

A Lecture delivered by Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, at the Town Hall, on Wednesday, the 7th January 1891, at 5 p. m., under the Presidency of His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

YOUR HONOUR AND GENTLEMEN,---

I was asked by the projector of this series of lectures, my esteemed friend Babu Pratap Chunder Mazumdar, to take a part in the course, and it was suggested that the subject of my lecture might be "Natural Laws as guides to Moral Conduct."

While I consented, not without a deep sense of incompetency, to endeavour to contribute my humble share to the series, I reserved to myself the liberty of framing the title of my lecture. For, I perceived at once that the suggested title was too comprehensive for a single lecture, and besides it appeared to me to be one of such a nature as might land us in a hopeless intricacy of endless discussion. Natural Law includes physical as well as psychical law, and consequently, the subject would embrace the whole domain of knowledge attainable by the exercise of our intelligence. Natural Law, again, might suggest by contrast super-natural, and then the lecturer might be tempted to obtrude his opinions on the reality or the unreality of the super-natural, which may not be pleasant, certainly would not be profitable.

As the object intended to be served by these lectures is to help the moral development of our young men, not at the expense of, but alongside of, their intellectual development, and as the purpose my friend had in view in selecting my humble self as one of the lecturers, was probably that I should say something about the educational value of the physical sciences from a moral point of view, I have taken as the subject of my discourse, "The Influence of the Study of the Physical Sciences on Moral Conduct."

It may be questioned in the very beginning if the physical sciences can have any possible influence on the moral conduct of persons who are engaged in their study. The branches of knowledge, which go by the name of the physical sciences, are generally supposed to be concerned with purely physical, as contra-distinguished from psychical or mental, phenomena; and hence it is thought to be inconceivable that they can have any bearing at all on the latter. And, unless they have any such bearing, it is inconceivable that they can have any influence whatever on moral character.

Without entering into the question of the ultimate nature of matter which constitutes the physical world, and of the nature of mind which constitutes the spiritual world, it requires no profound philosophy to tell that matter and mind are bound up together, so far at least as our present existence is concerned, in indissoluble ties. It is Mind that studies the phenomena of matter and their laws, and the operations of the mind can only be carried on through the agency of a material organization.

A study of the physical world, therefore, must necessarily exert a profound influence upon the mind which pursues that study. Volumes might be written, volumes have been written, on this vast and alluring subject. It is impossible, in the course of a brief hour, to give even a bare outline of it. It will be my humble endeavour to place before you a few points which cannot fail to strike even the most superficial observer.

It is hardly necessary to premise, in limine, that when we speak of the influence of the physical sciences on moral conduct, we presuppose the existence of a moral nature. If it were possible to suppose the existence of beings possessed of the intellect alone, and devoid altogether of the emotions, such beings could never possess a moral character, and nothing could have any influence on that which is non-existent. To such beings a knowledge of moral laws would be an impossibility, and a fortiori no amount of contemplation of the physical world could create or develop in them a moral nature. The development and elevation of a moral nature already existing is possible, and does take place, as we shall show, under favorable circumstances.

The physical sciences embrace a vast, or rather an illimitable field. This is no other than the whole material universe. But infinite as the field may be, the study of it is capable of simplification, and has been simplified. And this simplicity, as we shall see, is of deep significance. The study of the objects under his immediate control in the tiny world he inhabits has enabled man to extend his study of the worlds that people the immensity of space, and he declares to his utter amazement that all these worlds own a most intimate kinship with each other. The laws of motion which govern this present matter on earth, are those which govern the larger masses which constitute planets and suns and systems, which are subject to the same allotted revolutions in the heavens. We believe, it has proved itself to be a science of the widest scope, which is all matter within its scope, and all visible Bill. In view of the fact that matter, large and small.

Man could not prosecute his studies of matter long before coming to the conviction that there were other kinds of action of matter upon matter than at sensible distances, that there were actions at insensible distances when the particles come in what is ordinarily understood at contact, and that these actions are peculiar and seem to be essentially different from actions at sensible distances, inasmuch as the actions at insensible distances seem to change the nature of the matters that thus come in contact. Here we have the origin of the science which deals with these invisible actions resulting in marked visible changes. Chemistry is the name that has been given to it, and it deals with what have been called chemical affinities by which different kinds of matter enter into more or less energetic union with each other, so as to form peculiar compounds. The study of these affinities must be intricate and complicated in proportion to the number of these affinities.

The next division of physical science has its origin in the study of living beings. In addition to phenomena which are of a mechanical and of a chemical nature, living beings present phenomena which are unique and peculiar to themselves, unlike any that may come under the domain of mechanics and chemistry. The complexity of their study is far greater than that of chemical affinities, and the complexity and with it the difficulties increase at every step up the scale of organization and life. Biology is the name given to this division of physical science. In biology beyond a certain stage we have the contact of matter and mind, indeed, the close dependence of the one upon the other. In biology, therefore, the simultaneous study of matter and mind is forced upon the inquirer.

Thus illimitable as is the universe, the study of it is resolvable into the three principal divisions just mentioned. Each division, however, has to be subdivided for profitable study, and with each advance of knowledge the branches of physical science have become multiplied, and the number has become so great as to be beyond the grasp of a single mind. Hence it is that we find that it is only subordinate branches of physical science that are made the subject of special study by scientists. This is an advantage so far as the advancement of the special branch is concerned, but a disadvantage so far as the specialist is concerned, inasmuch as his mental horizon becomes confined to a narrow circle, and, unless corrected by general culture, may lead him to what Bacon has called the "idols of the den."

In the present day when the interdependence of the various branches of science is being more and more observed, and when, consequently, in order to successfully cultivate any one branch, a general acquaintance with other branches, at least with those which are immediately cognate, has become an imperative necessity, this danger from idols of the den has become so much less, that for purposes of our present argument it may well be neglected.

By virtue of the moral nature with which we are endowed we have certain duties imposed upon us, and these are resolvable into duties to ourselves, duties to our neighbours, and duties to our Maker.

The primary duty that concerns ourselves is the duty of self-preservation. A cognate duty is that of preservation of the race. Both these are regulated by the strongest instincts which we possess in common with the lower animals.

Our duties to our neighbours are also based upon certain instincts and higher emotions and sentiments, and are of a very varied character involving all our varied relations, domestic, social, civic, national, international, and with these I should include our relations with the inferior animals.

Our duty to the Author of our being is of the most solemn and sacred character, and is based upon the highest attributes of mind with which we are endowed.

The ways by which we perform these duties constitute our moral conduct. These ways are dictated by the instincts, emotions and sentiments, in other words, by the faculties of the mind, regulated and controlled by the two supreme faculties, Reason and Conscience, one of which discloses the true relationships of things and events, the other indicates the propriety and impropriety, the right and wrong, of our actions.

The influence of the physical sciences upon our conduct as regards self-preservation ought to be paramount, inasmuch as it is by them that the conditions of healthy existence are determined; and therefore upon them we are dependent for rules for our guidance in the due fulfilment of those conditions. All our higher duties are capable of fulfilment upon the sole condition of healthy existence.

धर्मार्थ काममोक्षानामाग्यं नृणां सुखसुखम् ।

Dharmārtha Kāmamokṣhānām āgyam nūlamuttamam.

Health is the chief foundation of virtue, wealth, desire, and beatitude (final liberation of the soul).

These words are as true now as when they were first uttered by our Rishis of old. And therefore it is that the duty of self-preservation is a primary, fundamental duty, the neglect of which means, because it involves and necessitates, the neglect of all other duties. But paramount as that influence ought to be, it is yet far from being so. The conditions of our existence are regulated even amongst the best educated by ignorance and caprice rather than by the teachings of physiology, for the simple reason that a knowledge of the science is confined to the student of medicine, and has not yet formed a subject of general education.

A similar remark with greater emphasis has to be made as regards the influence of the physical sciences upon our conduct relating to the duty of preservation of our race. That influence is yet almost non-existent, at least is most deplorably inadequate to the importance of that duty. The continuance of the species throughout the world of life depends upon the union of two principles which in our human language we call marriage. The observer of nature cannot fail to see that there is a season for each species, of plant and of animal, before which this union, this consummation of marriage, does not take place. In man alone, whom the Author of his being has endowed with the highest attribute of mind—Free Will,—in man the performance of this the highest function of life has been left to his free will. And the creative purpose is obvious,—it is to make the performance of the function not only his highest happiness but his most sacred duty, and thus to make it “the scale by which to Heavenly Love he may ascend.” But in nothing that he does has man more culpably abused his free will than in this. As a rule he drowns duty in mere carnal pleasure, and thus converts into the greatest misery and the most prolific source of his degradation that which was to have been his most exquisite enjoyment on earth and one of the most potent means of his elevation.

The best corrective of this moral perversity can only be furnished by an intimate knowledge of that division of the physical sciences which treats of the laws of life, that is, of biology, especially that department of it which treats of animal life. It is only when we are deeply impressed with the laws of reproduction, of the influences of heredity, that we can see through the folly and wickedness of the infringement of those laws, of the disregard of those influences; and then and then only can we exercise an effectual check upon those instincts and passions which otherwise become so ungovernable.

The burning topic of the day in my country, which is convulsing Hindu Society and has roused, I am glad to say, earnest patriotism, is the perniciousness of the custom of child-marriage, a custom which has been the most efficient cause of the ruin and degeneracy of the Hindu race. I believe it would be impossible for this custom to endure, if the leaders of our society, or better still, if every man and woman of our community, were made to see in the light of physiology what child-marriage in reality means, if they could be made to fully realise that it not only inevitably and to a living certainty prematurely exhausts the couples who are forced to reproduce before the proper season, before they themselves arrive at maturity, but by virtue of that gives rise to offspring who must necessarily share all the immaturity and attendant weakness and incapacity of the parents, and that a succession of such generation means progressive degeneracy and imbecility of race.

The influence of the physical sciences upon our conduct as regards our duties to our neighbours is not of the direct character that we have found it to be upon our conduct as regards our duty to ourselves and to the race. But though indirect, they are not less important. “Do unto others what ye would they should do unto you,” is the righteous rule formulated by sages of old for the regulation of our conduct towards our neighbours, and this rule has been transmuted by the heavenly alchemy of one, who verily spake as never man has yet spoken, into the purest golden maxim of universal love. Now the very first, the most essential, requisites for the carrying out of this holy injunction are sincerity and honesty,—in one word, truthfulness.

If the student of the physical sciences is impressed with any one fact more than another, it is that there is no lie in Creation. Countless as are the objects he meets with in his survey of the universe around him, he receives the same answer from the same object whenever and wherever he interrogates it as to its relations with other objects. There is no whim, no caprice, no ambiguity. The behaviour of one substance with another is invariably the same to-day, yesterday and for ever, under the same circumstances. So firmly does this conviction become rooted in the mind of the student of physical science in the course of even a short study, that all apparent deviations are not only not looked upon as real deviations from nature's laws, but are believed to be due to the intervention of some fresh, unforeseen agency, and are therefore most narrowly watched, and made the turning points of fresh discovery. Such a student, if he is not radically perverse, if he is not altogether devoid of a moral nature, cannot fail to see the moral bearing of this universal fact, cannot but feel and acknowledge the irresistible force of this preaching of truthfulness in one accordant voice by every object small and great in every region near and far of the universe of God, and cannot but shape his conduct accordingly towards his fellow creatures.

There is another fact, as universal as the one just mentioned, which indeed is its necessary outcome, but which science has revealed in its full significance only in these latter days. This is known as the Law of Conservation of Energy. There is nothing occult or mysterious in the expression. It simply means that nothing is lost. Not only is matter indestructible, but every particle, however minute, is so intimately linked with all the rest in the universe, that there cannot be a disturbance in it, however slight, but will be communicated to its immediate neighbour, and will thus travel from particle to particle, till it pervades the whole universe. The original disturbance may not be, and generally is not, communicated in its original form, but is transformed in a variety of ways, and thus becomes permanently registered not only at the place where the disturbance first occurred, but every where and for all time. What a deep, what a terrible significance has this fact for every rational and responsible being! Not a thought, not a feeling, not a sentiment can arise in the hidden recesses of the soul, not a sigh can escape the troubled heart, not a word can be uttered, not a deed can be done, but will be felt and recorded throughout the whole length and breadth and depth of the universe, in characters which cannot be effaced without annihilating the universe itself.

The words of Babbage in this connection will thus be seen to represent but sober measured truth: “If the Almighty,” says he, “stamped on the brow of the earliest murderer, the indelible and visible mark of his guilt,—He has also established laws by which every succeeding criminal is not less irrevocably chained to the testimony of his crime; for every atom of his mortal frame, through whatever changes its severed particles may migrate, will still retain, adhering to it through every combination, some movement derived from that very muscular effort, by which the crime itself was perpetrated. The soul of the negro, whose fettered body surviving the living charnel-house of his infected prison was thrown into the sea to lighten the ship, that his Christian master might escape the limited justice at length assigned by civilized man to crimes whose profit had long gilded their atrocity,—will need, at the last great day of human account, no living witness of his earthly agony. When man and all his race shall have disappeared from the face of our planet, ask every particle of air still floating over the unpeopled earth, and it will record the cruel mandate of the tyrant. Interrogate every wave which breaks unimpeded on ten thousand desolate shores, and it will give evidence of the last guggle of the waters which closed over the head of the dying victim: confront the murderer with every corporeal atom of his immolated slave, and in its still quivering movements he will read the prophet's denunciation of the prophet king,—Thou art the Man!”

This law of conservation of energy is not an idle dream of the visionary, but a positive fact which modern research has discovered in every department of Nature. And it is my faith that this the latest teaching of the physical sciences, cannot but exert its chastening and subliming influence upon our whole moral being.

One of the gentlest hearts that ever breathed, an ardent admirer of nature and a lover of his species, has given expression, in imimitably beautiful but heart rending language, to the anguish which every one however obdurate cannot but feel in his retirement from the bustle of the world, when reflecting upon the miseries which man has brought upon his fellow-men, under the idea that there will be an end of all human transaction with present existence and that time will bury in oblivion all that happens.

To her fair works did Nature link
The human soul that through me ran;
And much it grieved my heart to think
What man has made of man

But when the conviction of the awful reality which modern science has proved to demonstration, that there cannot be an end of any human transaction with the end of this life, that there is no such thing as oblivion, when such a conviction gains ground and has the ascendancy it ought to have and must have, then it is likely that the human world will cease to be the pandemonium which human wickedness and villany have made it, and then, being in harmony with the world around, it will not only be glorious to look at, but glorious (and not, as Schopenhauer will have it, dreadful) in reality.

I have indicated just a few points touching the influence which a study of the physical sciences can legitimately exert on our moral conduct as regards our duty to our selves, both in our single capacity as individuals, and in our dual capacity as parents, and also as regards our duty to our neighbours, by which term we have always understood our fellow-men. But where are to be the lower animals? It has been the glorious prerogative of modern science to most effectively plead in their behalf, by elevating them to the rank of our progenitors. And we shall be devoid of all humanity if we did not treat them with the same gentleness and kindness and consideration with which we are bound to treat our fellow-men.

I have hardly to see if the study under consideration has any influence upon us as regards our supreme duty, our duty to the Creator. I must tell you that it is not without trembling, not without humbling myself to the dust, that I approach this subject. When I remember how some of the mightiest intellects have been wrecked in venturing to solve this awful mystery, I feel my littleness the most profoundly. But I feel the inherent right of exercising my own faculties, and with the light of positive facts which cannot deceive, I must draw my own inferences, and these I am happy to find are the same which have been the hope and the solace of humanity in all ages.

The spectacle of Nature, even in her superficial aspects as presented to the unaided senses, awakens in man feelings and sentiments and reflections which impel him to go behind the spectacle, to dive beneath the surface of the phenomena, in order to unravel the mystery and inquire into the cause of all this wonderful and magnificent panorama. This tendency to inquire into cause is inherent in the human mind, is an irresistible necessity of its very being. The will which we possess and by which we put forth our power to do what we wish to do, and the fact that the phenomena presented by Nature have all the impress of mind in them, foster and encourage this tendency. And accordingly we find that from the remotest ages of which we have record, man has not been satisfied with being merely an idle spectator of all that he sees, with being merely a part and parcel of the system in which he finds himself placed. Whence all this and whither does it tend? Whence and what am I, and what my own destiny?—are questions which occur to him with the dawn of his reason, and recur and haunt him at every step of his life. And the invariable result has been that the answer to these earnest questions which proceed from the depths of the soul, has never been satisfactorily furnished by the system itself, without the supposition of a superintending intelligence.

The adaptations of parts to each other for the subserviency of ends are so common and so obvious throughout the world which we inhabit in all departments, and in the heavens above, that even the observer, who has not the advantage of modern instruments which have in a most marvellous degree extended the range of the senses, even such an observer cannot fail to be struck by them. They have been the theme of admiration in all ages, and have inspired man with the most exalted sentiments of which he is capable, the sentiments of reverence and adoration to the Almighty Power, who is the author of all this wondrous world we see. To the sweet singer of Israel the heavens declared not only the glory but the righteousness of God. Jesus loved to draw the sublimest lessons of morality from the lilies of the field and the fowls of the air and little children. In the eye of Shaikh Saadi, the most philosophic of Persia's bards, every leaf of every plant was a volume which proclaimed the wisdom of the Creator.

هر ورقی دفتر است معرفت کردگار

Galen said, the best hymn man could chant in honor of the Creator was to write a work on anatomy.

Such was the influence which nature even in her superficial aspects exerted upon minds which could appreciate her beauties, such the inspiration with which she filled hearts which could feel the presence of her Lord in all her doings. Increased knowledge of nature has only unfolded her charms more and more. Science has not, as the poet would have it, "from creation's face enchantment's veil withdrawn." Every new discovery has added but fresh enchantment to what existed before.

Take the case of the heavens. Reflect for a moment upon the order which modern astronomy has introduced into that chaos of shining orbs and points which the darkness of night discloses to our view, how she has discovered the one universal law which controls their movements, how with the aid of the properties of light and the laws of chemical affinities discovered in our laboratories here, she has revealed the constitution not only of our own sun but even of those distant suns which from their very distance appear to us as twinkling points, thus uniting them all by the ties of family with our own earth; reflect on all this, and then say, if the heavens declare less the glory and the righteousness of God now than they did in the days of the Psalmist.

Take the case of the leaf. Is it less striking as exhibit of creative wisdom, now that the microscope has revealed its marvellous structure and physiology its marvellous function of building up monarch trees of the forest by absorbing the gaseous carbon of the atmosphere and fixing it in the solid form in the tissues of the parent plant? Indeed, the whole science of Botany has disclosed an inanimate kingdom of life, of which the smallest and the greatest units alike reveal wisdom which becomes more and more striking with closer and closer study. Take, again, the anatomy of man and the lower animals. It was of the most superficial description in the days of Galen. What wonders has the microscope brought to our gaze here in our time! Marvellous as the structures of plants are, they appear to be simple things compared with the structures of animals, and the marvel heightens with each step in advance of the scale of life. Each of the two kingdoms, vegetable and animal, presents a plan of progressive design from the lowest to the highest, in which that which most strikes the mind is the Unity that pervades their endless multiplicity and variety, proclaiming in the most definite and certain language, that there must be One Designer for both. Modern biology is not less beautiful and fervent a hymn than was crude anatomy in olden days.

We have seen that astronomy has united all the worlds in one bond of the most intimate family relationship, and we find a similar bond of union running through all living beings, animate and inanimate. The conclusion is irresistible that the whole universe, with its infinity of worlds of matter and life and mind, forms one stupendous whole, one boundless cosmos, which must own one supreme intelligence as its author, upholder and governor. How can I describe what must be the influence of this grand conception of universe as thus presented to us by the light of modern science. The mind totters at the contemplation, becomes utterly overpowered, and falls prostrate in humble adoration. I cannot conceive of any other attitude of mind and body in the Awful Presence. "The thunder rolls," says the bard of the Seasons,

The thunder rolls: be hush'd the prostrate world;
While cloud to cloud returns the solemn hymn!

It has been said by another bard that "the undevout astronomer is mad." Verily, can Science now tell all her votaries, verily the undevout student of nature is mad.

I am not unaware that some of the greatest minds, students of physical science all, have become so bewildered in the very vastness of their study that they have found it impossible to rise from nature to nature's God. And it is most singular that the facts and laws, which rightly understood heighten our conception of the perfection of the Deity, have been turned into arguments against His very existence. The mode of evolution of the solar and inferentially of the whole stellar system, which Kant formulated and which goes by the name of the nebular hypothesis erroneously ascribed to Laplace; and the mode of evolution of living beings formulated by Darwin; both these hypotheses, which satisfactorily explain the facts and phenomena in their respective domains, and which appear to be substantially correct, both these hypotheses are looked upon by a certain class of scientists as opposed to the legitimacy of the inference of a designer from design. The literature of science has been flooded with arguments for and against, and it is impossible to give even a bare summary of them at the present moment. I can only give you what my own convictions are on the subject. I believe in both hypotheses, and instead of shaking my faith in the existence of the Deity, they have served only to intensify that faith.

Darwin himself has admitted "the extreme difficulty or rather impossibility," I quote his own words, "of conceiving this immense and wonderful universe, including man with his capacity of looking far backwards and far into futurity, as the result of blind chance or necessity. When thus reflecting," continues he, "I feel compelled to look to a First Cause having an intelligent mind in some degree analogous to that of man.——But then arises the doubt," he very honestly says, "can the mind of man, which has, as I fully believe, been developed from a mind as low as that possessed by the lowest animals, be trusted when it draws such grand conclusions?" I take the liberty to answer this question by the question, Why not? However originated, it is unquestionable that the mind of man can look far backwards into the past and far forwards into the future, why can it not draw conclusions however grand and even overwhelming which irresistibly flow from nature's facts? And why shrink from accepting those conclusions when they afford the only solution to the whole mystery of Creation, when, in fact, without them this grand spectacle appears but as a phantasm and a delusion?

The words of an able reviewer of the positive philosophy of M. Comte—a philosophy which has gone far beyond agnosticism, and boldly taken up the position of an emphatic protest against all belief in a creative intelligence as opposed to all progress,—these words of the reviewer appear to me so applicable and appropriate to our present argument, and presents such a masterly refutation in a condensed form of atheistic sophisms, that I cannot resist the temptation of quoting them: "Had the opinions," says he, "we have been combating been maintained by those rash speculators, who are permitted at distant intervals to disturb the tranquility of the religious world, we should not have allowed them to interfere with ours. But when a work of profound science, marked with great acuteness of reasoning, and conspicuous for the highest attributes of intellectual power—when such a work records the dread sentiment, that the universe displays no proofs of an all directing mind, and records it too as the deduction of unbiased reason, the appalling note falls upon the ear as like the sounds of desolation and death. The life-blood of the affections stands frozen in its strongest and most genial current, and reason and feeling but resume their ascendancy, when they have pictured the consequences of so frightful a delusion. If man is thus an orphan at his birth, and an outcast in his destiny; if knowledge is to be his punishment and not his pride; if all his intellectual achievements are to perish with him in the dust; if the brief tenure of his being is to be renounced amid the wreck of vain desires, of blighted hopes, and of bleeding affections—then in reality, as well as in metaphor, is life a dream."

Now I must close, and cease to tire you. I feel I have not been able to do even the faintest justice to the subject. I must, therefore, beg your pardon for having taken up your time at all.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LUKE LATHER.

Luke Lather was a barber, sirs,
And lived at Islington ;
He used to soap his customers,
And laid it thickly on.

And yet he was no flatterer,
For often he would carp
At what they said, and being blunt,
He took them up quite sharp.

'Twas very strange a man so pert,
Could so expertly shave,
But, though no one could better scrape
He never learnt to save.

His circumstances were so strait,
All things with him went wry !
His funds were low, no doubt because
He held his head so high.

For it was found by all who crossed
The threshold of his door,
The more he took their beards away
He bearded them the more.

And so his customers fell off,
Because his tongue ran on,
And, as no one came in his shop,
He found his income gone.

He tried to borrow, but his friends
Had so unfriendly grown,
They left him to himself, alas !
He could not get a loan.

He thought, "How cold this cruel world !"
On this wide world adrift ;
And went and pawned his shirt, for he
Was put to such a shift.

He pensive grew through lack of pence,
And melancholy eyed ;

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Notable Facts.—Intense heat augments the annoyances of skin disease, and encourages the development of febrile disorders ; therefore they should, as they may, be removed by these detergent and purifying preparations. In stomach complaints, liver affections, pains and spasms of the bowels, Holloway's ointment well rubbed over the affected part immediately gives the greatest ease, prevents congestion and inflammation, checks the threatening diarrhoea and averts incipient cholera. The poorer inhabitants of large cities will find these remedies to be their best friend when any pestilence rages, or when from unknown causes, eruptions, boils, abscesses, or ulcerations betoken the presence of taints or impurities within the system, and call for instant and effective curative medicines.

And getting quite beside himself,
Committed suicide.

And so he passed a childless man,
The victim of despair,
For though he hair had often died,
He died without an heir.

And having nothing else to spend,
He spent his latest breath :
And all who once had known him said
It was a barbarous death.

BIRTHDAYS.

I am content
To let the added years
That come to me,
Roll back into the past so far
That memory
Can only find along the shore
Some perfect shells, and nothing more.

I am content
That sea-weed-bits of wreck
And pebbles gray
Float out of sight into the sea ;
For them to stay
Would be to cherish grief and pain
I would not, must not feel again.

I am content
That none of life
Can ever be Lived o'er with self-same throb and thrill ;
No more to me
Will former song, or book, or toy,
Fill the new measure of my joy.

I am content
To live all of to-day ;
And when I dream,
Let fancy reveal in the light
That hope hath seen,
Beyond the present and afar—
A steadfast, sweetly beckoning star

I am content ?
For age upon the heart
Can never creep ;
And when at last in stillest night
I seem to sleep,
A birthday comes to me in truth ;
The gift it brings, immortal youth.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THERE was an Evening Party at Belvedere on Monday se'nnight to meet His Excellency the Viceroy. It was the first public party of Sir Charles and Lady Elliott, and was crowded with the wealth and fashion of the capital. But for the mercy of the season the crush might have been too much for some constitutions. The Lord and Lady of Belvedere were all attention to the guests. There was a dramatic recitation to enliven the assembled crowd, given by Miss Romola Tynte, the English elocutionist staying in the house. The great gathering was however disappointed in not finding the chief guest. Lord Lansdowne was unable to attend on account of illness, though Lady Lansdowne came.

THE Viceroy has been suffering from an obstinate cold, but is now, we believe, nearly well. We are afraid he has not thoroughly recovered from the effects of his Simla exposure. We hope he will seriously consider before again risking himself to the hills of the far off Himalayas.

THE Pioneer is highly vexed that globe-trotters and people at home are not ready to recognise the importance of its clintele or the greatness of Indian magnates. It relates how the acting Governor of Madras had lately invited to Government House a gentleman from England then staying in the city and complains how, instead of addressing "the A. D. C.-in-waiting," the reply came to "———Garstin, Esq." That is a frightful situation! It is more unpardonable than eating peas with a knife. Our contemporary significantly adds:—

"Behaviour of this kind will soon tell on the hospitality which has hitherto been so freely bestowed upon our cold weather visitors."

That kind of behaviour teaches other lessons than the modicum of instruction our contemporary draws from it.

RAJA Rameswara Sing Bahadoor has ceased to be a member of the Bengal Legislative Council. Maharaja Harendra Kishore Sing Bahadur, K.C.I.E., of Bettiah, has been taken in his place. A special chair must be provided for him, for the ordinary seat will not hold his greatness.

BABU Protap Chandra Ghose has gone on leave for forty-five days from the 15th instant. During the period, Babu Puichanan Dutt acts as District Registrar of Assurances and Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, Calcutta.

THE reserved forests in the Angul Sub-division of the Orissa Division is closed against hunting and shooting from the 1st March to the 15th June 1891, except with the written permission of the Conservator of Forests or the Local Government.

THERE is no knowing when the Jain defamation case or the last criminal sessions of the last year will end. The next or the first sessions of the current year is announced for the 18th February. We may therefore hope for the end of the defamation case before another month. Meanwhile, another case, more distinctly criminal, has cropped up from it—a case of extortion by a person who had been employed to fish information.

THE official statement of the importation of salt (private property) in bond and afloat on the River Hooghly, subject to customs duty, on the 31st December 1890, gives a total of 26,58,509 maunds. The largest quantity 13,63,675 was Liverpool Punga, the smallest 683 Bombay Kurkutch. Arabian and Persian Gulfs Kurkutch and Muscat Rock contributed 7,23,254, Aden Kurkutch 4,67,122, Hamburg salt 93,618 and Ceylon salt 10,157 maunds.

MR. H. W. C. Cairduff has been confirmed as Registrar of the High Court, Appellate Side.

MR. A. W. Paul, Deputy Commissioner, Darjeeling, has been appointed Commissioner on the part of the British Government for the purposes of Articles IV, V, and VI of the Convention between Great Britain and China, relating to Sikkim and Thibet.

TENDERS have been called for for works in the first section of the Nichuguard-Kohima Hill Cartroad in the Province of Assam.

THE Falakata Fair, in the Julpaiguri district, will commence on the 11th February and last till the end of the month. Here may be had various articles—blankets and cloth of sorts, wool, ivory, yak tails, musk, honey, wax, ponies and others from Bhootan and Thibet.

THE Zemindari dāk tax in the district of Sarun for the year 1891-92 has been fixed at 12 annas per cent. per annum on the sudder Jumma of estates paying a revenue amounting to Rs. 50 and over, and payable in two instalments on the 28th March and 28th September 1891. At Purneah the rate will be twelve annas and two pies per cent, the dates of payment being the 15th April and 1st September 1891.

It is time that this tax should be abolished. It is a relic of barbarous times, when the Great Postal Department had not been fairly and firmly established.

THE New York Legislature has prohibited smoking by children. The law which came into force from September 1890, provides "No child actually or apparently under sixteen years of age shall smoke, or in any way use, any cigar, cigarette, or tobacco in any form whatever, in any public street, place, or resort. A violation of this sub-division shall be a misdemeanour, and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten dollars, and not less than two dollars for each offence."

Such a law is needed for Calcutta. It is sickening to see mere children drawing their inspiration of wickedness from cheap cigars and cigarettes.

ON a reference from the Subordinate Judge of Nilgiris, the Madras High Court—Muthusami Iyer and Best, J. J.—have held that at Court sales, in the absence of provision in the conditions of sale to the contrary, a bidder is at liberty to withdraw his bid before being accepted.

THE Dacca Gazette has been amusing enough, and now it is going in its desperate earnest for fun. The Czarewitch's visit reminds it of Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace who accompanies the Prince. And the name Wallace is the signal for reviving all the political bitterness with which the Irreconcilable part of our Press assailed Lord Dufferin. The leaders in that foolish business are all now ashamed of it. Indeed, that much abused nobleman's name has come to be the name with which to conjure. But the twig is more formidable than the main bamboo, as the Bengali proverb says. The camp-followers are still at their game, though the order to retreat has long been sounded. With rare taste, the writer welcomes the stranger, his exceptional position with the Imperial visitor not exempting him from maltreatment. The Gazette is sarcastic and rushes with characteristic impetuosity into the region of allegory. It starts with the notion of Sir Donald's having to repay certain parties for services done to Lord Dufferin. As if the Private Secretary is responsible for debts of his principal; as if what was neglected by the Viceroy in the day of power might be rectified by a quondam servant in an unofficial visit in the staff of however big a traveller. But these are sane considerations unworthy of our Dacca humourist. Sir D. Mackenzie Wallace is told:—

"He ought to try to repay the debt. We can suggest one thing. Now that the Russian Heir-Apparent is in India, he will no doubt like to take with him some mementos of his Indian visit. Will Sir Donald try to persuade the Prince to take some living mementos and give them service in Siberia where they will find ample scope to practice (sic) their occult science and hold communion with the hoary headed rishis of the ancient time. This will benefit India too. How, we need hardly say."

Just so. The thing is plain. It is only a pity that this gentleman's power is not by any means equal to his will, so that he is obliged to seek the good offices of a travelling Prince to exile those of his cloth who do not follow his wise lead. But the decree of proscription must be carried out, anyhow. Once the obnoxious journalists are out of the way, the millennium will come with the Dacca Gazette shedding its unclouded lunar influence and mild soft radiance on India, unhampered by the presence of lesser bodies.

NO end of nonsense in Europe, grave Germany not excepted. A Fat Show was held at Berlin, with plenty of weighty Boetians, Gothamites, Cyclops, and so forth. The first prize was carried by a brewer, Herr Berg, who weighed 28 st. 7 lbs.

THE Americans have made an interesting discovery in the art of education. It is the "travelling school." A whole school from Chicago of sixteen pupils with a master and tutors, is out in Europe. After visiting all the principal towns of Western Europe, staying a week or so at each, they were lately at Moscow.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE weather in Europe continues distressing. Early in the week the report, on the 11th, was that most intense frost again prevails throughout Great Britain and the continent, blocking railways with snow and isolating many towns, food being scarce. Next day, we were told that the Thames was completely blocked with ice and traffic entirely suspended. The weather in England continued most severe, large floes of ice accumulating at the mouth of the river Medway. The following day, the news was cheering. The severity had begun to break up, a thaw having suddenly set in throughout England and on the continent. The latest telegram, of the 16th, is however discouraging. Frost has again set in throughout Great Britain, accompanied by a snow-storm.

HAVING feathered his nest, Dr. Koch has disclosed the component parts of his lymph. It consists briefly of glycerine and an extract derived from cultivated colonies of bacilli. The Odessa doctors who had been to Berlin to study his cure of tuberculosis returned with no very favorable opinion. They doubt the absolute efficacy of the remedy. They however still mean to try it—first on animals. In advanced stages of consumption, it only aggravates the disease hastening the death of the patient.

THE French Republic floated a loan for eight hundred and sixty millions of francs. The tenders were sixteen times over.

THE French Tariff Committee are for renunciation of all customs treaties on the 1st of February.

THE Red Indians are said to have ceased to trouble the United States.

THE Parnellites too are reported to have ended their differences with the anti-Parnellites. Mr. O'Brien's paper the Insuppressible has announced Mr. Parnell's consent to retire from the leadership of his Party. On what terms?

WE wish we had heard the end of the Scottish railway strike. It rages still. Both the directors and the men still stick to their terms.

THERE is trouble in Chile. Three men-of-war revolted against the President's unconstitutional rule. The latest news from Valparaiso is that the Chilean Government is massing troops while the Chilean Congress insists upon the President's resignation. The Navy is up in arms and blockading the coast, but the Army remains staunch to Government.

DISQUIETING reports come too from the Argentine Republic. According to advices from Buenos Ayres, a large force of rebels is collected at Entre Rios whither the national troops have been sent to disperse them.

THE Duke of Bedford is dead. He has left a wish to be cremated.

THE more uncompromising advocates of Hinduism are full of protestations against the Bill introduced last week for amendment of the Penal Code. They rest their objection to the increase of the age of consent from 10 to 12 on religion, which the British Government in India has bound itself to respect by non-interference. On a case put by Raja Shosteeshekhuresar Roy, of Tahirpore, the President of the Religious Congress at Delhi, the Shums-ul-Ulema Mahes Chandra Nayratna has given it as his opinion that fixing the minimum of the age of consent at 12, may, in certain cases, go against the absolute injunction of the Shasters, when, for instance, a Hindu wife attains maturity before that age. The adhesion of Nayaratna can not strengthen the Hindu cause, specially in the eyes of those who still smart under the abolition of the Doorga Pooja holidays. This unsavoury subject is being discussed in the papers with a zest that is truly nauseating and is calculated to rake up in the youthful those feelings which it is the object of the Bill to discourage and discountenance, and brings into prominence a condition of things which the present rising generation, to their own immediate advantage and ultimately to the community, either do not know or have begun to forget. It were well had the matter not been brought forward. The existing law has been found to punish brutality on a wife of whatever age, and that will have its effect, even if the proposed amendment of the Code fell through or were partially made into law. The Bengal opposition to the Bill, so far as it appears at present, will be satisfied if the age of consent of the wife is fixed at the period when she is for the first time in a condition capable of conceiving, whether it be at the age of 12 or earlier.

GREAT disappointment has been felt, and is being expressed at the steady refusal of the Congress to entertain, under any circumstances, the subject of social reform. The disinclination to it of the Congress under Mr. Hume's guidance, is not new. Still it was expected not to stand systematic assault. Specially after the sensation created by the trial of Hari Mohan Mutt and the influential agitation in England, it was devoutly hoped that the social conservatism in the camp of the radical reformers in politics would be conquered and the punctiliousness of the Congress determined, and the Calcutta meeting would go in for social reform in right earnest. Vain fancy! It was reckoning without the host. It was hoped that the "politicals" would for once go out of their beaten track and wonted platform and vary their iteration with a glance at the condition of society and a contribution to practical legislation. A social question involving great issues was before the Government and a Bill was in readiness for presentation to the legislature. Well might our rulers in their delicate task of giving law affecting the social and domestic manners of a vast and varied alien population, look forward to some help from the gathering of all the heads and tongues from all parts of the empire at the capital. But the heads and tongues came and went away, after their usual play, apparently unconscious of impending legislation affecting their homes and hearths. The managers of the Congress remained obdurate and would not accept the subject for discussion. The social reformers among the "delegates" wanted to hold in the Congress' place of meeting a social conference. Even this was stoutly objected to, but at last allowed. The conference was, however, a poor business.

In his opening welcome speech Mr. Monomohun Ghose justified the Congress' non-interference policy.

No wonder that the reformers and their friends should be sore at all this. The Madras Times characterises the Congress' evasion of the question of the day the 'Triumph of Hindu Inertia, and denounces the cowardice of the evaders.

The Indian Spectator with subdued bitterness shows up the illogic and disingenuity of the Congress recreants. If they respect the Shastras and Hindu custom, how could they resolve to hold the Congress of 1892 in London? Will not the kalyani compromise their caste? But they are not at all consistent. Is not Temperance too a social question? And how do they seek the interference of the state in that, while fighting shy of it when the question is to protect poor woman? The managers of the Agitation are not only not sure of their own minds but also not agreed among themselves. In justifying the non-interference policy of the Congress, Mr. Manomohun Ghose said that the people must be educated before social subjects should be touched:—

"Talking of political reform at the same meeting, immediately after Mr. Ghose, Mr. Pheroz-sha Mehta ridicules the idea of waiting for the people to be able to ask for such reform. Both these are enlightened men, both are sincere friends of improvement generally. In this matter of carrying the people with us, however, they seem to hold diametrically opposite views. How is the difference to be accounted for?"

Finally, the Indian Spectator exposes the pretence that the Congress leaders are quite in favor of social reform, only they do not think an association of all classes of the Indian community the fit body to discuss a question affecting Hindus alone. How many of the Hindu leaders, asks our contemporary, attended the Hindu Social Conference? That was left to a few enthusiasts and a lot of obscure busybodies and sight-seers.

SPEAKING of the Congress, the Indian Messenger says:—

"The speech of the President, Mr. Pherozshaw Mehta, lasted exactly an hour. It was a production of high merit, and was received with repeated marks of appreciation on the part of the delegates. Mr. Mehta's delivery is excellent, and he had evidently bestowed much care on his speech. But it is to be regretted that both he and Mr. Ghose read their speeches, for even the most carefully prepared speech gains in effectiveness by being spoken instead of being read."

Perhaps. But surely these practised speakers did not read their orations from choice if they could have spoken them. It was because they had not "got their lesson by heart" that they stooped to read their essays. And well for all concerned that they did so, instead of trusting to their memory through that long ordeal. A speech does not necessarily gain in effectiveness by being spoken instead of being read. It all depends upon how it is spoken and how read. The best speech may be murdered in the delivery, and it is more often murdered in the pretence of delivering ex tempore than in straightforward reading out. There is reading and reading of course, as there is speaking and speaking. But any ordinary reading out is preferable to the hawing and humming and drawing of a discourse. Our speakers read out well, the President eminently so. Mr. Mehta is endowed with a sonorous voice of great compass studied in elocution.

The point is to deliver an address, either from memory or from paper. If the delivery is good, the objection to the paper disappears and indeed the inquiry as to the aid is superfluous. The sneer against reading is merely conventional. Like other conventions it involves some disingenuousness and leads to unnecessary cowardice. In point of fact, more speeches are read out than we are told. We suspect this to be the case in the House of Commons itself.

The Maharaja of Cashmere has been overtaken by a great bereavement, which he must feel all the more keenly in his present divorce from power. In the murder of Sanwal Singh, though the state and people may have been relieved of a thorn in the side, His Highness has lost one of the two main pillars of his secret council chamber. He lived at Machhiwala, a village some three miles from the capital. A little over two miles of this he used to travel by carriage, but the approach of three quarters of a mile to his house, being a narrow and rugged hill path, can only be accomplished on foot or on horseback. It was in the last part of his return journey from town that he was waylaid and murdered.

One evening, as usual, he was going home attended only by a tobacco-seiver, when, at a lonely turn of the road, some villains who had him in wait, doubtless at a signal from some one who had been watching, if not following, him, fell upon his carriage, speared down the coachman and rushed upon the master. Poor Sanwal, thinking them perhaps to be highwaymen, offering to give up all his effects, begged for his life. He was notwithstanding pounced upon and cruelly slaughtered. Too revengeful for decency, they were not satisfied even with stabbing, and did not leave till they had decapitated him. The hookah-bearer escaped by flight and gave information to the Police, who found the body without the head, which was discovered on the following day. The murderers have not yet been traced, but they ought to be, if the Council of Regency care to discover them. There is little doubt that the massacre was a work of vengeance. There was no money with Sanwal. It is not even stated that the murderers carried away even the few effects on the deceased's person. The object was the death of an obnoxious man. The coachman was not killed but simply wounded with a spear-thrust—to disable him from doing his duty. The other servant was allowed to escape. That, if it does not suggest the complicity of the servants, seems to point to the perpetrators as agents of authority or influence, unless they executed their own vengeance. In the one case, they were not overanxious on the score of discovery. In the other, they were too absorbed in their main object.

Sanwal Singh was at once an insignificant minikin and an important personage. He was very far from the observed of all observers. But, if he did not fill a large place in the eyes of the public, he was an invisible power of evil. He held no great office in the administration, yet he was all in all. He was one of the unseen manipulators at whose will the puppets of authority danced and jumped and shouted and cried and laughed and raged. He was one of the imps of the entourage—myrmidons rather than mayors of the Palace in Asia, who, through their masters, the sovereigns and chiefs, rule the land. Not a few states in India at this moment are thus ruled, from the heights of the Himalayas to the shores of Southern India down to Cape Comorin.

This Sanwal Singh divided with another menial named Mira Baksh the mentorship over their master and sovereign. These fellows were the true springs of power in Cashmere. They were the wheel within wheel—the arcana of administration. They were all the more terrible and irresistible for being unseen and unaccounted. They did just as they listed without either conjunction or check. From their hiding places behind the throne, they issued mandates, criticised or impeached ministers and poisoned the ears of royalty against them and the public service. It is they who in a trice hurled Baboo Nilambar Mookerjee from power. And they would have demolished many a minister since were they allowed the chance. But Dewan Luchman Das, of the hereditary Dewan family, who succeeded knew his business. Having well established himself and completely reduced the Maharaja into his hands, he proceeded against the rascalocracy of the palace, driving the duet of guides, philosophers and friends of the Maharaja and even imprisoning Mira Baksh. With the downfall of that minister, Mira Baksh was released and Sanwal Singh taken back to favour.

EVERY dog has its day, and there is no cause however rotten which does not find an advocate. Flowers strewn by an unknown hand have been found on the grave of Nero. What wonder, therefore, that a respectable Baboo whom the Government has licked into shape as a Bahadur should have somebody to kick up a row for him. Deserted in Calcutta, the nominal editor of the Hindoo Patriot has found a champion in Dacca—in the real editor of the local Gazette. This gentleman of the press—and the pulpit too, if we mistake not—whom we have just seen greeting with gratuitous mud an accomplished gentleman and a highly meritorious author who held with honour an important official position and is now on an interesting, delicate and dignified mission, is a great preacher of propriety. In behalf of a client fit, he now lectures us:—

"It is certainly very unbecoming on the part of the old man of the Reis and Rayyet to speak in a sneering tone of the rumoured elevation of Mr. S. (sic.) K. Sarvadhicari to the Bengal Legislative Council."

Sneers, to be sure, are all right against those unlucky fellows who dare to hold a different faith from that of the Dacca Gazette, from rulers to journalists, but no sneering tone is permissible, specially in the old, towards the rumoured elevation of the great Sarvadhicari to the legislature. Indeed, our monitor is perplexed. "We are," says he,

"We are at a loss to understand why the Reis and Rayyet should take exception to this appointment."

What perversity, no doubt! We did not take exception to the appointment. We had more delicacy than to do that. We only gave the news that Sarvadhicari had succeeded Sircar, in the best way we thought proper to such a personal topic, without sacrificing our fidelity to the public or to ourself. The Gazette would have done it differently and better, but we are not the Gazette. If objection is taken to the phrase "from the sublime to the ridiculous," the sting of it lies in the truth. Whatever Mr. Sarvadhicari's friends may say, however high his merits may be assessed by his clan or household, he is not to be mentioned in the same breath with Dr. Sircar. The succession is an insult to the public understanding. Mr. Sarvadhicari has been more sinned against than sinning. His patrons have done him an ill turn by starting their Rozmante on the heels of Eclipse, and now his friends are aggravating his misfortune by raising a discussion which his worth can ill sustain in the connection. The necessary coupling of the two names amounts to a huge joke. This champion himself gives up his cause when he admits—

"We do not say, that Mr. Sarvadhicari is the best man for the post, certainly there are better men available."

There! If he is not the best, or one of the best, why appoint him at all? Our legislature is a very small chamber of officials which has room for a few, very few outsiders, and for two or three natives at most. Such members ought to be scrupulously chosen. Such a council is no place for dull mediocrity or intriguing incompetence. Notwithstanding, the champion must show fight, and if unhorsed will pretend to continue battle crawling. The counsel after confessing judgment stickles for costs. Accordingly, the Gazette says:—

"Mr. Sarvadhicari may not be a wealthy man, but his representative character cannot be questioned. As Secretary to the British Indian Association he can be fairly taken as a representative of wealth and land. If this condition is satisfied, other qualifications exist in him, at least he will not suffer in the least in comparison (sic.) with any other possible candidate."

That representative character does not amount to much, we are afraid, being shared between the clerks and the copyists, the cashier and the sircars, the messengers and porters of the establishment. They are all, all representatives of the British Indian Association. Every body in British Indian Street represents the wealth of Baboo Jadoo Lal Mullick and the wide domains of Maharaja Jotendra Mohan Tagore. Had this gentleman been a crack Secretary, there might be some colourable justification for the pretence. But even Kristodas Pal himself was at best the advocate or champion of Wealth and Land.

The last statement of the Gazette is untrue, and the writer knows it. "Not suffer in the least in comparison with any other possible candidate"! The subject of this nauseous flattery never in his wildest extravagance would set up such a claim, we fancy. What, is Bengal so poor that there is no better stuff for a councillor than "the nominal editor of the Hindoo Patriot" of these latter days and the indifferent Secretary to the British Indian Association, who is always on the move seeking assistance in the performance of his duties? But the advocate has himself confessed that his client is not the best man for the post, that there are better.

This preacher of propriety fitly concludes with a personal attack:—

"As regards our 'Ma Bap and Gharib Purwar Government,' surely our friend of the Reis and Rayyet has more reasons to thank it than any one else."

And that is a lie!

THERE are donkeys enough in all parts of India, and the race is in no danger of extinction so long as they continue to follow the great precept to increase and multiply. Unfortunately, it is tainted with bastardy. They are all prone to promiscuous intercourse. Two orthodox Hindu philanthropists of the Western Presidency, of ample leisure as well as means, have undertaken to wean the donkey community from the sin. Men more of action than of contemplation, they have already commenced operations. Here is an account of the first marriage of donkeys in the Mahratta capital:—

"In response to the numerous invitations which had been issued by Mr. Gopal Venayak Joshi and Mr. Gunesb Wasuden, a large number of Hindus, about two or three thousand in number, assembled at Narain Peth, in the City, to witness 'the marriage of two donkeys.' The invitation cards bore the signatures of these two gentlemen with the figure of a donkey at each corner at the top. At one end of a pandal a small dais had been erected, and on this dais stood a male and a female donkey whose marriage was to be performed. The donkeys were laden with wreaths of flowers, and rich cloths were thrown over their backs. A band of native musicians was in attendance and played some tunes. The two native gentlemen above named stood beside the donkeys, one representing the father of the bridegroom, and the other the father of the bride. The latter pointing to the female donkey said to the former:—'This is my daughter. I give her in marriage to your son,' pointing to the male donkey. The usual ceremonies performed on the marriage occasion were gone through amidst much confusion and uproar, and pansupari was distributed. It was then proposed to take the pair of donkeys in procession through the streets of the City with music, but as there were several Hindu marriages in progress in the City, among them being the marriage of the young children of some of the prominent supporters of the Hindu Reform party, it was feared that this procession would cause annoyance to those taking part in the other marriage processions, and the Police Inspector interfered to stop the 'donkey procession.'"

These two gentlemen had resolved to be famous and they have succeeded. By one stroke they have achieved immortality—of a sort. Having money in abundance, they were under no necessity to sacrifice their lives by plunging into the sea or jumping into a crater. And they have had the moderation to avoid the clutches of the Penal Code. They are certainly men out of the common. Even those who see nothing but absurdity in their proceeding must acknowledge that there is originality in the nonsense. And they have the courage of their originality. The idea of marrying asses is enough to stamp a man. To carry out that idea with zeal and actually marry their asses with elut before the whole world, is a feat of singularity. It betrays an unconsciousness of the situation which is charming, if it be not adjudged heroic. We suppose these gentlemen are Vaishnabs and their tenderness for the souls of the fellow-animals is very amiable. Is it possible that they have discovered in these animals any of their own ancestors? These donkeys are of the Hindu persuasion, of course, and of the Western

School of Hindu Theology and Law, and they were married accordingly. We are not told if they were of the scriptural age, or whether the consummation was immediate or deferred. There is, at any rate, no fear of donkeys breaking Nature's law of time.

WE read:—

"It is stated that a Dr. Pant, an Indian Surgeon, has cured scorpion sting by the hypodermic injection of cocaine hydrochlorate. The injection of this drug, it is said, has arrested or destroyed the progress of the strongest venom of scorpions, and it has been used with great success in cases of snake-bite also, in Australia."

Arresting the influence of scorpion venom is no great matter, perhaps. As for snake-bites, the serpents of Australia seem to be a manageable race. So, before now, Dr. Halford of Melbourne received great Kudos for having discovered in the hypodermic injection of ammonia the antidote for snake-poison. We ourselves ordered out copies of the Doctor's pamphlet and had his treatment tried, but it did not succeed on our cobras, kalas, krats and gakhuras. Still we hope the new method too will be tried in this country.

It is said that when the Times consented to a verdict for £5,000 in Mr. Parnell's action against it for the publication of the forged letters, hint was thrown out to it that if it could arrange to have the O'Shea case withdrawn, the damages need not be paid. The answer of the Times was worthy of the leading journal, namely, that not for £20,000 would it attempt such a thing.

VITREO, the negro, is exhibiting at the Westminster Aquarium his wonderful powers of breaking stones and glassware in his mouth and stowing the pulverised mass in his inside:—

"The other day, before some members of the medical profession and the press, he partook of 'light lunch' consisting of lamp-chimneys, oyster-shells, wineglasses, coke, coal, clay-pipes, straw, and remnants of china plates. These he masticated and swallowed, and as after examination proved, without laceration to the mouth."

Did the doctors examine his stools? Some conjurors in India chew little pieces of thread and draw out of the mouth an interminable length of single thread. The chemistry of the stomach and intestines ought to convert the different hard substances taken in by Vitreo into an interesting compound, for which there should be a great demand in fashionable circles.

AFTER all there is a good deal of sameness between the different races of the globe. One of the irritating causes of crime in this country is the uncomplaining patience under suffering of the people. They will not only not defend themselves but they are averse from reporting. Then, they are notorious for timidity. Can Christians be so lily-livered? And the French of all? It would seem that the most horrible practices go unnoticed in the great cities, Paris for one. Crimes reduced to system are daily perpetrated in the very capital of France, unpunished because unsuspected. And they are unsuspected because unreported. The sufferers keep their own counsel, bearing the inevitable with resignation. They conceal a lesser evil to avoid a greater, being bullied into silence by their victimisers with threats of cruel vengeance in case of disclosure. But God is great and crimes will be out, in spite of every precaution and every advantage taken by wrong doers. Thus by a chance has a notorious criminal of Paris been hunted out. Moreau was the man. He derives from his practices a title reminding one of the names in which the Red Indian Chiefs delight. He is called "The Spider's Webb." From his back-slim haunt he was wont to issue after dark and lay nets in the more lonely and out-of-the-way streets and watch for wayfarers to fall into or be entangled in them, when he would come lantern in hand but masked we suppose, and relieve the poor enmeshed of all their effects, even to the very clothes on their back, letting them understand that if they denounced him he or his comrades would exact terrible vengeance on them and theirs. So he pursued his depredations unchecked. At length, as if to shame the manhood of Paris, a poor girl became the instrument for delivering the capital of this pest. She happened to stumble in the web of this human spider. Moreau was fool enough not to spare the gentle sex. She was robbed of all her little wealth, including almost her whole wearing and left to shiver her way to her destination under the confusion caused by the monster's threat. But she was a true girl and babbled her wrongs. Great was the indignation. Enquiries were instituted and the end of all was that Moreau was arrested, put on his trial, and condemned to prison.

THE paper on Technical Education read by Mr. Schwann, M. P., at the Kambuliattolla Boys' Reading Club, was just the thing to awaken interest in a subject so much neglected among us. If an impression could be made upon our attitude of indifference, it was the marvellous story which Mr. Schwann told of the triumph of technical institutes in continental Europe and afterwards in England. Probably, we shall have shortly more to say of the lecture, the lessons of which cannot be too much laid to heart.

MEETINGS are being held in different parts of the town against the Bill on the Age of Consent now in Council. The Savitri Library has taken up the matter and have announced a meeting on Tuesday, at 5 in the afternoon, at the house of the late Ramdhone Ghose of Taltollah.

THE AGE OF CONSENT.

TO DAY'S Gazette of India publishes the official papers on which the proposed legislation for raising the age of consent is based. They comprise the opinions of civil officers of experience, the medical advisers of the Government, and of the Calcutta Public Health Society. The medical opinions, as might be expected, are strongly in favor of a change, called for not merely in the interest of humanity but of the physical health and wellbeing of the race. The civil officers headed by Sir Steuart Bayley speak with more caution and responsibility. There is some hesitation felt by some of them as to whether a legislative remedy for the evils of the premature consummation of marriage would be effective, but the evils themselves are admitted with complete unanimity. Sir Steuart Bayley, who after weighing all that may be said for and against legislative interference with a mischievous custom, finds himself constrained to support it, is, nevertheless, far from sanguine of immediate direct result from the measure. It is, however, all the same insisted upon for what has been tersely described its educative influence upon public opinion and sentiment. The age of 10 years already fixed by the law is too low for the purposes of protection, while its adoption by the legislature has tended to encourage a belief that the age of 10 is suitable for the consummation of marriage. So far as this belief has been fostered by the law, it has done a great mischief, and on this ground Sir Steuart recommends an amendment of the law. The reason assigned is a pure assumption, the people being entirely innocent of the law. Even the educated classes were not acquainted with the British legislation on the subject. As to the question whether the legislature should interfere, it is answered in the affirmative. There is already the precedent of the Government having interfered by fixing the age of 10 years. On the religious point involved in the subject, namely, whether the raising of the age would involve an interference with the religious rites of the people, Sir Steuart speaks out as confidently as Sir Andrew Scoble. He says, that though "it is a religious obligation among Hindus for their daughters to go through the ceremony of marriage before the age of puberty, it is no part of Hindu religion that they should be subjected to cohabitation with their husbands before that period." It is upon this point that Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter has joined issue with the Government, so far at any rate as Bengal is concerned. Opinions in support of his view have, we hear, been given by the Bengal Pandits and mirabile dictu Nayaratna is among the Pharisees. Sir Romesh Chunder rests his view on the authority of Raghunandan Bhattacharjea. This great expounder of the Shastras, though unknown out of our Province, is no doubt of paramount authority among the Bengalis. Yet even Bengali Pandits like Sreekrishna Tarkalankar have departed from his teachings. Is it too much to expect in these enlightened times that Pandits should arise with courage and ability to controvert Raghunandan and lead our people back for their good to the purity of their Rishis of old? In this dilemma, we call upon men like Pandit Jogendra Nath Bhattacharjea, D.L. of our University, and his brother Babu Mahendra Nath Bhattacharjea, of the Subordinate Executive Service, to come to the help of their countrymen.

Our own position with respect to Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill is peculiar and not a little embarrassing to ourselves. It is peculiar in that while we do not quite approve of the increased age for married girls we must decidedly condemn the foolish kind of opposition with which the Bill has been received in some quarters. The tone of criticism in some organs of native opinion is positively more nauseating than the subject itself. What sensible man can deny that it is a bad custom which has at length drawn the attention of the Government? If that custom is attended with physical suffering, not to speak of grave consequences, the Government cannot look on in silence without violating their duty. It is only in view of the delicacy and practical difficulty of interfering with the matter that we would rather have the Government leave it to the growth of education and enlightenment. That there is any naughty intention on the part of the Government to interfere with the religious practices of the people, is a suggestion not to be entertained. No one would be justified to impute such intention after reading the proceedings of the Council on the introduction of the measure. It is carefully disclaimed on the part of the Government both by the Hon'ble member in charge of the Bill as well as the Viceroy. The Viceroy's speech, in particular, is expressly meant to remove any such supposition. The Bill is explained to be the outcome of long and patient enquiry made by the Government into the subject and as standing by itself rather than as the forerunner of a legislative scheme of interference with the marriage institutions of the country. Lord Lansdowne entered into a lengthy review of the position of his Government with respect to the Reform Party in England and here. Various legislative measures have been pressed upon the attention of the Government of India and the Secretary of State. These measures are proposed with the object, 1st., of facilitating the marriage of Hindoo widows, under Act XV of 1856, and, 2ndly, of discouraging early marriage by declaring the marriage contract to be subject to ratification on the attainment of proper age. None of these revolutionary proposals are accepted by the Government of India. An exception is, indeed, made in favour of the one embodied in the present Bill, but the Government have given their reasons for adopting this course which are independent of any pressure from outside. For the rest, the reasons which the Viceroy has assigned for not accepting the English programme of reform ought to be sufficient to show that the Government have no desire to depart from the policy of religious non-interference to which they are pledged, except where non-interference would be almost criminal. In our last issue, we gave an illustration of this by quoting from the Viceroy's speech.

In that passage, he showed the absurdity of a suggestion made by no less an authority than Sir W. W. Hunter that the Government should save Hindoo widows availing themselves of Act XV of 1856 from the persecution of the Hindoo ecclesiastical law. This ecclesiastical law is a Hydra-headed power which will deride all power of legislation to disarm it of its multifarious instruments of terrorizing its victims. Lord Lansdowne's observations on another proposal of the same kind, viz., that for making infant marriages revocable, equally show his appreciation of the impolicy and difficulty of disturbing existing marriage institutions. His Lordship considers that the adoption of the proposal "would simply revolutionise the social system of the Hindoos." He also justly said that a marriage contract, no matter at what age it is entered into, is taken to be of the most absolutely binding and sacred character, so that to make it revocable at some subsequent time would involve an interference with the domestic institutions of the people of India which neither his Lordship nor his colleagues were prepared to perpetrate.

This frank explanation of the views held by the Government ought to be sufficient to take away all asperity from the opposition now offered to the one measure of reform which they have been led, after deliberate consideration of its necessity, to undertake. The Government justify the Bill on the broad ground of their duty to afford protection to a class of subjects too weak to protect themselves, and such a justification must, from the point of view of the Government, challenge light-hearted criticism. There is a fear abroad lest a well-intentioned measure should let loose a sort of inquisition upon the privacy of the Hindu family. This, we hope, will prove illusory. The measures taken in other parts of India for suppressing female infanticide, though involving in the very nature of the case a domestic inquiry among a proud brave people, were not followed by mutual crimination and recrimination such as is apprehended in respect of the present legislative proposal. The Government have shown sufficient knowledge of the complexity of the problem of social reform in this country in their consideration of all the measures which have been proposed for their acceptance, to reject with firmness a disturbing programme, while they have given good reasons for assuming a different attitude towards this proposal. They look for the sympathy of the thoughtful and enlightened portion of the community, and they are fairly entitled to it. They are satisfied that the Bill does not involve an interference with the religious customs, and rites of the people. There can be no doubt of the purity of the motives of the Government, and it has not yet been shown that their proposal involves a real interference. The only exception is in the case of the Bengali race which follows the interpretation of the School of Nuddea. We hope, in view of the substantial gain, the orthodox party in the Province will yet be able to accept the measure.

SHAKESPEARE AT THE CORINTHIAN.

ON Sunday evening, Mr. George Miln, the actor, delivered his advertised Lecture on Shakespeare. There was no attendance, yet the brave man performed his part with sad energy and grim fidelity. The very students, whether Asiatic, Eurasian, or European, who might be expected to know their profit at such a scene, were conspicuous by their absence. We have no hesitation in saying that they have lost a rare opportunity for learning Shakespeare and high

English. If they are wise, they should subscribe among themselves to have the Lecture repeated if possible. The senior branch of the public did not show much more interest in the higher culture, behaving like old truants neglecting school. The lecturer good-humouredly touched on the back sliders with just the tip of his tongue. He had in no other city met with so many superior men. Everybody here is a Shakespearean student and has ever been one, but evidently this man of taste does not care to expose himself to the influences of a theatre. Mr. Miln, however, expressed his satisfaction at the love of the drama shown by the pure Indians. The Lecturer was strong in illustrating the passions delineated by the Poet, specially the different phases of Love. Perhaps, the most interesting and valuable feature of the Lecture was the delivery by this great actor of the most notable passages in the several dramas.

Tomorrow, Mr. Miln will deliver his Lecture on "The Church and Stage as Friendly Forces."

At the Corinthian there has during the week been representation of Othello on Monday and Tuesday and repetition of the Merchant of Venice on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. To-night there will be Macbeth. The attendance was generally unsatisfactory and, considering the cost of these amusements to the caterers and the anxieties of the management, it would be strange if this neglect did not have its effect on the presentation and performance of the plays. Nevertheless, the company valiantly acquitted themselves to their credit. The two plays, the Merchant of Venice and Othello, are particularly difficult and even unpleasant in subject and plot and require particularly high acting to vindicate the genius of the author. Such acting they received. The company do not evidently reject advice and, having stuff in them and working with a conscience, they have improved before our eyes. The two ladies of the company and Messrs. Nunn, Montgomery and Atholwood are really good actresses and actors. On Thursday, Portia disappointed us only with the get-up of the Doctor of Civil Law. It was no disguise at all. That incident is the weak part in the plot of the comedy considered as a picture of nature, and it requires all the ingenuity of the dresser and the art of the actor to make it pass muster. It would be a great reproach to Shakespeare to suppose that he meant such a transparent trick to deceive a whole court. In all probability, the Portia of his vision was a lady expert in masks and disguises, a mimic, with a dash of ventriloquism among her endowments. Such was the Portia that Shakespeare conceived. Without any extraordinary gifts, any barber would convert any young lady into a young gentleman, and we do not understand why this point is so generally neglected on the stage. Otherwise, our Portia was unexceptionable. She surprised us with her treatment of the long dialogue in Act I., Scene II., passing through it trippingly swift as Camilla scours the plain. Mr. Miln's Shylock was, of course, masterly, though he scarcely put forth his full power. The Jew's return scene to find Jessica, gone—which was elaborately presented with such effect on previous occasions—was hastily bundled out of view.

—sweet daughter of his house and heart,

Mr. Miln's Othello is of the Arab rather than the Negro type. Whether this accords with Shakespeare's Moor may well be questioned. Certainly, the Coleridgeans have not thoroughly answered the great American statesman-critic, John Quincy Adams. Probably, the point will ever remain a debatable one. Be that as it may, there is no doubt that the Arab Moor is the more agreeable apparition to see on the stage, or even meditate upon. Mr. Miln's Moor is a magnificent knight to behold, whether in full dress or in dishabille, and speaks and behaves magnificently throughout, as befits his character. Here the actor, without leaving the guidance of Coleridge, follows the obvious and popular conception of "the jealous Moor." Nothing could be better than his bearing all through the contest with Brabantio. The enforced reticence of the accused in the ducal Presence under undeserved reproach and even national humiliation, was most admirable. Perhaps, Mr. Miln showed his highest power in showing the first insidious invasion of the green-eyed monster into his guileless soldierly nature. The whole passion of the play was most incisively wrought out and went down to the very soul of the audience. Perhaps, the expressive touch—"Not a jot, not a jot"—for which we, under the late D. L. Richardson's instruction, are partial, was not so pointed as we could wish. But these are mere aspirations of idiosyncrasy or school. The greatness of Mr. Miln's Othello is beyond cavil. It is a privilege to see such a noble representation of a great creation of a great Poet.

DR. MAHENDRA LAL SIRCAR ON SOCIAL REFORM.

At the late Social Conference, Dr. Sircar delivered a brief but telling address which was lost in vile reporting. We have procured an authoritative version and have much pleasure in laying it before our readers. Such a good speech on social questions is rare on this side the country.

The Honourable Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, who was received with cheers, said :—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,—I must thank you for the cheers with which you have greeted me, but I am sorry you shall soon find that your cheers have been quite mistaken. You have dragged from his sick bed a man who was for the last few days on the verge of his grave. Such a man can scarcely be deemed fit to preside on this solemn occasion. However, as it is your pleasure that I should occupy the chair, I will just make a few remarks. Ladies and gentlemen, this is a meeting of a Social Conference, and I see that this is the Fourth Social Conference that we are going to hold in this country. That we all feel that we are the victims of some social custom or other is such a patent fact that it needs no words from me to prove that it is so. My own reluctance for the chair proceeds from other grounds also than the state of my health. (Cheers.) You have not only dragged me from the verge of the grave as I have said, but you have taken me out of my groove. Social matters have not been in the line of my studies. All my life I have been a humble practitioner of medicine, and the only other matter I have been engaged in has been to introduce a study of the physical sciences among my countrymen, and, therefore, I am not in any sense at all competent or fit to discharge the duties of the office of President of a Social Conference. But as I said, I have one quality, and that is that I have all my life been a victim of the tyranny of social customs in my own country. (Laughter and cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, I see before me a very lengthy programme, but all the resolutions that are before us hinge upon one chief social custom, which has acted most injuriously upon the development of the Hindu race (cheers), and that is child-marriage. (Cheers.) This pernicious custom has done what nothing else could so effectually do, namely, it has deteriorated the once noble and glorious Hindu race, (cheers), a race that gave enlightenment to the whole world. Since it has taken deep root in our country, whatever might have been its original philosophy, this custom has ruined us, and in this way. It has been working detrimentally at the very fountain of life. The Hindu race consists at the present day, if you would pardon me for the very strong expression that I am bound to utter, the Hindu race consists, at the present day, by virtue of this very blessed custom, of abortions and premature births. Are we all born at the proper time? If the laws of physiology are true, and I believe they are eternal verities, then every man and woman, born of parents of such tender years as ten or twelve years for a girl, and fifteen or sixteen for a boy, must be pronounced to be either an abortion or a premature birth. (Hear, hear.) And are you surprised that a nation so constituted should have fallen easy victims under every blessed tyrant, that ever chose to trample upon them? Whatever of intellectual and moral qualities we still possess is by inheritance from the past, whatever we have lost, we have to think this custom for, against which we are bound to raise our most emphatic protest. (Cheers.) Do all you can, let the Government concede everything that we want, and then let the Government leave our shores to-day, do you think, gentlemen, that we shall be able to do without that Government from to-morrow, and why? Look at the root of the evil. You will find that it is because you have not got the capacity for work. (Cheers.) By virtue of the law of inheritance, you have got the intelligence of the old Hindus, (cheers), by virtue of this accursed custom you have lost all that capacity for work which our Hindu ancestors possessed in olden days. (Cheers.) How can you expect, if you go on at this rate, to take a lead in any work whatever? You cannot possibly do it. You must improve the fountain of life itself (hear, hear) before you can expect to cope with races which have held their own for so many centuries, which, under better social customs, have given rise to its units infinitely more mature than ourselves. This is the simple law of nature, and you cannot go against it. Do all you can, talk as much as you like, abuse your Government as much as you like, there you are—a race, degenerated, crippled in all your energies. What then can you do? Therefore, I say that it is a happy sign that along with the Congress you have this Conference (cheers) on the most vital point that concerns us. The Congress may successfully do all its work, you may have the elective principle and the representative principle and everything else, you may have every concession given to you, but how can you maintain the position in which you may be thus placed? You cannot possibly do it. It is a notorious fact that our children are very smart so long as they are at school, but where do they go after that. They go to the wall, shall I say it, they go to the very dust, yea, I tell you, they are nowhere. They very creditably and successfully pass their examinations, and after that where are they, you do not find them anywhere. With the exception of a very few you do not find your graduates engaged in any substantial work. And the few that do, what reward do they receive? What but discouragement and abuse? (Hear, hear.) I have been spending a whole life, and I am almost tempted to say that I have been wasting my life, in order that I might succeed in introducing the study of the physical sciences amongst my countrymen; and what is the reward that I have got? The reward is that after fourteen years of cogitation and agitation, and working amidst insuperable difficulties, I have not yet got a Laboratory built for my Science Association. The fact is that we do not know what we are. If we knew that, there would be an end of all this ruin. Without any further remarks, ladies and gentlemen, I would ask you to proceed at once with the business of the meeting."

THE AGE OF CONSENT.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S COUNCIL FOR MAKING LAWS.

Friday, the 9th January, 1891.

Indian Penal Code and Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, Amendment Bill.

The Hon'ble Sir Andrew Scoble moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882. He said :

"Under section 375 of the Penal Code, the offence of rape is constituted when a man has sexual intercourse with a woman under certain specified circumstances, one of these being when the intercourse takes place, with or without the consent of the woman, when she is under ten years of age. No exception is made in favour of married persons, but, on the contrary, it is provided that sexual intercourse by a man with his own wife, the wife not being under ten years of age, is not rape, that is to say, that her consent will not liberate her husband from the operation of the general law, unless she has attained the age at which consent may be given by women as a class. The proposal in the Bill which I now ask leave to introduce is to raise the age of consent, both for married and unmarried women, from ten to twelve years.

"I think it desirable to state at the outset that no new offence will be created by the Bill. This disposes of the argument, which I have seen put forward in some quarters, that the existence of the marital relation renders it impossible for a man to commit a rape upon his own wife, because it is of the essence of the offence that the carnal knowledge of the woman should also be unlawful and this cannot be the case between husband and wife, because of the matrimonial consent which she has given. That such intercourse may be unlawful under certain circumstances is established by the Penal Code,—it has been the law in India under that Code for more than thirty years,—and the reason for it is thus given by the Indian Law Commissioners :

"There may be cases in which the check of the law may be necessary to restrain men from taking advantage of their marital right prematurely. Instances of abuse by the husband in such cases will fall under the fifth description of rape."

"I do not suppose that any one will question the right and duty of the State to interfere, for the protection of any class of its subjects, where a proved necessity exists for such interference; and I shall therefore proceed to state briefly the reasons which have led the Government of India to propose this amendment of the law.

"The object of the Bill is two-fold. It is intended to protect female children (1) from immature prostitution, and (2) from premature cohabitation.

"As regards the first aspect of the proposal, which affects all classes of children, Europeans as well as Natives, there can scarcely be any ground of objection. The Indian Medical Gazette for September, 1890, states---“Very cursory observation in Calcutta suffices to indicate that females are trained and prepared for a life of vice from a very tender age;” and what is said of Calcutta may, I fear, be said of other parts of the country. The consent of a girl so trained would be a matter of course, and it would be intolerable to allow the reprobate who had ravished her to escape from well-merited punishment on the ground that his victim had consented to the outrage.

“With regard to the second aspect of the proposal, which is equally wide in its scope, the suggestion has been made that to prohibit premature cohabitation is an interference with the religious law of the Hindus. It seems therefore desirable to explain that no interference with the Hindu law of marriage is intended, or will be occasioned, by this measure. The question of child-marriage has been discussed, from both points of view, by men of great erudition and authority: but it is not necessary for me to attempt to decide between them, for the question of child-marriage is left untouched by this Bill. I will, however, venture to say that, out of all these discussions, two propositions have emerged and stand established. The first is that the sages enjoin, and the custom of many castes requires, that a girl should be given in marriage before she attains puberty; and the second, that the Shastras denounce in the strongest terms, and award the most terrible punishments, both here and hereafter, to the sin of connection with an immature girl. I scarcely think that sufficient stress has hitherto been laid on the latter proposition. In an eloquent appeal to his fellow-countrymen Pundit Sasadhur Turkachuramoni thus states the orthodox doctrine:

‘It is true we advocate early marriage (but not before the eighth year), but we condemn the custom of cohabiting with a wife before she has attained puberty. We do not support early marriage of boys. We believe it to be a great sin to cohabit with a girl before her puberty, and we believe it to be the terrible cause of our degeneration. We know that Hindu society does not believe this custom to be a great sin, and hence the degradation of the Hindus.’

“It seems to me therefore that I am justified in saying that the teachings of the sacred books of the Hindus are not in conflict with the proposals of the Bill; if modern practice, under the guise of religious observance, disregards and violates those teachings, it cannot be allowed to invoke them to justify its own disobedience to their commands.

“A better argument, or rather an argument that would be better if it were well-founded, is that the Bill is not necessary, in the first place, because the mischief intended to be guarded against is not of common occurrence, and, secondly, because the existing law is sufficient to punish the infrequent cases that occur. I am unfortunately not able to accept either of these contentions.

“Upon the first point I readily admit that the practice is not equally common in all parts of India, and that among the more enlightened classes everywhere it is viewed with increasing disfavour. But as regards Bengal, for instance, Sir Stuart Bayley reports that---

‘it is a general practice for Hindu girls, after they are married but before puberty is even indicated, much less established, to be subjected to more or less frequent acts of connection with their husbands. The custom appears to be widespread---less universal among the higher than among the lower classes of Hindus---but it prevails generally over Bengal Proper, especially over Eastern and Central Bengal. It does not extend generally to Behar, nor is it prevalent in Orissa, and the aboriginal tribes are apparently free from it.’

“If this testimony stood alone, I submit, the necessity for legislation would be made out, but there is no doubt that the evil is not confined to Bengal. Where it exists, it should be dealt with as an offence; where it does not exist, the law will have no operation.

“Then, is the law already sufficient? To put it crudely, I should say that a law which permits a full-grown man to violate with precaution a little girl of ten years of age cannot be considered sufficient, except from the ruffian’s point of view. ‘Female children under the age of puberty,’ says Dr. Macleod, in an able paper recently read by him before the Calcutta Medical Society, ‘are physically unfit for sexual intercourse, and such intercourse with sexually immature female children, under any circumstances, should be declared an offence punishable by the law.’ That is a perfectly intelligible proposition, and is the proposition which I am asking this Council to adopt. But what is the existing law, as laid down by one of the ablest of our Judges in Hari Maiti’s case? After pointing out that the law of rape was not applicable, as the girl was over ten years of age, Mr. Justice Wilson goes on to say--- is safe and must be regarded as right. We have no right to do that, because the law has not done it, and therefore in cases of sexual intercourse with females above ten years of age, but of whom it is alleged that they are so immature as to render sexual intercourse dangerous, we cannot take the simple and easy method, as in cases of rape, of enquiring merely into the age of the girl. We have to enquire into all the circumstances of each individual case. And, secondly, when we come to apply the law to the facts of each case, we have no hard-and-fast line drawn for us as in the case of rape, in which the fact of sexual intercourse is the only matter to be enquired into; but we have to do with a wholly different class of evidence, involving many delicate considerations, of intention, of knowledge, of rashness, of negligence and of consequences..... In such cases, we have not to do with any general question as to what is the usual age of puberty, or what we should say, if attempting to lay down a general rule, is the safe age for the consummation of marriage. We have simply to do with the facts of the particular case on the evidence, and to say whether, having regard to the physical condition of the particular girl with whom sexual intercourse was had, and to the intention, the knowledge, the degree of rashness or of negligence with which the accused is shown to have acted on the occasion in question, he has brought himself within any of the provisions of the criminal law.’

“Now I put it to the Council whether all these difficulties ought to be interposed in the way of giving effectual legal protection to these poor little girls, and whether we ought not to lay down a hard-and-fast line, as the learned Judge calls it, whereby enquiries into cases of this class may be simplified, and the people generally may be brought to understand that the exercise of marital rights must be restrained where restraint is necessary for the protection of the wife. I have already shown that the Legislature has a right to impose such a limit. Again to quote Mr. Justice Wilson---

‘Under no system of law with which Courts have had to do in this country, whether Hindu or Mahomedan or that framed under British rule, has it ever been the law that a husband has the absolute right to enjoy the person of his wife without regard to the question of safety to her.’

“The question then remains---what ought that limit to be?

“The proposal of the Bill is to draw the line at twelve years. This is the age which has been advocated by those who have for many years been endeavouring to educate public opinion on the subject. And there appear to be valid reasons for the recommendation. It is in accordance with the practice which already prevails in some parts of India. In a numerously signed petition from Poona, against raising the age of consent, it is stated that consummation of marriage seldom takes place before the girl is twelve years old. In Madras it is alleged that premature cohabitation is of rare occurrence, and in the Punjab conjugal life ordinarily begins after sexual maturity. The Hindu law, as I have already shown, while enjoining the marriage of girls before they attain puberty, strictly prohibits the consummation of marriage before puberty is attained. According to Mahomedan law ‘puberty and discretion constitute the essential conditions of the capacity to enter into a valid contract of marriage.’ With both the great divisions of the population in India, the attainment of puberty may be taken as determining the appropriate age for consummation of marriage. When, then, is the period at which in the ordinary course of nature puberty is commonly attained by girls in India? There has been much discussion on this subject among medical men, and many are of opinion that a girl is not competent physically or mentally to give her consent to sexual intercourse until she has completed fourteen years of age. But to adopt this limit would involve too abrupt a fundamental revolution in the social life of India; and to attempt to enforce it by legislation would almost certainly fail of its object. I prefer to submit for the approval of the Council the more moderate view expressed by Dr. Macleod in the paper from which I have already quoted. Speaking of the period of life at which sexual maturity is attained, he says---

‘Hitherto the appearance of menstruation has been held to indicate this epoch in the life of a female; and allowing for the present that it does so in the great majority of cases, what evidence do we possess regarding the age at which menstruation commences in the females of this country? Sushruta, the Hindu sage and physician, lays down that the menstrual discharge begins after the twelfth year, and that is the age laid down for marriage by the great Hindu law-giver Manu. Dr. Allen Webb collected statistics on the subject, and the result, as stated in his Pathologia Indica, was that, “out of a list of 127 Hindu females, menstruation began only in six girls under twelve years of age; and as many of them did not again menstruate until a year after this---which they believed a first appearance---it is probable, as suggested by Babu Modusudan Gupta, that a ruptured hymen would better account for that.” I am not aware of any other statistics on this subject, but twelve years may, I think, be accepted as the earliest period of appearance of the menses, and probably thirteen would be a safe average. In England, fourteen years is held to be the most frequent age of menstruation, and it is held by the law to be a felony to have sexual intercourse with a girl below that age. Making all due allowance for climatic and racial differences, and bearing social customs in mind it would seem reasonable and right that the age of protection should be raised in this country from ten to twelve.'

"On the ground, therefore, that the age of twelve years approximately may be considered as the average age for consummation of marriage, both according to law and custom, on the one hand, and, on the other, as the lowest safe age as regards physical fitness, I venture to think that the line may be drawn at that age without doing violence to any respectable social usage, or to the religious law, of any portion of the community. And, though this age may be considered by some too low, it must be borne in mind that, while this amendment of the law will afford absolute legislative protection to girls up to the age of twelve years, the remedies of the existing law in regard to cases of brutality will remain available to girls above that age.

"Two other objections to the proposed amendment of the law remain to be considered. In the first place, it is feared that it may lead to the invasion of the privacy of families by the police, not so much for the detection of crime as for the purpose of extorting blackmail. I have found this apprehension so widely entertained that, whether it is justified or not, I think it deserves consideration. I therefore propose that offences by a man against his own wife under the amended section shall be non-cognizable, that is to say, that police-officers may not arrest without warrant, but proceedings must be taken by summons, and bail may be accepted. This concession, I hope, will remove all ground of alarm on this account.

"The other objection is that legislative action is not likely to have much direct result. This may be so; but for my part I shall be content if the effect of legislation is mainly educative—if it strengthens the hands of fathers of families for the protection of their daughters, and modifies custom so as to diminish the opportunities and incentives which are now afforded for indulgence in this pernicious practice. I cannot, moreover, forget that it was pointed out long ago by Dr. Chevers that the existing law has done mischief to those whose interests it was designed to protect, by fixing too low an age; and I agree with the late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in the opinion that though it may not be probable or even desirable that many cases will be brought into Court, yet, if the enforcement of the husband's rights upon a girl below twelve years of age is stigmatised by the law as rape, and it is publicly recognized that those who abet such assaults render themselves liable to punishment, a great improvement will surely be effected, not only in the condition of the class for whose protection the Bill is primarily designed but in the physical and social well-being of the people at large."

The Hon'ble Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter said:—"The proposed amendment of the exception to section 375 of the Indian Penal Code is likely to cause widespread discontent in the country. If it were necessary to protect child-wives from personal violence, or if it were not a departure from the wise and just policy of the Government not to interfere with the religious rites and duties of any portion of the subjects where such interference is not needed for the repression of crimes, or even if it had the effect of remedying to an appreciable degree the evils of early marriage, I should have been very glad to support it.

"So far as the protection of child-wives from personal violence is concerned, they are now sufficiently protected by the provisions of the existing criminal law.

"A husband under the existing law would be criminally liable for acts which constitute an offence of causing death by doing a rash or negligent act, of hurt simple and grievous or of assault against his wife, even if they were done with her consent if she be under twelve years of age. The existing law therefore affords sufficient protection to a wife under twelve years of age from violence from her husband.

"The proposed measure would be a departure from the wise and just policy of the Government referred to above, because it would interfere with the religious rites and duties of the orthodox Hindus. I desire to be understood that my observations here apply to the orthodox Hindus domiciled in Bengal Proper. Whether they apply to orthodox Hindus domiciled in other parts of the Empire I cannot say.

"In Bengal Proper the orthodox Hindus are guided by the interpretations of the Shasters given in Rughu Nundun Bhattacharja's Abrahambhatti Tantra. Whether these interpretations are correct or not is, I venture to think, a question with which legislators in this country should not concern themselves.

"So long as the orthodox Hindus continue to accept this work as containing a correct exposition of their Shasters, we must look to it to ascertain the views of the Shasters upon any particular subject. It is for the social and religious reformers to discuss whether or not the book in question interprets the Shasters correctly. It is upon this line that the question of the propriety of abolishing early marriage amongst the Hindus is being discussed now. But, as I have said, we must refer to this work to ascertain whether the proposed measure would or would not interfere with the religious rites and duties of the Hindus in certain cases.

"Rughu Nundun, in Sansar Tawtwa, treating of Garbadhan ceremony, lays down that the proper period of the consummation of the marriage is when the wife attains the age at which a certain well-known physical condition occurs, and the husband would commit a sin if he does not then consummate it. Now, in this country this physical condition is reached in certain cases before the age of twelve.

"In these cases the orthodox Hindu husbands, if the proposed amendment be adopted, would be placed in this dilemma—either they must break the law or disregard the injunctions of the Shasters. It is true that the hold of the Shasters upon the minds of the educated persons, at least so far as the ceremonial portion is concerned, has been to a great extent loosened, and many educated persons amongst the Hindus do not observe the Garbadhan ceremony in their families. But the proportion of such families to the strictly orthodox families in which it is observed is small. Although the former do not observe this ceremony in their families, still they disapprove of the present measure, because it is a departure from the non-interference policy hitherto observed by the Government and guaranteed by the great Proclamation of 1858, which says:—

'We do strictly charge and enjoin all those who may be in authority under Us, that they abstain from all interference with the religious belief or worship of any of Our subjects on pain of Our highest displeasure.'

"Then again although it is proposed to make the offence when committed by the husband upon his own wife under the amended section non-cognizable, still it would be liable to be abused and be a source of annoyance and molestation in some cases.

"In villages, where party strifes sometimes rage very high, it is not altogether improbable that a judicial officer might be induced to institute criminal proceedings under this section, his suspicion having been aroused by anonymous communications.

"According to the English law as hitherto laid down in decided cases, a husband cannot under any circumstance commit rape upon his own wife, though this proposition has been incidentally doubted in a recent case in which the particular question did not arise. I am not aware whether in any other civilized country a husband can be held guilty of rape upon his own wife.

"It is an offence which, having regard to the considerations upon which its criminality is founded, a husband should be held incapable of committing. Some of these considerations are obviously the preservation of female chastity and the prevention of indelible disgrace upon the husband and the family to which the outraged female belongs. These considerations cannot apply to a husband.

"It is an anomaly in the Indian Penal Code that a husband under certain circumstances may be guilty of rape upon his own wife. That provision is, however, a dead letter. Since 1860, when the Penal Code was passed, I am not aware of a single conviction under this part of section 375. If the amended section is also likely to prove a dead letter, there is no need for enacting it. If it be, on the other hand, effective in bringing about convictions, even in a small number of cases, the consequences of such convictions upon the marriage relation of the parties would be very deplorable. Could the marriage relation in these cases after the convictions be in any sense happy or cordial? Still the marriages, if they are Hindus, are indissoluble.

"If any amendment of the Code is needed for punishing an offender who is not the husband of the outraged girl, that may be easily done by substituting twelve for ten in the fifth clause of section 375. It is open to doubt whether, reading section 375 with section 90 of the Code, the age of consent as regards persons other than husbands is not already twelve years. But to remove this doubt there cannot be the slightest objection to any amendment which would raise the age of consent in these cases to twelve. But I venture to think that the proposed amendment regarding the husband's criminality would cause wide-spread discontent in the country and would be a departure from the policy to which I have referred in the beginning.

"The degree of discontent that is likely to be caused may be, to a certain extent, realized if we take a parallel case. Suppose in Great Britain an endeavour be made by legislation to enforce the custom of cremation instead of burial, on the ground that the former is far better from a sanitary point of view: what would be the state of the feeling of the people? It seems to me that legislation upon subjects like these must wait till the public opinion is sufficiently educated. In this connection I may be permitted to throw out a doubt that the proposed measure is likely to put back reformation in the marriage system of the Hindus, which was being slowly and silently effected. The orthodox and the advanced parties were gradually approaching to a common point of agreement. But the agitation in England has had a very baneful effect upon the prospects of the views of the two parties being reconciled to one another, and the proposed measure, I regret to say, would widen the breach still more.

"These are some of the consequences that I apprehend would follow from the proposed measure. On the other hand, no appreciable benefit would be gained thereby."

SONNET.

(From Quevedo.)

"Buscas en Roma à Roma, o peregrino !

Y en Roma misma a Roma no la hallas," &c.

Pilgrim, in Rome who seekest Rome, resign
The search, in Rome's self Rome is lost and gone :—
Her boasted walls are but a skeleton ;
In its own wreck self-tombed is Aventine ;—
The Imperial Palace strews its namesake-hill ;—
The medalled bronze, whereon her gravers traced
The line of Latin victors, age-effaced,
Confesses Time the greater conqueror still.
Tiber alone is left her :—but his tide
That erst a Queenly City girt, to-day
With mournful murmur round a grave complains.
Alas for Rome's lost beauty, pomp, and pride !
What seemed eternal long hath passed away,—
And what alone was fleeting still remains !

OH ! THE PLEASANT DAYS OF OLD !

Oh ! the pleasant days of old, which so often people praise—
True, they wanted all the luxuries that grace our modern days ;
Bare floors were strewn with rushes—the walls let in the cold ;
Oh ! how they must have shivered in those pleasant days of old !

Oh ! those ancient lords of old, how magnificent they were !
They threw down and imprisoned kings, to thwart them who might dare ;
They ruled their serfs right sternly ; they took from Jews their gold—
Above both law and equity were those great lords of old !

Oh ! the gallant knights of old, for their valor so renowned :
With sword and lance and armour strong, they scoured the country round ;
And whenever aught to tempt them, they met by wood or wold,
By right of sword they seized the prize—those gallant knights of old !

Oh ! the gentle dames of old, who quite free from fear or pain
Could gaze on joust and tournament, and see their champions slain ;
They lived on good beefsteaks and ale, which made them strong and bold ;
Oh ! more like men than women were those gentle dames of old !

Oh ! those mighty towers of old, with their turrets, moat, and keep,
Their battlements and bastions, their dungeons dark and deep ;
Full many a baron held his court within the castle hold,
And many a captive languished there, in those strong towers of old.

Oh ! the troubadours of old, with their gentle minstrelsie
Of hope and joy, or deep despair, whichever their lot might be—
For years they served their lady love ere they their passion told—
Oh ! wondrous patience must have had those troubadours of old !

Oh ! those blessed times of old, with their chivalry and state ;
I love to read their chronicles, which such brave deeds relate—
I love to sing their ancient rhymes, to hear their legends told—
But, Heaven be thanked ! I live not in those blessed times of old !

During Their Imperial Highnesses' visit to Calcutta they will attend a Service at the Greek Church.

THE Muslim Herald of Madras having come to an untimely end, we are glad to hail its resurrection as The Muhammadin. The identity is unmistakable. The latest issue to hand, that of the 16th instant, has its entire editorial matter occupied by a leading article of a column and a half headed, more alliteratively than to the purpose, "Myths and Majesties." Referring to the statement of a society paper that in sending the Czarewitch to travel to the East, the Czar, like a Bengali father, had enjoined on him to avoid hunting and other dangerous sports, and to its prompt correction, the writer argues that the said statement was a transparent fable which merited not the honour of a contradiction. If the folly was not worth contradicting, was the weakness of contradicting worth discussing and decanting upon, and, above all, the two-fold folly—the cumulative mistake—worth elaborately and at length chronicling?

SCIENCE is not yet up to extracting sunbeams from cucumbers. Meanwhile, a Japanese is reported to have invented a process—when his withdrawal several practical trials—for extracting cotton from straw. He offers with a given weight of straw to manufacture one half its weight of cotton. It was somewhere in or near the Empire of the Mikado, we believe, whence Capt. Gulliver passed into Laputa.

WHATEVER the superiority of France in other respects, in regard to legislation they order matters better in America, decidedly better in Canada, a British Colony, and still owing allegiance to a monarchy of the Old World, much behind the self-governing states in its neighbourhood. By the law of the Dominion, publicans are responsible to the wife of a habitual drunkard for tempting her husband. She can sue any vendor for damages who had supplied liquor to her husband after notice not to do so. A Mrs. Kirby has lately recovered $100 in the Supreme Court at Montreal.

THE Englishman lately published the following private letter from a young Bengali Brahman, son of a gentleman in the judicial service, to a friend in Calcutta.

"I was delighted beyond measure to receive your letter. It is so good of you, my dear fellow, to think of me. The life we lead in our country is the most shameful and degraded, when compared to that in England. We learn here to be truthful, honest, sincere, and polite. Every hour of an Indian's life in England is good. The morality here is as high as, in fact higher than, your zealot. Every woman is as free as any man, yet as severe and stern as Minerva. You cannot use the word 'shaving' in the company of ladies. It is the height of bad manners to talk loudly, or to gape at a lady, or to smoke in her presence. There are very few of our countrymen who have seen English life properly, and fewer still who know any decent family. Precisely after 9 o'clock at night does not give you the least shadow of an idea of the real English life and society. I shall tell you more by and by. A gentleman here is quite a distinct being from us. For God's sake do not be hypocrite. Teach your countrymen to be gentlemen, and you will be fully appreciated."

That is a good Brahman bhānchā—so good that he is good for nothing. His opinion is of no value whatever except against himself, as showing what a green-horn he is. He has not yet developed the use of his senses and wits. He is now in paradise. By and by he will feel the temperature around him, until he finds himself in the other place altogether. Both are situated in Great Britain.

THERE is a Lord of the castle and manor in the Vizagapatam District called the Raja of Kunpan, a place near Puvativur. His name (or that of his raj) has not travelled to these parts, but he is somebody in his and no mistake. Born about the year 1838, he succeeded to the Zamindari at 20 years of age and has held it for 33 years. Lately, his health has gone. For a whole twelvemonth, he has been suffering from a variety of complications until he despaired. During the latter half of his period, he has been occupied in meditating on the future of his family and estate and preparing his will. He has seen how the Court of Wards step into the management of estates and he has provided against undue interference. Accordingly, he held a public reception in his castle to make his Last Will and Testament in a way so as to preclude all question hereafter. Thus, before a large gathering of the respectability of the place including the officials (the Deputy-Tehsildar and the Sub-Registrar), he signed the Will after it was read out to the assembled guests. This is a departure, necessitated no doubt by circumstances. Will it succeed? When the dying entreaties of ruling chiefs are neglected, what hope?

AN avonant of the gentle sex is now performing in the East. The following appears in the Bombay Gazette :—

"On 24th ult. Miss Valerie Van Tassell accomplished a successful balloon ascent and parachute descent at Penang. Starting from a Chinese lawntennis ground she alighted eventually at a place about a mile distant. While on the upward track the lady performed a number of acrobatic feats such as hanging with her toe on to the trapeze bar attached to the parachute. At last she detached the parachute and dropped down at first at a terrific pace. The parachute gradually opened and she finished her descent gracefully and safely. She is said to have ascended to a height of above 4,000 feet. The effect of witnessing balloon ascents and parachute descents is not the same with different people. When Miss Van Tassell exhibited at Penang last month some curious incidents were reported. At the start a Malay actually dropped down, and others were seen with their knees tottering under them through fright, while more than half a dozen Chinese women were moved to tears at the sight."

By a recent order of the Madras Government, Deputy Collectors are required to possess a fair knowledge of two vernaculars and to pass the High Proficiency Test prescribed for uncovenanted officers in two vernacular languages of the Presidency. Formerly, it was not binding on a man to pass in the language of a district in which he was born. But it has been found necessary that he should not only have a colloquial knowledge of the language but also be able to read a manuscript. A Tamil Statutory Civilian failed in Tamil in the Lower Standard Examination.

UNDER the presidency of the Hon. Sir Raymond West, a meeting of the subscribers to the Indrag Memorial Fund was held, on the 16th December, in the Library of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society. The Hon'ble M. Javental Uniaschankar Yajnik, as one of the Secretaries, reminded the assembly that, on the death of the Pandit Bhagwanlal Indrag, a meeting was held, on the 15th August 1888, to commemorate him. In accordance with the resolution of that meeting, a subscription was started. Thus a respectable sum has been got of which Rs. 6,000 have been invested in the funds which yields an income of Rs. 300 per annum. Of this sum Rs. 250 will be expended on a gold medal in the Pandit's name to be awarded to the writer in English of the best essay on Indian epigraphy or paleography in the University, and the remainder Rs. 50 in printing and distributing the said essay. The meeting was called to audit the accounts and adopt the draft letter to be sent to the University. Mr. Yajnik referred to the names of the subscribers in proof of the wide recognition of the Pandit's worth :—

"Foremost and largest among the donors was his Highness the Nawab of Junaghad, which was the birthplace of the Pandit. His Highness gave a donation of Rs. 500. This was followed by Rs. 300 given by H. H. the Thakore Sahab of Bhownaggar and Rs. 200 by H. H. the Rao of Cutch; the private friends of the late Pandit, European and Indian, also contributed liberally. That the Pandit enjoyed a European reputation for epigraphy and scholarship was attested by the fact that European savants like Professor Emile Senart of Paris, Dr. Buhler of Vienna, Dr. Codrington of London, Professor Rendall of the British Museum, and Professor Lanman of the University of Massachusetts, U. S. of America, were among the subscribers to the fund. Nearer home the Hon'ble the Chairman of the meeting (Sir Raymond West), Lord Reay, late Governor of Bombay, Mr. J. M. Campbell, Mr. Fleet, the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Telang, Mr. Sorabjee Shapoorjee Bengalee, and other friends of the Pandit responded to the call.

The chairman was not to be so easily satisfied. The sum raised fell far short of his expectation.

"He had fully calculated on a much larger amount. It seemed to him that the Chiefs and grandees of Kattywar, who, when visiting Bombay, drove in carriages and fours, and spent considerable sums of money in displays of a comparatively unprofitable kind, might fairly have come forward more liberally in support of a movement intended to mark the worth and fruitful labours of a scholar who had done so much to elucidate the antiquities, archæology, and history of Kattywar, and to bring that province to the notice of the learned world. Yet, if somewhat disappointed at the poor result of the appeal made to the magnates of Kattywar for a substantial evidence of their local patriotism, as well as their interest in learning, it was satisfactory to him to know that the high merits of this earnest worker in archæology had been amply recognized outside the limits of that province, and that European and native gentlemen in Bombay, and scholars and archæologists in Europe and America, had testified to the importance and epigraphy (sic.) of the Pandit's services to their science by subscriptions to the fund. Pandit Bhagvanlal was a poor man, but by dint of ability, hard work, and perseverance he had risen to such eminence as a scholar as reflected lustre on his province and his country."

We quote from the minutes published in the Times of India. It must be a queer testimonial if the scholars and archæologists of Europe and America had testified to the importance and epigraphy of the Pandit Indrajī's services. Reporters are reporters all over—India. And "Subs" are not always careful.

It is said that in the late libel case of Mr. Marks, Sir Charles Russell received a retainer of a thousand guineas and a refresher of five hundred guineas a day.

THE next opium sale takes place on the 2nd February, when 2,250 Patna and 2,500 Ghazepore chests will be offered.

OUR friend the late third Judge of the metropolitan Court of Small Causes in his retirement is as active as ever. He not only leads his young hopefuls to all public places and occasions but manfully keeps himself before the world. At the very first sitting of the Police Commission he was in attendance to give them the benefit of his experience and views. He plainly told them that "the Police Service is so corrupt that respectable people have hitherto held aloof from it." He suggested the raising of the pay of the several grades as the only way to make it honest.

And our friend has already suffered for his public spirit. The atrocious Police and Police Commission! They have robbed him of his nationality and changed his very name. His people will not know him as Babu Kunje Behari Lal. Oh! how will old Mrs. Kunjo Lal Banerjee recognise his dear Brahman in his nominal guise of an Agarwala or a Lahore Rora!

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE most intense and unprecedented frost still envelopes Europe. Many railways are blocked with snow. The rivers Seine and Rhone, the harbour of Toulon and the Lakes Constance and Geneva are all hard frozen over. Such was the telegram of the 19th. The distress is so great that the French Chamber voted six million francs for the relief of the sufferers by frost and snow. A later message, that of the 21st, however, brings the cheering news that the day before there was a rise in temperature and a complete thaw had set in throughout Great Britain.

PARLIAMENT reassembled after Christmas on the 22nd. Sir John Gorst announced in the House of Commons that on Monday following he would introduce the Indian Councils' Bill.

THE Chilean revolution thickens. There is disaffection in the Army which had been staunch to the Government. A portion has joined the Navy in preparation for vigorous action. The several foreign Powers in Chile—the British, French and American—too are preparing—for the protection of their respective subjects. Men-of-war have been ordered there. The disturbance is attributed by the President to the Congress which he accuses of violating the constitution. The extremity is such that the President has taken the whole direction in his own hands. The rebels at Entre Rios were, however, at landing at Coquimbo, met by the Government troops and disarmed. The insurgents are nevertheless on the increase. They have occupied Pisagua.

THE telegrams still speak of the strikes on the Scotch railways. On the 18th, five thousand strikers held a demonstration at Edinburgh. They were not unruly. The Provost of Edinburgh and Council of Magistracy have appealed to the Board of Trade for intervention in the interests of both passengers and traffic.

THE aged American historian George Bancroft is dead.

THE vacancy in the Privy Council caused by the death of Sir Barnes Peacock has been filled up by the appointment of Sir James Hannen, as one of the Lords of Appeal. But who will do his work as the paid Councillor?

THE English Navy estimates include a large increase in the number of boys for training.

THE German Government has recalled from Africa Major Wissmann who is understood to have gone wrong in the head.

THERE is a public demand for amending the Free Coinage Bill in the American House of Representatives limiting the silver coined to American productions. There was a mass meeting to that effect at Boston which concluded with an appeal to the President to veto the Bill unless so amended.

THE Japanese Houses of Parliament have been destroyed by fire. They were wooden, we believe, and frail, like every belonging of the quick-witted, versatile, and volatile people—the French of the Far East. They have bodily introduced among them many of the institutions of the West. Is there no provision for an efficient Fire Band? The imperial Romans early saw the value of it in urban life. There is in the Letters of the younger Pliny a communication to the Emperor for permission to institute a Fire Service in a town in Asia. But the Romans were substantial builders. In Eastern Asia where wood is the principal material for building, where princes and noblemen are content with painted and gilded shanties, the Fire Band is an indispensable institution.

THERE was a post mortem on the dead body of the Duke of Bedford before cremation. The verdict of the Jury was that His Grace committed suicide by shooting himself while in a state of temporary insanity brought on by pain and weakness.

THE Kotwal of Cabul, Naib Sultan, is in a bad way. He had been suspended some time ago on suspicion of malversation and reinstated. He has now definitely been dismissed from office and is in durance vile, indeed chained and cuffed, and undergoing daily torture to make him disgorge the nine lacs of public money his accounts show him to have embezzled. His house was searched and jewellery to the value of one lac was, it is said, discovered and sequestered.

THE fatuous barbarism of settling a dispute or righting a wrong by single combat, though pretty nearly obsolete in England, flourishes still on the Continent. Even in this century—within living memory—diplomats of the highest position and even ministers of state fought. Now, however, the higher classes at any rate have abjured the vile practice. Christendom is far from purged, though. Continental literary men and young bloods of quality are not ashamed to call out others—perchance their friends once—to mortal conflict. If they are ashamed of anything, it is to decline an invitation to bloodshed and—shall we say, murder? We are glad to notice at length symptoms of a changed sentiment on the subject. Here is an exhibition of this custom showing it on the decline.

Count Lutzow, Secretary to the Austrian Embassy at London, felt himself insulted by the Austrian Ambassador Count Deym not inviting the newly married Countess Lutzow to the Embassy or calling upon her with the Countess Deym. The Secretary thereupon challenged the Ambassador to duel. It was fought at Vienna, with swords. It was no Indian sword and neither party was injured. If the duel ended in a farce, honor was vindicated. It was agreed that the Countess Deym would in future receive Countess Lutzow. What a simple and wise way to arrive at a momentous result!

STRIKES are the order of the day. The infection has passed from men to angels—of courtesy. The go-ahead gals have sounded the tocsin of war. The American brides have struck—wearing wedding rings. They'll none of it. Not wedding but wedding-rings. They are scarcely to be blamed, good souls! Their moderation is charming. They do not even claim the right of the sex to be unreasonable. They are for absolute fair-play and no more. Trained in the creed of the Constitution, and devoted to the principles of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, they only seek to practise their principles. They are for treating gander and goose with the same sauce. They look upon the wedding-ring as the badge of their tribe—a humiliating sign of subjection of the sex. If not, why is it confined to one sex? Only on one condition will they submit to it, namely, that they share it with the males. In the face of the distinction, it is a mockery to call wives the "better halves." In point of fact, they are the despised halves. But they will not be bamboozled any longer. No more wedding-rings—badges of the slavery of marriage—for brides, unless bridegrooms too carry them! Who shall resist that contention? The ladies have the authority of the highest literature on their side. Bassanio received from Portia a ring which he wore and his friend Gratiano too got and wore a ring given him by his Nerissa.

Of course, in go-ahead America the grey mare is the better and more powerful horse, and the males have submitted unconditionally. It is becoming the fashion for gentlemen to wear wedding-rings. This is the beginning, of course. More changes must follow, to complete the emancipation of woman and establish the full equality of the sexes. Both must share the petticoat and coiffure and bonnet. By way of a beginning, gentlemen must bore their long manly ears for receiving jewellery so that their good ladies may sport ear-rings.

SIR William Moore, K.C.I.E., of 15, Portland Place, the fashionable Physician, is the subject of No. VIII of the Times of India's sketches of "Anglo-Indian Celebrities at Home." The author of the standard "Family Medicine in India" and of the learned treatise on "Tropical Climates and Indian Diseases" was one of the prominent lights in the profession in India, and may now be regarded as the Doyen of our Doctors. Dr. Moore first distinguished himself in the service in Rajpootana where he was long employed.

NAWAB Abdool Luteef Khan has had a relapse. He continues under the treatment of Dr. Sanders and Baboo Sarvadhikari.

We may in this connection mention that the famous physician of Delhi, Hukeem Mahmood Khan, the Galen of the East, the greatest practitioner of Greek medicine, arrived by train on Thursday morning, on purpose to see his sick friend Nawab Abdool Luteef. People of all conditions have been going to see the Nawab all this time, but this is a distinction which seldom falls to the lot of even princes. The Hukeem Sahib is not to be moved for lucre, and this is the first we have known him propelled by love.

ONE of the most interesting domestic occurrences of the New Year in the Press is the birth of a newspaper in Gorakhpur. It is a mean looking little brat, the new-comer, but withal promising. It is a missionary enterprise and no credit as such, being an ill-printed piece of rag, on which any price is preposterous. Rs. 4 or in advance Rs. 3 annually for a weekly scrap of wrapping paper like this from an obscure station will, we are afraid, be deemed by most men an exorbitant demand. Even their little space the conductors are not able to fill. It is not creditable to the projectors that the literary management should be at a loss for matter at the very outset. The difficulty obtrudes itself in the second issue, the one which is before us. This number is made up with a frivolous letter to the editor apparently written at the office "while the boy waits," which, after all, falling short of the required length, has been spread out with the help of blank spaces. The formal arrangement of the concern, however, bespeaks a head—for "heads" in special, in the press sense. We have first the general news of the day condensed under "Brief News." Under "The Latest Intelligence" follow the telegrams. Then comes the editorial matter, consisting of occasional notes, under the rather queer head "What We Say. Multum in parvo," winding with notices "Local and Provincial," the whole ending in "Correspondence," which by analogy should be called "What Others Write to Us." Accompanying the paper is a flyleaf containing the prospectus, to which, not having seen the first number of the publication, we naturally turn for the justification of the Gorakhpur Chronicle and for its policy. It is written in unquestionable English, itself no mean distinction in the Indian press, overflowing as it does with all sorts of ventures by Indians, Eurasians, Europeans and even Americans of no education. The writing is not very careful, and, besides, it fails to make out a case. We are told at the outset—

"The want, that has now come to be keenly felt in every centre of real enlightenment (sic.) and progress, is a sufficient excuse for us to venture upon the undertaking which we are going to announce herein to the reading public."

This long-winded sentence is not promising in a literary way. It has the more serious fault of not conveying much meaning, beyond a vague suggestion that Gorakhpur is a centre of real enlightenment and progress. It certainly begs the entire question, both as to the focus of "real enlightenment and progress" and to the "want that has now come to be keenly felt." The Prospectus proceeds at a longer stretch—

"As long as the railway did not exist, our district properly found a place in the category of the most out-of-the-way corners of the country; but now, that by means of the speediest (sic.) modes of communications (sic.) we are daily brought in contact with the people of the east, the north and the west, we may safely try to assert ourselves in the great commercial and intellectual activity going on around us, and no better, cheaper and easier medium for this than what the genius of the West has already (sic.) devised for us in the shape of a newspaper."

The matter is scarcely improved. That argument makes against the project. With improved communication with the outside world, there is less need for a local newspaper. But then the projectors are not satisfied with the existing Press of the land. They will supply the right article. Then the usual policy of strict impartiality with unwavering loyalty to the crown and sympathy for all races is declared.

To return to the contents of the number before us, our new contemporary is "disappointed that the Honours' list contains so few names of our own Provinces. We would have feign observed among the recipients, the names of such men as Rajah Mahammad Ali Khan of Sultanpur, distinguished by not a few acts of public interest; Kuar Harnam Singh Ahluwalia, our own Rai Bahadur Durga Prasad, the distinguished Arabic scholar Mr. Howell and many others; but we hope that the merits of other claimants will be duly considered when the next list appears on the 24th May next."

The following is more to the purpose:—

"People are apt to hold Government, to a certain extent, responsible for the corruptions which prevail so largely in the police department. In almost every district there are a number of 3rd class police stations which are placed in charge of head constables of various grades. The maximum pay of a first grade head constable is Rs. 24-7-8 exclusive of extra deductions on account of new brand shoes and other appendages of constabulary. Now, we speak from experience of our own district, that a head constable in charge of a police station cannot do otherwise than keep a horse or a pony. Others who prefer to lead a high life generally keep two horses. The ordinary expenses of feeding and keeping of a horse do not fall short of Rs. 16 a month. Thus, how a man on Rs. 14-7-8 placed in charge of a police station, as is to be found in a majority of cases, can keep a horse and at the same time his body and soul together, without having recourse to illicit incomes, is a mystery which can only be explained by official apologists."

"In Bengal where prosecutions are so frequent, the investigating head constables on Rs. 9-7-8 also, keep a horse. It is a wonder, how they manage to afford a luxury which is not enjoyed by subordinate officers of the revenue department who are better paid."

We trust the Police Commission will be able to solve the mystery.

THE wilder parts of Gorakhpur and Oudh, particularly towards the Terai, have, from the point of view of the naturalist or anthropologist, been always an interesting region. First worked by Sleeman, the mine has yielded treasures to a succession of inquirers. None of them, however, that we remember even noticed the fact mentioned by our new contemporary in the following paragraph:—

"Wild cats are rather numerous in some parts of the district. Perhaps it's not generally known that they attack children with a view to carry them off and eat them—small children—Two such cases have recently occurred—In one instance a cat seized the child by the leg, and but for the timely arrival of the mother would have carried it off and in the other the child was seized by the head and dragged away, some distance, when it was rescued—one eye was totally destroyed.

A woman who was working in a field was attacked by a jackal which lacerated her fearfully about the face and mouth—the animal was evidently rabid."

We have often read and heard of the depredations of wolves in that part, but this is the first time we learn that cats are so formidable. Is it possible that wild cats have been mistaken for wolves, or wolves confounded with wild cats? Specimens should be forwarded to the Indian Museum for verification.

Thus, there is promise in the paper, and we are glad to welcome it as a brother.

THE Bill for raising the age of consent was, at yesterday's Council, referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to report within five weeks. The Committee consist of the Law Member, the Home Member, the Hon'ble Mr. Bliss and three out of the four native members, namely, the Hon'ble Khan Bahadar Muhammad Ali Khan, the Hon'ble Rao Bahadar K. L. Nulkar, and the Hon'ble Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter. The excepted Hon'ble Nawab Ahsan-Ulla was the only member who spoke on the reference. He spoke little and that little in support of the bill. The majority of the learned members of his community he had ascertained to favor the Government proposal, and the majority of the Mahomedans in Eastern Bengal whence he comes will regard it favourably. The bill will not, he said, interfere with Mahomedan religion. Those of his co-religionists who are of a different opinion with himself, regard the measure as the thin end of the wedge and an earnest of Government interference with the religion of Mahomet. But the President's speech on the previous occasion had greatly allayed that fear.

THE Hindu opposition gains strength. Already, meetings have been held in Calcutta and in parts of Bengal. There has of course been a good deal of wire-pulling, and the most unfounded statements regarding the Bill and exaggerated pictures of the effects of its passing into law, all by uninformed writers and speakers, with not a few calumnies against Government and suspicions respecting its aims, have been sown broadcast, with the inevitable result. Nevertheless, the feeling is not wholly antagonistic in Bengal. There is a strong minority of those who really wish to purge their society of evil practices and to protect the girlhood of the land from molestation before time, who see not much harm in the legislature that imposed the limit of ten years raising that limit by two years, and who smile at the appanion of the Garbadhan—a custom which has been always more honored in the breach than in the observance—which has been conjured up to affright the rulers and the ruled. For all that, there is no doubt that even among these, there is an under current of distrust of the working of the measure and horror of Government interference in matters social and domestic.

Nor are the Mahomedans so satisfied with the measure. The brief speech of Nawab Ahsanullah, though meant in support of the Bill does not really make for it. It was evident that the Nawab counted without his Islamite host. The Mahomedans, though in advance of the Hindus in civilization, are even more conservative than they. The Hon'ble Nawab Saheb spoke as a reformer rather than a representative. On the whole, we are disposed to think the Bill will have to be withdrawn.

AFTER visiting the great cities and sights of Upper India, the Czarewitch comes to Calcutta on Monday. Heir to the largest Empire under the sun and travelling in propria persona—indeed, for the matter of that, in state—he commands deference wherever he goes, while his manners and accomplishments inspire a finer regard. In India, he is not only the representative of Power but also of the Ally of England. He is, above all, an honoured relation of our sovereign. We respectfully bid His Imperial Highness welcome.

In view of the Imperial visit to this great Empire and historic land, we open this number with a Sonnet of Quevedo's done into English by an English writer. What the Spaniard sung of Rome applies with equal truth to India. At Delhi in especial, and at Agra, His Imperial Highness must have forcibly been struck by similar sentiments. The other piece of poetry is a ballad exhumed from an old Bentley's Miscellany more than forty years old. It will not be inappropriate to the present agitation in Native Indian society. It is this suitability to the hour that excuses our placing these pieces under the head of "Contemporary Poetry."

THE HINDU LAW OF CONSUMMATION AND THE BENGAL SCHOOL OF INTERPRETATION.

FROM the text of Yama cited with approval in Raghunandan's Udvaha Tatwa, (Serampore edition, p. 26.)

Kanya dwadasabarsani ja pradatta grihe baset

Brahmahatyā pitu stasya sā kanyā barayet svayam, it appears that if a girl be allowed to live in her father's house for 12 years, without being given in marriage, then only the father incurs sin. In practice also, the marriage of girls in their 12th year is quite usual, even among orthodox Hindus. Now, if the father does not incur any sin by so delaying the marriage of his daughter, the inference seems reasonable that the husband does not incur any sin by not consummating his marriage, under any circumstances, before his wife has completed her 12th year.

It is true that consummation is imperative immediately after Ritu. But it seems that the word, as used in the texts dealing with the subject under consideration, is not exactly equivalent to menstruation. In fact, it is defined by all the authorities as the time when the wife is in a fit condition for pregnancy. Raghunandan, in his Sanskar Tatwa, says that Ritu means Praja janana jogya kala, the literal rendering of which would make it "the time for giving birth to a child." The definitions in the commentaries of Medhatithi, Kulluka and Nandana with reference to verse 45, Chapter III. of Manu's Code, support the same view. A girl of 12 years can, in no case, be reasonably presumed to be in a fit state for being enciente. Such being the case, it is quite open to question whether a Hindu is justified in observing the Garbhādhān ceremony upon the appearance of menstrual symptoms in his wife before the completion of her 12th year. According to a well-known maxim* of Hindu jurisprudence, intense probability is equivalent to certainty. At the age of 12, the probability is certainly very strong that consummation will not be followed by conception. On these grounds, it seems reasonable to hold that, in cases of premature development, the performance of Garbhādhān immediately after the appearance of the menses, is not only not obligatory, but is positively sinful.

The texts which lay down that consummation is imperative immediately after Ritu, ought to be so interpreted as to make them harmonise with the text of Yama, which makes the 12th year the maximum limit of the proper age for the marriage of girls. By so doing, the conclusion is arrived at that the husband does not, under any circumstances, incur sin by not consummating his marriage on his wife before the completion of her 12th year. This view is not only not inconsistent with the law as laid down by Raghunandan, but derives additional support from his definition of the term Ritu. It is true that the Pandits of the country have hitherto accepted as correct a different interpretation. But that fact alone does not entitle it to be regarded as beyond question. If it is unsupported by authority, it must be rejected—the more so as it brings upon the Rishis the odium of having enjoined upon their followers the performance of acts, which, in some cases, must lead to one of the most heinous crimes, namely, the killing of a female.

* Vide Raghunandan's Tithi Tatwa. Serampore edition, p. 6.

As to whether the Garbhadhan ceremony is obligatory or optional, there are passages in the Mitakshera and in the Sanskara Tatva which may be taken to support the position that all the Sanskars are imperative. Marriage and investiture with the sacred thread are no doubt obligatory ceremonies. But there is nothing in the Sanhitas of the Rishis to support the view that the other ceremonies are binding also. On the contrary, the following texts point to the conclusion that they are optional. Yagyavalkya says,

"Thus by the performance of these ceremonies is the taint of seed and womb removed."

Angira says,

"As a portrait attains completeness gradually by the several limbs being successively painted, so is Brahminism in its complete form attained by the performance of the several purificatory ceremonies."

There is not a single text which contains any clear indication* from which it can be concluded that any sin is incurred by the non-performance of ceremonies like Garbhadhan, Punshaban, Shimantonyan, &c. There are texts no doubt which declare that sin is incurred by not approaching the wife after the Ritu. But the Sanskars other than marriage and investiture are nowhere declared to be obligatory. Even supposing that the Garbhadhan is a ceremony which must be performed at the proper time, still the interpretation suggested above would render its performance necessary only after the 12th year.

With reference to the text which says that at the age of ten an unmarried girl is called Rajashwala, Kashiram, in his commentary on Raghunandan's Udvaha Tatva, says that a maiden of ten years is called a Rajashwala but is not necessarily so as a matter of fact. It cannot therefore be contended that a father incurs any sin by not marrying his daughter at the age of ten. There is no reason whatever to suppose that, in the text of Rajmartanda cited in the Udvaha Tatva, p. 27, the word Rajashwala is used in the secondary sense given to it by the text of Angira which is to the effect—

*Ashtavarsa bhabet Gouri nava varsā tu Rohini
Dvadasame Kanyaka Prokta atā udhum Rajashwalā†*

It is a well known rule of interpretation, that the same word cannot be taken to denote both its primary and its secondary meaning in the same passage.

Pandit Sasadhar Tarkachuramani, in his recently published pamphlet "The Rites of Garbhádhan," cites the authority of Raghunandan in support of the position that all the Sanskars are imperative. He might have cited the Mitakshera also for the same purpose. But, so far as we can see, he does not quote a single Sanhita text from which it can be concluded that the ceremonies other than marriage and investiture with the thread are obligatory.

With regard to the passages wherein Vigyaneshwar and Raghunandan declare that the Sanskars are nitya, it may be said that they predicate this only with reference to upanayana and marriage. It is to be noted here that no form of expiation is prescribed anywhere for non-performance of ceremonies like Garbhádhan, Shimantonyan, Punshaban, &c. There is a penance for not approaching the wife at the proper season. But that is a different matter altogether.

Pandit Churamani, in his concluding remarks, lays great stress upon custom and immemorial practice.

* As to what these indications are, vide Raghunandan's Ekadasi Tatva, p. 63.

† At the eighth year a maiden is called Gouri, at the ninth she is called Rohini, at the tenth her designation is Kanyaka, after that she is Rajashwalā.

But he ought to know that the performance of ceremonies prescribed by custom can never be obligatory. That such is the case will appear clear from the discussion with reference to the Holakadhikarana in Sreekishen's commentary on the Daya-bhaga. It may be said that the Garbhadhan ceremony is prescribed by the Shasters, and does not rest upon custom only like Hooli. But as a Sanskar it could be regarded as imperative, only if it appeared to be based upon Sanhita texts, declaring that its non-performance was sinful, or containing such clauses as "always" "throughout life," "never to be disregarded," &c. However, in the view which we take as to the proper age for Garbhadhan, the question whether it is nitya or kamya is not of much importance for our present purpose.

From the use of the words nava pushpotsab in some of the Mantras for celebrating the Garbhadhan ceremony, Pandit Sasadhar argues, that the time for its performance is the first occurrence of menstruation. Supposing that the words have the meaning that he gives to them, it does not necessarily follow that they lead to the conclusion which he draws from them, for, he must admit that in case of the husband's absence, illness or incapacity at the time of the wife's first menses, the ceremony may be performed on a subsequent occasion. In fact, the purport of Mantras is no safe guide for enabling us to determine what our duties are. For instance, in the Mantras prescribed for utterance in making sacrificial offerings to the gods, the following passage occurs:—

From this it is not certainly to be concluded that no inferior animal can be offered as a sacrifice to the gods. Nor is it to be inferred from the singular number in which the word nara is used, that a larger number of animals than one may not be sacrificed on any one occasion. Vide Raghunandan's Tithi Tatva, p. 52.

Again, for instance, in the mantras for the solemn rites, the following words occur:—

Naram panchatwamagamam.†

On this ground is it to be concluded that the ritual does not apply to females, or that females cannot die at all?

The truth is that Mantras are generally so worded as to be adapted to the most important and the most usual cases. According to some authorities, the wording of Mantras may be changed to suit special cases. But the leading commentators whose opinion we follow, prescribe the utterance of the same Mantras in all cases even where their purport may not be applicable to the actual event or state of things.

After what is stated above, it need hardly be observed that from the use of the words nava pushpotsab in the Garbhádhan Mantras, the conclusion does not follow that the ceremony must be performed immediately after first menstruation in all cases. If the thirteenth year is the proper time for Garbhádhan even in cases of premature development, the Mantras prescribed for it may well be used when the ceremony is actually performed, whether the occasion is first menstruation or a later one.

Some of the texts cited in Pandit Churamani's pamphlet clearly support the view, that the proper season for celebrating the Garbhádhan is the time when the physical constitution of the wife is sufficiently developed, so that she may be reasonably supposed to be fit for becoming pregnant. The text of Sankhya quoted in page 16 of the pamphlet says,

*Garbhayashya sphutata gnyāne nishekalā parikirtita.

This text certainly does not ordain that the ceremony must be performed on the occurrence of the first menstruation.

JOGENDRA NATH BHATTACHARJEE.

THE LITERATURE AND DRAMA OF THE WEEK.

THE Corinthian Theatre will be remembered for its steady efforts to interest and amuse the higher taste of the public. If it in any degree failed to interest or amuse, so much the worse for the public. Never has Calcutta had such high acting of the greatest dramas as the Miln company gave in this theatre. If tragedy did not draw, they played comedy. If the elder drama fell flat or palled, they played a Nineteenth Century novel of sensation. There was provision for puritans as well as play-goers. Last Sunday, Mr. Miln again appeared in the character of a Lecturer. He was as impressive in this rôle as in that of an actor. His subject was The Church and Stage as Friendly Forces. In treating it, Mr. Miln made a masterly vindication of the theatre. So far from its being the devil's own, it was intimately connected with the pulpit. Although now divorced from religion, the stage was religious in its origin in every country. The priests were the first players. The Lecturer heaped derision upon the narrow-minded clergy and other fanatics who proscribed the drama. He treated with deserved scorn the myth of Hell-fire and the doctrine of eternal damnation and suffering. He showed conclusively how groundless were the charges against the morality of the stage, and went far to show how it was capable of improving the minds and morals of people. He exposed the unwarrantable pretensions and condemned the methods of the Church. Having been himself a clergyman, and an eminent preacher into the bargain, he spoke with perfect mastery of both sides of his theme. The lecture was enlivened with many anecdotes. Among the best were those disclosing his intimate relations with eminent clergymen, including right reverend prelates. Not the least interesting were those affording glimpses of the remarkable man who, a popular preacher, gave up his sacred calling from scruples of conscience—being unable to master the difficulties of the Creed—to enter the loathed-by-many profession of a player, and quickly rose to be a great actor. A Yankee by birth, and educated, we believe, at Princeton, he received his subsequent and most valuable training under the friendly guidance of the late Henry Ward Beecher, whom he called the greatest orator of his time. In that burst of affectionate eulogy, perhaps Mr. Miln did some unconscious injustice to another of his countrymen, the late Wendell Phillips. To our mind, judging of course entirely from recorded eloquence, the latter surpassed in force, fervour and pathos every speaker of English words in our generation. Mr. Phillips's impassioned appeal in behalf of poor John Brown, read by us in the closet many years ago, still rings in our mind. Whittier's exquisite lyrics we have pretty nearly forgotten. Dr. Henry Ward Beecher's range was far greater, no doubt. For one thing, he overflowed with vivacity, while Phillips was deficient in humour.

On Tuesday, Macbeth was again played with the old success, and even better. The one point to which we had ventured to take exception, was rectified and the whole representation was without a flaw. Mr. Miln, however, was not the same on this evening that he was on previous occasions. Following the example of the growth of the mind and art of the great Poet in his various works, he not only deviates from the beaten track but also does not scruple to depart from himself in his endeavours to demonstrate each salient situation and idea. He is ever essaying new methods to bring the conception of the author home to his audience. So, on this occasion he showed his perfect grip of his character by a slight deflection, as in the murder scene, but he departed not in the least from Nature, and was as forcible as ever. His power of face, aided no doubt with paint, is extraordinary. The change of Macbeth's countenance kept pace with the development of the action and the deterioration of character, giving the lie direct to the misgiving, prophetic as it turned out, of the doomed Duncan, There's no art

To find the mind's construction in the face :

The key to the success of the actor is his unswerving attention to the remark of Lady Macbeth

Your face, my Thane, is as a book where men

May read strange matters :

First we beheld the fair, open, transparent visage of the brave Thane. Presently the dream of ambition, and anon the wavering of a yet uncompromised soul, shadowed his broad brow. His mind made up, however, imparts a sunshine to the forehead, but it is momentary. Soon the clouds gather and continue, with little occasional breaks, to the bitter end. Throughout, one has but to see the dreamy scowling face to understand the fire that is consuming the brave bad man, whose baser nature had surrendered his destiny to the promptings of three infernal spirits. Miss Kate Douglas as usual made a good Lady Macbeth, and Mr. Montgomery a spirited Macduff.

For the rest of the week, the company played Sir Walter Scott's Rob Roy as dramatised by Pocock. This play with its English and Scotch songs and Highland reels, including the inevitable bagpipe, has caught the general taste. Night after night has Calcutta been charmed with it. Mr. Miln was a striking Rob Roy. His disguise was perfect. Who ever suspected that the intellectual delineator of Shakespeare's heroes was such a broad-shouldered, deep-chested athlete? Nor did his voice give assurance of his personality. That the great actor of Shylock will represent with impressive vividness the revenge of the outlaw MacGregor, goes without saying, and we are not surprised to hear that Rob Roy has, in America and Australia, been always esteemed among his best impersonations.

Mr. Wilmot Eyre who had to sustain the trying part of Francis Osbaldistone, acquitted himself with great credit. Mr. Nunn's Rashleigh Osbaldistone was excellent. Mr. J. Stark as the Bailie Nicol Jarvie was charming.

The company's season draws to a close. They are here up to Friday next the 29th instant. They have not yet exhausted their répertoire. They will not leave without playing Lord Lytton's famous dramas Richelieu and the Lady of Lyons. It must be interesting to see Mr. Miln as Richelieu and as Melnotte. The season will close on Friday with Mr. Miln's benefit. We hope, after all his sacrifices for their amusement, the generous inhabitants of Calcutta will make some amends on that evening.

THE CALCUTTA UNIVERSITY IN CONVOCATION.

IN our opening page we have spoken of the Convocation in the future tense. While the printer was at work with that part of our paper, the great educational ceremony was going on in our Latin Quarter. The Viceroy, who is ex-officio Chancellor of the Calcutta University, was on arrival received at the foot of the stairs by the Vice-Chancellor, the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Gurudas Banerjee. His Excellency entered the robing-room and, putting on his Chancellorial habiliments, issued forth to head the procession of the Fellows to the Hall. There Lord Lansdowne took possession of his academic throne, supported on one side by his Vice and on the other by his Lieutenant of the Province. (It is not always that Viceroys assert themselves in this sphere. We remember seeing one sitting without gown below the dais while the Vice-Chancellor occupied the highest seat of honor and authority.) With his permission, the Vice-Chancellor opened the Convocation. Then the important business of conferring degrees commenced and dragged its slow length along. In the absence of organization, the process was slower than it might be. Nor was it enlivened by the rather rowdy demonstrations incident to such gatherings in England. For once, however, when the sweet girl graduates stepped forward for the dues of their proficiency, the sluggish Bengali graduates of the male gender burst into applause that reminded Oxonians and English visitors of the scenes in the Sheldonian Theatre. That business disposed of, His Excellency the Chancellor, rose amid loud cheers, and spoke as follows :—

"MR. VICE-CHANCELLOR, YOUR HONOUR, LADIES & GENTLEMEN :—

Let me, in the first place, express the pleasure which it gives me once more to meet the Members of the Convocation. They will allow me to wish them a happy new year and to express my hope that it may bring nothing but prosperity to the University and to all who are connected with it. On these occasions our thoughts naturally turn to the year which we have just left behind. It was marked by one incident which has attracted much public attention, and which possesses a painful interest for us. I need not tell you that I refer to the case of the Ripon College and the serious irregularities which were discovered in connection with it. The subject is one which I would gladly pass by without notice, but it would be the merest affectation on my part to ignore it, and as the question was one which was referred to the Government of India—one, moreover, in which our action, or perhaps I should say our inaction, provoked a good many comments, I feel that I am called upon to say one or two words in reference to it.

I do so, not for the purpose of reviving controversies which have been laid to rest, but merely because I am extremely anxious that the attitude observed by the Government of India should not be misconstrued.

Upon one point there will be no dispute. The facts which were brought to light beyond all question disclosed irregularities of the gravest kind—irregularities discreditable to the institution immediately concerned, and indirectly reflecting discredit upon the University, to which the College is affiliated. I wish to take this opportunity of placing on record my strong condemnation of those practices, and I say without hesitation that, if we could have brought ourselves to believe that the authorities of the University were likely to tolerate or to connive at such practices, the intervention of the Government of India would have become inevitable.

It is, however, most important that we should remember how the case stood when it came before us. The question had been dealt with in the first instance by the Syndicate, which may, I think, be properly described as being for ordinary purposes the Executive body of the University—a body which, as I understand your constitution, derives its authority from the Senate, and acts under its mandate. But when the case came before the Government of India we found that the Senate, acting within its rights, had taken the matter out of the hands of the Syndicate and was still engaged in dealing with it itself. The question which we had to decide was therefore not so much whether the stronger measures proposed by the Syndicate, or the milder courses which found favour with the Senate, best met with the requirements of the case, as whether, while the Senate was still dealing with the question, which undoubtedly concerned it, the Government of India ought to intervene and, upon the assumption that the University was not fit to be trusted to deal adequately with the case, resort to a kind of coup d'état which would have had the effect of, for the moment, superseding Senate and Syndicate alike. We felt that under these circumstances we could not, while the matter was still sub judice, without dealing a blow at the authority of the University, take the matter out of its hands. (Applause.)

I am glad to hear that the persons responsible for the administration of the Ripon College have been able to satisfy the University authorities, including the Members of the Syndicate, that they have taken adequate precautions against the recurrence of such deplorable incidents (applause), and the question has been disposed of in, and by the University, and without the intervention of the Government—an intervention which must always be contemplated as possible in an extreme case, but which should, I feel no doubt, be resorted to as rarely as possible.

The incident has been a most regrettable one, but I trust that it will serve as a lesson not only to those immediately concerned, but to all who are in any way connected with the educational system of which this University is the head. The University owes it not only to itself, but to every institution connected with it, and to every student whose hopes are centred here, to uphold scrupulously the standard of truth and morality from which so reprehensible a departure was made upon the occasion of which I am speaking.

The Vice-Chancellor, in concluding the discussion which took place on the 8th September, referred in weighty words to this sacred obligation, and I am glad to have this opportunity of expressing my entire adhesion to what then fell from him. (Applause.)

Before I sit down I should like to refer for one moment to another matter of interest to the University—a matter of which I can speak without any misgivings or regrets.

When I last had the pleasure of meeting you I mentioned my desire to see the Fellowships of the University conferred upon somewhat different principles to those which had previously governed the selection, and I intimated my readiness to consider, when the next series of vacancies came to be filled up, the names of one or two gentlemen submitted to me by the Graduates of the University for this high distinction. I have been able to fulfil my pledge, and a few weeks ago the Graduates were given an opportunity of making their selection. (Applause.) They have done so, and they have put before me the names of two gentlemen, Babu Jogindra Chandra Ghose and Babu Mohendra Nath Ray. I have ascertained that this selection has been one justified by the character and antecedents of the gentlemen selected. (Applause.)

Babu Jogindra Chandra Ghose is an M.A. of eight years' standing, and has been practising as a Vakil of the Calcutta High Court for about six years. He is a gentleman of cultivated tastes, and has done his country and the literary world good service by editing in a collected form, and with an excellent introduction, the scattered writings of the Indian reformer Ram Mohun Ray. (Applause.)

Babu Mohendra Nath Ray is an M.A. of six years' standing, and is one of the most distinguished Graduates of the University. His academic career was exceptionally brilliant; he stood first at the F. A., and first in his own subject at the M. A. examination, and he won some of the most important scholarships, prizes, and medals that are competed for at the Arts examinations. He is now one of the lecturers on higher Mathematics in the City College, and in the Indian Association for the Cultivation of Science.

It therefore gives me much pleasure to include these two gentlemen in the list of the Fellows who have been appointed to fill existing vacancies. (Applause.) You will, by the way, notice that, following the precedent of last year, only eight appointments have been made, although there were 12 vacancies. This course has been adopted with the object of gradually reducing the Fellows List to more reasonable proportions. I am sufficiently pleased with the results of the little electoral experiment which we have conducted here to promise you that it shall be repeated next year. The only improvement which I have to suggest is that you may probably find it possible to devise some means of giving what might be called your out-voters—I mean the M.A.s who are resident in the Mofussil—an opportunity of signifying their wishes, as well as the gentlemen who reside in Calcutta, or the immediate neighbourhood. (Applause.) I take this opportunity of publicly expressing my thanks to a body of Graduates, numbering nearly 200, who were kind enough to write me a letter of thanks, in which they expressed their appreciation of the privilege conferred upon them. It is very satisfactory to me to know that it possesses a real value in their eyes, and I feel sure that they will continue to exercise it with due care and a proper sense of responsibility. (Applause.)

Mr. Vice-Chancellor—It now remains for me only to offer my congratulations and best wishes to all those who have to-day received University degrees at your hands, and perhaps I may be permitted to add a special word of congratulation to the ladies who came before you (applause), and whose success was evidently so entirely acceptable to those whom I have been addressing. (Continued applause.)

I now beg to call upon the Vice-Chancellor to address the Convocation.

We have not space, this week at any rate, for the Vice-Chancellor's long address, which was frequently cheered. The Convocation was then declared at an end.

THE AGE OF CONSENT.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL'S COUNCIL FOR MAKING LAWS.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur Krishnaji Lakshman Nulkar said:—“I wish to support the Motion that leave be granted to introduce this Bill, inasmuch as it will afford, to a certain extent at least, protection against physical violation of a class of helpless children among large sections of the population.

“As to the unpopularity of the measure, it is very probable that in certain quarters and in certain sections of society it will be at first viewed with disapprobation, and it may even be made the occasion of false alarm. But I feel certain that such a feeling would be temporary, traceable directly to the false issues raised in the course of the heated controversy which has been going on for some years past between social reformers on the one side and those who claim to be conservatives on the other. It is the country's misfortune that the one party should have often overdone their part by appealing for legislative aid in matters which lie quite outside the ordinary functions of the Legislature, and in which it is the duty of society to provide remedies. The other party has naturally retaliated by crying down any legislation whatever, apparently because it was asked for by their opponents. Indeed, these latter have done some harm by claiming the measure now under consideration as specially belonging to their programme of social reform. As a matter of fact, it has as little direct connection with social reform as any other provision of the Penal Code. It simply seeks to remove a glaring defect in the criminal law of India. This true character of the measure will soon become clear to the public, as they have time to consider its nature and effect calmly and dispassionately; because I feel certain that, but for the fact that it was mixed up by one of the parties to the social reform controversy with their demands for all manner of legislative props to their plans, we should never have heard of any misconception on the subject, much less opposition to such an extremely moderate increase of the age of consent. Indeed, it is extremely probable that, if twelve or even fourteen years had been provided for in the original Penal Code thirty years ago, it would have passed unchallenged by the general public."

As this peerless medicine has gained fame in the past, so will it preserve it in the future by its renovating and invigorating qualities, and the impossibility of its doing harm.

His Excellency the President said :—"I do not think it necessary to add to what has already been said in defence of the Bill on the table except perhaps to the extent of observing that, while we shall always recognize the high authority which attaches to any observations falling from the lips of our Hon'ble colleague Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, the Government of India, for the reasons urged by the Hon'ble Member in charge of the Bill in his opening statement, cannot admit with him that the existing criminal law is sufficient for the purpose of affording protection to those whom we propose to protect under this Bill. Nor can we accept his view that the Proclamation of 1858, which the Government of India regards as in the highest degree obligatory upon it, can be considered as absolutely precluding us from interference, simply because for the purposes of this Bill the same protection is extended to married as to unmarried children. Nor, again, can we join with him in thinking that because there have been no prosecutions under the existing section of the Penal Code with its ten-year limit of age, that section can be regarded as having no effect, or, as I think he described it, a 'dead letter.' I believe that I shall be confirmed by those who are more familiar with Indian legislation than I am when I say that the effect of the law in this country is often valuable quite as much for its educative operation as for any results which it may lead to in the matter of legal proceedings or prosecutions. These, however, are points which can be more conveniently discussed at a later stage in the Bill. My object in now addressing the Council is to place Hon'ble Members and the public in complete possession of the views of the Government of India, not so much with regard to the special question dealt with in this Bill, as with respect to certain other matters which are to some extent connected with it in the mind of the public.

"The Hon'ble Member in charge of the Bill has very properly insisted that it does not in any way affect what may, for convenience sake, be spoken of as the marriage law of this country. There is, as far as I am aware, no social or religious custom, or observance, in force among the Hindu community to which this Bill does the slightest violence. We propose merely to protect from the unquestioned evils of early prostitution, or premature sexual intercourse, that great body of the female children of India which lies between the age of ten, up to which the present law affords them protection, and the age of twelve, up to which we propose that such protection should be extended. Our measure affects the marriage usage only in so far as this protection extends to a married as well as to an unmarried child. Under the law, as it now stands, no distinction is made between them for this particular purpose, and we do not propose that, as a matter of principle, any such distinction should be introduced now. The immaturity of a young girl does not vary according as she is married or not, and we cannot, therefore, consistently give protection to the one class and deny it to the other. That is the beginning and the end of the connection of the Bill upon the table with the marriage law of India.

"It is, however, within the knowledge of Hon'ble Members--and our Hon'ble colleague Mr. Nulkar has dwelt with great force upon the point--that the proposal embodied in the Bill has recently been associated with other proposals widely different from it--proposals which do most distinctly affect the marriage law and the religious and social institutions of the Hindus. This association has been so closely maintained that the whole group of questions has come to be regarded as indissolubly connected, and it is inferred that, if the Government of India intends to deal with any one part of the subject, we are to a certain extent committed to deal with the rest.

"I desire to correct this misapprehension, and, if Hon'ble Members will allow me, I propose to place them and the public in full possession of our intentions, and to tell them exactly, not only what we propose to do in regard to the group of proposals to which I have referred, but also what we propose to leave undone.

"The proposals to which I refer, and which have lately been brought prominently under our notice, are to be found in a series of Resolutions lately submitted to the Government of India by an English Committee, numbering amongst its members many persons occupying conspicuous positions in public life, and connected at one time or another with high official employments in this country. It is impossible to feel any doubt as to the sincerity of this distinguished body of reformers, or as to the excellence of the objects at which they are endeavouring to arrive. If we do not entirely agree with them in their conclusions, it is only because, being, as we are, in closer contact than most of them with public opinion here, we realise more fully than they can the extreme gravity of any steps of which it might be truly said that they involve interference with the religious or social institutions of any large section of the inhabitants of India.

"I will, for the sake of convenience, refer in order to the Resolutions adopted by the Committee, and by it submitted to the Secretary of State for India and the Indian Government.

"The first of these Resolutions is in favour of raising the age of consent to twelve. That is the proposal embodied in our Bill, and I need not refer further to it except for the purpose of mentioning that we decided to take this subject up early in the month of July last, and consequently long before we were aware of the movement which had been set on foot in England.

"I may also point out in passing that, in one most important respect, our Bill, in so far as it affects husbands and wives, affords to them a degree of security against undue or inquisitorial interference which they do not at present possess. It does so in the following way :--My Hon'ble friend has explained that in order to minimise the risk of private persecution, or of blackmailing by the police, the offence dealt with by the Bill has, in all cases where the husband is the person accused, been made non-cognizable. As the law now stands, with the lower limit of age, it is a cognizable offence even if the husband is the person who has committed it. While therefore we have in one sense rendered the law more stringent by increasing the age limit, we have in another sense greatly increased our precautions against an abuse of the law, and given the advantage of this new security to a large number of persons who are at present entirely without it.

"The second Resolution suggests the so-called 'ratification' of infant marriages 'within a reasonable time of the proper age,' with the condition that marriages not so ratified shall be set aside. This proposal has, I understand, received a considerable amount of support in influential quarters. I do not, however, think that those who have advocated its adoption can have realised the tremendous gravity of the step which they recommend. It is no exaggeration to say that such a change in the law would simply revolutionise the social system of the Hindus. We are all aware that in their estimation a marriage contract, no matter at what age it is entered into, is of the most absolutely binding and sacred character. To enact that such a contract should subsequently be made revocable, or, in other words, that the original contract should become little more than a formal betrothal, would involve an interference with the domestic institutions of the people of India, which neither my colleagues nor I are prepared to admit. To justify such interference upon the ground that it would to some extent assimilate the law in India to what used to be the common law as to child marriage in Christian Europe appears to me to be entirely beside the mark. I am, moreover, altogether at a loss to conceive how such a law, supposing it to have been passed, could be enforced, and I observe that even the authors of the Resolution admit that the change could not be made without consulting native Indian opinion, and that they throw out the further suggestion that, should the proposed change meet with serious opposition, it could, in the first instance, be made binding only on such classes of the community as might formally place themselves under it.

"The third Resolution has reference to the much debated subject of suits for the restitution of conjugal rights. It is urged that such suits in their coercive form are open to serious objection, and that the law under which a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights may be enforced by imprisonment should be amended. The Government of India is invited to 'reconsider the whole subject with a due regard to the marriage law and the habits and customs of the people of India.' I am in a position to say that the Government of India have already, on more than one occasion, given to this matter the reconsideration for which the authors of the Resolution have asked. The subject is one of extreme intricacy, and it would be impossible, within the limits of these observations, to deal with it satisfactorily, but I may say that the result of our enquiries has been to satisfy us that suits for restitution are common only in a few localities, and that in these they are usually confined to the lower classes of society, which naturally regard such suits from a point of view different from that of their superiors in social status. We have therefore had to consider how these classes would be affected were we to deprive them absolutely of any of the remedies which the law now affords.

"Now, it must be borne in mind that in cases where the husband or wife has property, the Court already has power to attach it, and after a limited time to award compensation to the suitor. It can, therefore, only be in cases where there is no property that any necessity can arise for enforcing the decree by imprisonment, and in such cases imprisonment is probably often the only remedy available. We are of opinion that a serious injustice would be done to the poorer classes of suitors, were it to be enacted that under no circumstances shall this remedy be resorted to. Such an enactment would encourage lax customs in respect of marriage where the customs are already deplorably lax, and where it should be our object to render the marriage tie more binding than it is at present. Whatever be the opinion of the more educated members of the community, we have no reason to believe that among the poorer classes the enforcement of a decree for restitution by imprisonment of the wife or husband at the discretion of the Court is looked upon by either party as an outrage. We think, however, that the existing law is capable of improvement. At present the law leaves it to the decree-holder to demand imprisonment as a means of enforcing the decree, and, if he does so, the Court has no option.

We think that such an option should be given, and that it would suffice if a proviso were inserted in section 260 of the Civil Procedure Code empowering the Court to refuse to consign a recusant wife or husband to imprisonment, or, should the Court order imprisonment, to restrict the term to such period as it might think fit. We do not, however, regard this question as one of immediate or urgent importance, and we propose to deal with it whenever we next have occasion to revise the Civil Procedure Code. We see at any rate no reason for undertaking legislation in regard to this point concurrently with that which will be necessary with reference to the wholly distinct question dealt with in the present Bill.

"The fourth Resolution has reference to the remarriage of widows, and asks that the legal obstacles that still stand in the way of this should be removed. In regard to this, two proposals are made. Of these the first is that we should alter the law as it is expressed in section 2 of Act XV of 1856, under which a widow forfeits her interest in her deceased husband's property on her remarriage. Now there can be no doubt that this section often has the effect of placing a Hindu widow who marries again in a most lamentable position—a position which is all the more pitiable because, as pointed out by the framers of the Resolution, it is a worse position than that of the widow who, without remarriage, leads an unhaste life. The section is, however, one which we are certainly not prepared to repeal. During the course of the long discussions which have taken place in regard to this branch of the subject, nothing has been more clearly established than that the right given to a widow in her husband's estate is one which she enjoys under very strict and special limitations. She is allowed to assume an interest in her husband's property, not as its natural heir, or with the idea that she is to be free to enjoy it in such a manner as she may deem fit, but because she is regarded as specially responsible for the performance of certain religious acts essential to the well-being of the deceased—acts which she could not adequately perform if by a fresh marriage she were to become the wife of a different person. This aspect of the question was thoroughly considered at the time when the Act of 1856 was discussed in the Legislative Council, and I will venture to read an extract from a speech delivered upon that occasion by Sir James Colville, who has expressed in language more appropriate than any which I can command, and with an authority to which I cannot pretend, what seems to us to be the sound view of the case. Sir James Colville said :—

"The right thus taken by the widow in her husband's estate was a very peculiar one, and very limited in enjoyment. She had not full dominion over the property, for she could not alienate any part of it except for purposes of strict necessity, or for such pious uses as contributed to the spiritual benefit of her husband. In fact, the law gave it to her not for her own benefit, but from the notion that her prayers and sacrifices, and the employment of his wealth in religious and charitable acts, would be beneficial to her deceased husband in another state of existence. If then this Bill had enabled her to carry into the arms of another man, or into another family, the property which she had so acquired, its opponents might reasonably have objected to it, that it would aggravate those mischievous consequences which often flow from the law as it exists, and that, contrary to Hindu law and Hindu feeling, it enabled the widow to enjoy her deceased husband's estate freed from the condition and the trusts upon which alone the law gave it to her."

"This view of the case is, I apprehend, as sound at the present time as it was when Sir James Colville's words were spoken, and we do not propose to make any departure from the wise policy embodied in the passage which I have just read.

"The second of the alleged obstacles is said to arise from the insufficiency of the protection afforded to widows desiring to remarry under section 6 of the same Act, which runs as follows :—

"Whatever words spoken, ceremonies performed, or engagements made, on the marriage of a Hindu female who has not been previously married, are sufficient to constitute a valid marriage, shall have the same effect, if spoken, performed, or made, on the marriage of a Hindu widow; and no marriage shall be declared invalid on the ground that such words, ceremonies, or engagements, are inapplicable to the case of a widow."

This section was obviously intended to afford facilities for such remarriages by giving them validity in spite of any ecclesiastical opposition which they might encounter. These facilities are, however, it is stated, of no avail in consequence of the refusal of the Hindu priests to perform the necessary marriage ceremonies, and it is suggested tentatively that the State might perhaps provide a form of civil marriage before a Registrar for women desiring to contract a second marriage.

"I am constrained to express my opinion that those who propose to overcome this obstacle by the adoption of such a remedy have altogether underrated the extent of the difficulty with which they have to deal. In order to explain my meaning, I cannot do so better than refer to the manner in which the same point has been dealt with by a well-known writer on Indian subjects who has lately published in the London Times a series of papers dealing with these subjects. The writer of these papers sums up his conclusion by advising us not to provide an alternative form of marriage, but to take steps in order to afford protection to individual Hindus who desire so avail themselves of the civil rights already granted to them by British-made Acts against the public penalties inflicted upon them by the Hindu ecclesiastical law, and he explains, in more than one eloquent passage, that the whole of the disabilities under which Hindu women at present suffer in this respect arise from the shortcomings of our legislation, 'which allows the Hindu ecclesiastical law to inflict penalties upon Hindu women for the lawful exercise of their civil rights.' He tells us that the remedy for this state of things 'lies within the power of the Anglo-Indian Legislature,' and that 'the Hindu ecclesiastical law should forthwith be deprived of its power to legally punish women for the lawful exercise of their civil rights.'

"Now I think Hon'ble Members will agree with me that when we speak of Hindu ecclesiastical law, and of legislation for the purpose of depriving it of any of its powers, we should keep before us a clear conception of that which is meant by the expression 'Hindu ecclesiastical law;' and fortunately the writer of the papers from which I am quoting has himself supplied us with an adequate definition, for he proceeds to explain that by the term 'Hindu ecclesiastical law' it is his intention to sum up the 'the complex growth of ordinance, usage, and procedure, which forms the religious side of the caste system, as distinguished from its social and commercial aspects.' The struggle therefore upon which the Indian Legislature is invited to embark is a struggle with no less an opponent than the whole system of Hindu religious caste. The hopelessness of such a contest in reference to issues of this kind, even if we were not deterred from it by other considerations, becomes evident if we consider the nature of the penalties by which the edicts of this so-called ecclesiastical law are enforced. What then are those penalties? We are informed by the same authority that the penalties which the Hindu ecclesiastical law, as thus defined, inflicts upon a couple who have the courage to avail themselves of the Marriage Act of 1856, are threefold. The first of these penalties is, he explains, a social one. The married couple, and such of their friends as have abetted their marriage, are cut off from social and domestic intercourse with their families and caste people. With this penalty the writer frankly admits that 'it would be practically impossible for the British law to interfere.' We may therefore assume that, whatever legislation we may resort to, this penalty, with all its terrors—and it is not easy to overestimate them—will remain in force. It is explained, however, that there are also two religious penalties,—'the woman is denied admission to the temple for the performance of her habitual religious duties, as if she were living in open sin;' and besides this 'an act of excommunication may also issue against the married couple and their abettors, which completely cuts them off from all rights and privileges to which they were entitled as members of a Hindu caste.'

"It is against these penalties that we are asked to protect those who are liable to them, and I gather from what follows that it is intended that such protection shall take the shape of a change in the law which would render any attempt to enforce such penalties punishable under the Penal Code.

"We have anxiously considered this suggestion, and the conclusion which forces itself upon us is, first, that we should not be justified in attempting so far-reaching an innovation as that which would, for example, be involved in compelling the admission of any person to the places of worship of the Hindus in opposition to the religious scruples of the rest of the community. And in the next place we are convinced that any attempt to resort to such legal compulsion would be absolutely illusory so long as the social excommunication, with which it is admitted that we should be powerless to interfere, remains in force. The social and the religious excommunication are two forms of one and the same thing, and, so long as Hindu opinion remains what it is upon these subjects, any attempts to remove either religious or social disabilities in cases such as that under discussion are, we believe, predestined to failure. If any change is to be made in these respects, it must come from within, and not from without, and must be the result of an alteration in the public opinion of the people of this country, and not of a social innovation forced upon them by the British Government. Signs are, I am glad to say, not wanting that, amongst the more enlightened and better educated classes, such an alteration is already in progress.

"For the reasons which I have given, we do not, with the exceptions upon which I have already touched, propose to proceed in the direction indicated by these Resolutions. We propose for the present to limit ourselves to legislation which, as my Hon'ble friend has pointed out, will not create a new offence, and which will not touch the marriage law. Our object is simply to afford protection to those who cannot protect themselves, protection from a form of physical ill-usage which I believe to be reprobated by the most thoughtful section of the community, which is to the best of my belief entirely unsupported by religious sanction, and which, under the English law, is punishable with penal servitude for life, without any exceptions or reservations.

"I trust that the measure, thus limited and restricted, will receive the support of public opinion, and I cordially commend it to the favourable consideration of the Council."

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

SHAMUS O'BRIEN.

A Ballad.

BEGUN IN IRELAND, AND FINISHED ELSEWHERE.

Jist afther the war, in the year '98,
As soon as the boys wor all scattered and bate,
'T was the custom, whenever a pisunt was got,
To hang him by thrial—barrin' sich as was shot.
There was thrial by jury goin' on by daylight,
And the martial law hangin' the lavins by night.
It's them was hard times for an honest gossoon ;
If he missed in the judges—he 'd meet a dragoon ;
An' whether the sojers or judges gev sentence,
The divil a much time they allowed for repentance.
An' it's many 's the fine boy was then an his keepin',
Wid small share iv restin' or atin', or sleepin',
An' because they loved Erin, an' scorned to sell it,
A prey for the bloodhound, a mark for the bullet—
Unsheltered by night and unrested by day,
With the heath for their barrack, revenge for their pay.
An' the bravest an' hardest boy iv them all,
Was Shamus O'Brien, from the town of Glingall ;
His limbs were well set, an' his body was light,
An' the keen-fanged hound had not teeth half so white ;
But his face was as pale as the face of the dead,
An' his cheek never warmed with the blush of the red ;
An' for all that, he was n't an ngly young bye,
For the divil himself could n't blaze with his eye,
So droll an' so wicked, so dark an' so bright,
Like a fire-flash that crosses the depth of the night ;
An' he was the best mower that ever has been,
An' the illigantest hurler that ever was seen.
In fincin' he gev Patrick Mooney a cut,
An' in jumpin' he hate Tom Malowney a fut ;
For lightness iv fut there was not his peer,
For, by gorra, he 'd almost outrun the red deer ;
An' his dancin' was sich that the men used to stare,
An' the women turn crazy, he done it so quare ;
An', by gorra, the whole world gev it into him there.
An' it's he was the boy that was hard to be caught,
An' it's often he run, and it's often he fought,
An' it's many the one can remember right well
The quare things he done, an' it's often I heerd tell
How he freckened the magisthrates in Cahirbally,
An' escaped through the sojers in Aherloe Valley,
An' leathered the yeomen, himself agin four,
An' stretched the two strongest on old Galtimore.
But the fox must sleep sometimes, the wild deer must rest,
An' treachery prey on the blood iv the best.
After many a brave action of power and pride,
An' many a hard night on the mountain's bleak side,
An' a thousand great dangers and toils overpast,
In the darkness of night he was taken at last.

Now, Shamus, look back on the beautiful moon,
For the door of the prison must close on you soon ;
An' take your last look at her dim lovely light,
That falls on the mountain and valley this night—
One look at the village, one look at the flood,
An' one at the sheltering, far-distant wood.
Farewell to the forest, farewell to the hill,
An' farewell to the friends that will think of you still ;
Farewell to the pathern, the hurlin', and wake,
An' farewell to the girl that would die for your sake.
An' twelve sojers brought him to Maryborough jail,
An' the turnkey resaved him, refusin' all bail.
The fleet limbs wor chained, and the sthrong hands wor bound,
An' he laid down his length on the cold prison ground,
An' the dreams of his childhood kem over him there,
As gentle an' soft as the sweet summer air ;
An' happy remembrances crowding on ever,
As fast as the foam-flakes dhruft down on the river,
Bringing fresh to his heart merry days long gone by,
Till the tears gathered heavy and thick in his eye.
But the tears did n't fall, for the pride at his heart
Would not suffer one drop down his pale cheek to start ;
An' he spraug to his feet in his dark prison cave,
An' he swore with the fierceness that misery gave,
By the hopes of the good, an' the cause of the brave
That when he was mouldering in the cold grave,
His enemies never should have it to boast
His scorn of their vengeance one moment was lost ;
His bosom might bleed, but his cheek should be dhry
For undaunted he 'd lived, and undaunted he 'd die.

Well, as soon as a few weeks was over and gone,
The terrible day iv thrial kem on ;
There was such a crowd there was scarce room to stand,
An' sojers on guard, an' dhragoons, sword in hand ;
An' the court-house so full that the people were bothered,
An' attorneys an' criers on the pint iv bein' smothered ;
An' counsellors almost gev over for dead,
An' the jury sittin' up in their box overhead ;
An' the judge settled out, so detarmined an' big,
With his gown on his back, an' an illigant new wig.
An' silence was called, an' the minute it was said,
The court was as still as the heart of the dead,
An' they heard but the opening of one prison lock,
An' Shamus O'Brien kem into the dock.
For one minute he turned his eye round on the throng,
An' he looked at the bars, so firm an' so strong,
An' he saw that he had not a hope nor a friend,
A chance to escape, nor a word to defend ;
An' he folded his arms as he stood there alone,
As calm an' as cold as a statue of stone ;
An' they read a big writin', a yard long, at laste,
An' Jim did n't underherstand it, nor mind it a taste.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

And the judge took a big pinch iv snuff, an' he says,
 "Are you guilty or not, Jim O'Brien, av you plase?"
 An' all held their breath, in the silence of dhread,
 An' Shamus O'Brien made answer an' said :—
 "My lord, if you ask me if in my lifetime
 I thought any treason, or did any crime
 That should call to my cheek, as I stand alone here,
 The hot blush of shame, or the coldness of fear,
 Though I stood by the grave to receive my death blow,
 Before God and the world I would answer you, no ;
 But if you would ask me, as I think it like,
 If in the rebellion I carried a pike,
 An' fought for ould Ireland, from the first to the close,
 An' shed the heart's blood of her bitterest foes,
 I answer you yes, an' I tell you again,
 Though I stand here to perish, it's my glory that then
 In her cause I was willing my veins should run dhry,
 An' that now for her sake I am ready to die."
 Then the silence was great, and the jury smiled bright,
 An' the judge was n't sorry the job was made light ;
 By my soul, it's himself was the crabbed ould chap !
 In a twinklin' he pulled on his ugly black cap.
 Then Shamus' mother, in the crowd standin' by,
 Called out to the judge, with a pitiful cry,
 "Oh, judge, darlin', don't, oh ! don't say the word !
 The crathur is young, have mercy, my lord ;
 He was foolish, he did n't know what he was doin' ;
 You don't know him, my lord, oh, don't give him to ruin—
 He's the kindest crathur, the tendherest hearted ;
 Don't part us for ever, we that's so long parted.
 Judge, mavomneen, forgive him, forgive him, my lord,
 An' God will forgive you—oh, don't say the word !"
 That was the first minute that O'Brien was shaken,
 When he saw that he was not quite forgot or forsaken ;
 An' down his pale cheeks, at the word of his mother,
 The big tears wor runnin' fast, one after t'other ;
 An' two or three times he endeavored to spake,
 But the strong, manly voice used to falter an' break ;
 But at last, by the strength of his high-mounting pride,
 He conquered and mastered his grief's swelling tide,
 An' says he, "Mother, darlin', don't break your poor heart,
 For, sooner or later, the dearest must part ;
 And God knows it's better than wandering in fear
 On the bleak, trackless mountain, among the wild deer,
 To lie in the grave, where the head, heart, and breast
 From thought, labor, and sorrow for ever shall rest.
 Then, mother, my darlin', don't cry any more,
 Don't make me seem broken in this, my last hour ;
 For I wish, when my head's lyin' undher the raven,
 No true man can say that I died like a craven !"
 Then toward the judge Shamus bent down his head,
 An' that minute the solemn death sentence was said.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Right Hon'ble Beilby Lawley, Lord Wenlock, arrived at Madras on the 23rd instant, and was immediately sworn in as Governor of the Presidency. His staff consist of Mr. Rees as Private Secretary ; Captain Lawley, Military Secretary ; Captains Baring and Lord Compton, Aides-de-Camp ; Lieutenant Holmes, extra Aid-de-Camp ; Lieutenant-Colonel Leonard, Bangalore Volunteers, Honorary Aid-de-Camp ; Subadar-Major Usman Khan, Governor's Body-guard, native Aid-de-Camp. His Excellency has been created a Knight Grand Commander of the Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire and his lady Constance Mary, Lady Wenlock admitted into the Imperial Order of the Crown of India.

THERE is opposition to Lord Connelmar's portrait being hung at the Madras Banqueting Hall. The Wesleyan Missionaries and Ministers of the Madras District have passed a resolution deprecating any honor to the late Governor for the circumstances under which he resigned office. The subscription for the portrait has been closed at Rs. 2,505.

The missionaries are more and more extending their fingers into the political pie.

WE read in the Pioneer :—

"Extravagance.—The curio vendors and shawl merchants of Delhi are not often favoured with so free-handed a purchaser as His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch. While in Delhi lately he is known to have spent in or about Rs. 20,000 on various objects or art of interest. It would require but a very small army of Czarewitches of so acceptable a kind to invade India to wholly alienate the affections of, at any rate, the mercantile native from our rule."

It were not at all bad if that thought led the patriotic British India to invest a larger proportion of his income from this country in its works of art and manufacture.

HERE is an ancient dame who has produced a bull !

"An old lady in North Carolina was told that in consequence of a rectification of the frontier between that State and Virginia, her place of residence would thenceforth be situated in Virginia. Highly delighted with the news she exclaimed—'How fortunate ! I always heard that Virginia had a better climate than North Carolina !'"

A TREVANDRUM writer, under date the 24th December last, reports the weather in Travancore at the capital "quite unpleasant."

"The days are intensely hot and the nights extremely cold. Chill breezes gently blow from yonder Arabian Sea, announcing to us of the approach of 'ould Father Christmas.' The fall of dew is unusually heavy and there is hardly any rain. Our roads are full of dust which at sudden gusts of wind rises in voluminous columns several feet high and renders travelling almost impossible."

Nor was the public health better. Besides fever, dysentery and eye-diseases, the cholera had broken out carrying off scores of victims. The Maharaja's Government were trying to grapple with the calamity with energy. There was much distress for subsistence, too. Rice and other grains were famine-dear. The capital had been filled with beggars. This was a difficulty harder to deal with even by the Model State of the "Land of Charity."

SUCH was the intensity of cold England has passed through, that the driver of the mail-cart between Canterbury and Dover was stiffened to death. The sad occurrence is thus told :—

"The night was intensely cold, and the snow lay hard on the ground, but the mail-cart driver set out from Canterbury as usual. At several of the stopping-places those in charge of the mails noticed that the driver had not his customary word of greeting, and thought it was ill-humour. On the arrival of the mail-cart at Dover post-office it was discovered that the man sat on his seat stiff and cold, with the reins in his hands ; the frost had stiffened him unto death. The horse had stopped voluntarily at the usual calling-places, and on the slamming of the door behind the cart had started off again."

Good servitors both ! It was thus the horse has carried through battle his headless Knight.

THE Pioneer has been subjected to a cruel and silly hoax :—

"We regret that the announcement of a birth which appeared in the Pioneer of the 9th instant was inaccurate. From information which we have since received, there can be no doubt that a cruel and silly hoax has been perpetrated."

THE Indian Union, with equal perspicacity and urbanity, although claiming us as a follower of its camp opposition to the Age of Consent Bill, sneers at our affectation of judicial attitude. No doubt, moderation is a great sin in the eyes of the fire-eaters, and we are habitual sinners. We are content to bear that odium, but must decline the farther burden our contemporary would impose on us. The air of Allahabad is so surcharged with passion that its writers are not able to do justice to calmer wights and are apt to regard all efforts to hold even the scales a pretence.

A BOMBAY jeweller, Chunilal Punnalal, has offered to Government a lac of rupees for a Jain sanatorium.

THE Americans leave the sluggish Old World behind by many lengths. They are go-ahead even in letters. The Indian Planters' Gazette's London correspondent supplies from a transatlantic source the following morceau of dramatic criticism, which is worthy of the people who invented "interviewing" in journalism :—

"Mrs. Langtry is nothing if not daring. Even in her playfulness she is often audacious. Physically, the Jersey Lily is about as near perfection as women grow. True, she has not the sinuous grace and opihidian suggestiveness of the Bernhardt ; but her limbs are models of symmetry, and her feet, although too large, are as shapely as those of the Venus de Medici, and as soft and pink as a baby's; hence they look well bare in sandals, the obligato (sic) style of foot-gear when one plays the wild and wilful Cleopatra, who had a playful habit of kicking the bedclothes around in a lively fashion when Antony stayed out late at nights. But if there be one part of the Jersey Lily more beautiful than another, it is her shoulders. They are—and I speak from autoptical experience—sublimely splendid, especially when viewed together with the arms, for these are not only finely shaped, but they make junction with the shoulders in the highest style of workmanship known to nature. Now, having these transcendent merits, it is not, I opine, at all astonishing that the Jersey Lily should yearn to show to the world just how beautiful she is. This is how she has done it: In one act, her jewelled bodice, which, of course, is décolleté, has very slight shoulder straps, so that when her arms are raised the eye gets the full, magnificent sweep across her shoulders and out along the upper arm. In order to display the symmetry of the junction of her arms to her trunk, (trunk is good) she cuts such large armholes that the lower edge is on the level with the bust line. The effect may be imagined. It is positively startling, especially when those beautiful arms, large, full, round, and white, flash angrily in the air as she pours forth her hot indignation or paints the agony of her jealousy. But be calm, I beg of you. The Jersey Lily will ere long bring her Cleopatra, shoulders, arms, and axillæ, over to our fortunate shores and then you may see for yourselves. What I am waiting to see is whether our swell girls, ever ready to copy the toilets of actresses, will dare to adopt Cleopatra armholes."

And that is all. So much for the English Stage and the Dramatic Criticism of the day.

THE Secretary of State seems to have accepted the offer of Messrs. Duff Bruce, Matheson and Company, for the Chittagong-Assam Railway. The promoters will raise one and-a-half million of the capital under a three per cent. guarantee, the remaining four and-a-half being advanced by the Secretary of State as required.

THE Rangoon Times has learnt on reliable authority that Burma will soon be raised to a Lieutenant-Government, with Sir Alexander Mackenzie as its first Lieutenant-Governor.

THE First Half-Yearly Departmental Examination of the year of Assistant and Deputy Magistrates, in the Regulation and Non-Regulation districts, and of officers in the Police, Medical and Forest Departments, will commence on Monday, the 27th April.

As a check against irregularities and fraud in the management of schools, the Bengal Government has sanctioned the following addition to the Junior Scholarship Rules:—

"Rule 13. 'The right of sending up candidates for Junior Scholarships may, at the discretion of the Director of Public Instruction, be withheld for any period from any school (a) which is convicted of wilful transgression or colourable evasion of the transfer rules for high schools, or (b) the maintenance of which appears to the Director of Public Instruction to be for any sufficient reason injurious to the interests of education, or (c) which is not certified by the Inspector of Schools as having been in existence since the 1st July next preceding the examination, and as qualified to teach up to the Entrance standard.'"

THE rate of exchange for the adjustment of financial transactions between the British and Indian Governments for the 1891-92, has been fixed at one shilling and sixpence halfpenny the rupee.

IN the course of an able leading article on the new and improved prospects of Indian Tea in the English market, the Englishman compresses into a small compass the whole interesting history of the discovery of the plant in India and its cultivation:—

"Old records show that the tea plant was known in India a hundred years ago, as a curiosity in gardens. Warren Hastings sent some seeds to a friend in Bhutan, and in 1788 Sir Joseph Banks, on behalf of the East India Company, submitted a formal proposal to the native authorities for the cultivation of tea. Six years later the Company itself discouraged the idea, from fear of injuring its China trade. In 1825 the Society of Arts moved in the matter, and offered their gold medal for a successful experiment. But the reward was not claimed till 1839, when a Mr. C. A. Bruce, to whom the discovery of tea in India is commonly attributed, was awarded the medal, 'for discovering the indigenous tea tracts, and successfully cultivating and preparing tea in the British possessions in India.' The credit was, however, contested by a native named Moneran Dewan; while a Captain Charlton had actually received a medal from the Calcutta Agricultural Society five years before, for drawing attention to the existence of the tea plant in Assam. All unknown to the Society of Arts the Government made two unsuccessful attempts to start a tea garden between 1835 and 1838, and in 1840 the Indian Tea Company was formed. But in those days distances were great in India, while prejudice is even stronger than to-day; so that it was nearly ten years before the 'tea fever' took hold of the public. Then the eagerness to invest caused estates to fetch many times their value, and soon brought about the inevitable crisis. Huge profits and dividends had been made, not so much from tea manufactured as from the far easier production of seed, and temporary success led to extravagance, not to say fraud, company promoters having been known even to sell land which had no existence."

THE People's Friend in its review of the year says:—

"We regret that a few prominent citizens have withdrawn all connection with the Congress, and that the Bradlaugh Bill was the cause."

SPEAKING of the Sixth Congress, it deplores the illness and absence of two of its Chiefs and lets out the secret of their function in that business:—

"It was a great misfortune that both Mr. S. N. Banerjee and Mr. W. C. Bonnerjee were ill and unable to take any part in the proceedings. There was not therefore that glamour, which was an essential feature of previous gatherings."

AT a village near Jhelum, in the Punjab over a land dispute, a son, a mere boy, struck his father with a club and killed him.

THE Madras High Court has confirmed the conviction, by the Sessions Judge of Bellary, of the Town Magistrate of Bellary, Cauvery Munber Mulliah, of taking a bribe of Rs. 140 for acquitting V. Peddu Subiah, charged with attempting to defraud the Southern Mahratta Railway.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

FROST has been followed by flood. The sudden thaw swelled the rivers and serious floods are reported from France and Belgium. The severe winter in Europe has carried many to their graves,—even in the higher ranks of life. Prince Baudouin, son of the Count of Flanders and heir to the Belgian throne, caught chill and died of pneumonia in thirty six hours. Mr. Charles Bradlaugh too succumbed to the weather, though not so suddenly. He was reported to be sinking last week. Subsequent telegrams were a trifle cheering, but last evening Reuter flashed the sad news of his death in the morning. Three nights before, the House of Commons had unanimously expunged from its journals the resolution passed in 1880 precluding him from taking the oath.

Another important death is announced from America. Mr. Windon, Secretary to the United States Treasury, fell down dead at a dinner at New York on Friday evening.

THE Chilean insurgents demand the immediate resignation of the President. They seized Tarapaca and bombarded Coronil, killing and wounding many inhabitants. The whole of the army threaten to join in the revolt.

MR. Channing brought forward a motion in the House of Commons for a reduction in the hours of railway servants, which was negatived. Simultaneously, the Scotch strikers created a serious disturbance at Greenock, by attacking the freemen, stoning and injuring the Police who intervened. All attempts to bring about reconciliation failing, the North British Railway Company has sued the Scotch Railway Union for twenty thousand pounds damages for inducing the employés of the Company to break their contracts, and obtained an embargo on the funds. That seems to have struck the neck of the strike, for the latest news speaks of a collapse among the employés of the said Railway and there is a prospect of an immediate general return to work among other strikers in Scotland.

THERE is no little surprise at Berlin at the resignation, without cause assigned, of Count Waldersee, Chief of the German Staff.

THE Government Indian Councils Bills has been read for the first time in the House of Commons. Mr. Bradlaugh had begun to see the usefulness of this instalment of reform, and we trust the Indian patriots and their friends in England will see their way to accept the measure. It has a wide scope and is capable of including their largest expectations.

THE Secretary of State for India has notified his willingness to renew for seven years, from the 16th August next, two million sterling of India Debentures, with interest at the rate of $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., or $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. less than the current rate.

THE Dervishes are to the front again. They made a raid close to Suakim for cattle-lifting. The Egyptian cavalry beat them back, recovering the stolen cattle and then occupying Handoub.

THE Marquis of Dufferin and Ava and Lord Lytton, two of our ex-Viceroy, have been appointed Honorary Presidents, for 1891, of the Oriental Congress. They both are high literary artists and linguists.

THE French Government have prohibited the performance of M. Sardou's new play "Thermidor" vilifying M. Robespierre and others. There was a great disturbance by the Radicals at the Theatre on the opening night, followed by rioting in the street. The Chamber of Deputies have endorsed the action of Government, thereby averting a ministerial crisis.

THE Under-Secretary of State for India announced in Parliament that Government would not reopen the Dum-Dum murder case.

THERE may be invention in Mysore, but as yet no way to utilise it for the good of the world at large. A goldsmith of the Rampore village is said to have made a plough which, while light and durable, does double the work of an ordinary plough. Such is the report from paper to paper of a most important agricultural improvement. But this is very unsatisfactory. Strange that no body supplies or even calls for details. We hope the Maharaja's Government will lay the particulars before the public. They alone can best discover this nameless goldsmith among the doubtless several Rampores of rural Mysore.

IN the Government Resolution prohibiting officers from lending money on interest to landholders in the province in which they are employed, such officers are described as "all uncovenanted officers in the subordinate executive and judicial services of the Government." On a reference from the Madras Government, the Government of India explain that the order in question applies to all executive and judicial servants of Government to whom the term "officer" is usually applied, and includes Deputy Collectors and Tahsildars, and Subordinate Judges and Munsiffs. The prohibition equally applies to all loans to landholders, whether the security to be given is land or houses.

THE People's Friend of Madras speaks of "the Bengalee orator, Mr. Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee." This is like "Mr. M. R. Ry. Ramaswami Moodelhar." Interprovincial ignorance is the chief source of weakness of the Indian people as a political factor, and we always thought the Congress a good instrument for dispelling that ignorance. After all the expense and worry of six long years, it is melancholy to come upon such evidence of failure of the institution as an educator.

Although his name and title are confounded, our Bengali orator has no room left for complaint on the score of appreciation of his merits. He is said to have "made a deep impression and electrified his English audience." Again, he is referred to as "the able and brilliant speaker who enchanted his audience by his wit, logic and Macaulayan ring of speech."

The friendliness of the critic is above suspicion, whatever may be thought of his taste or terms. We for one are not sure what is meant by Macaulayan ring, specially in the connection. Such random characterization only helps to confusion of thought. In complimenting the living, we should be on our guard against injustice to the dead. Ring rings in our ears too often for effect. It is an expressive word—a fine force in the literary laboratory, but only when judiciously applied. "Ring" is no slight matter. Macaulay himself had no ring except on paper. To adopt his own language, he spoke essays, and that not in the best manner or with the most impressive effect. Mr. Banerjee is a true orator, but he surely does not enchant his audience by his wit or logic, or else he would be as good to read as he is to hear. He does not always bare reporting. He really does injustice to his talents by his passion for mob applause. With his fine physical endowments and his great experience, he would be a far superior speaker if he could but restrain his glib tongue. Unfortunately, he speaks far too often, and once on his legs he does not know when to stop. He is certainly the best debater now in India.

AMONG the recipients of honours in England on New Year's Day, was the famous anatomist and physician Dr. Richard Quain who has been made a baronet. Learning may also claim the baronetcy conferred on Sir Henry Rawlinson, the wizard who introduced the world into the mysteries of cuneiform inscriptions in buried Persepolis. Sir Hercules Robinson's baronetcy is a political creation, made apparently to comfort the reactionary Colonial Governor under the humiliating exposure of his ways in Hong Kong and Mauritius given him by that sturdy friend of justice and good government, Sir John Pope Hennessy. The barony conferred on Sir Francis Sandford, if no direct recognition of letters, may be regarded as an honour to a house of learning. His father, the late Sir Daniel Kyte Sandford, rose from the Professor of Greek at Glasgow to be a member of Parliament and a knight. The son, educated first at Glasgow and afterwards at Oxford, entered the world as one of Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Great Exhibition of 1851 and as Assistant Secretary in the Colonial Office and as Secretary to the Committees of Council on Education for England and Scotland. In recognition of his usefulness, he was created a C. B. and a Privy Councillor, and lastly in 1879 a Knight Commander of the Bath. And now from this year he becomes the Right Honourable Lord Sandford.

The other "nobilisation" of the year suggests the bon mot—

"The rank is but the Guinness' stamp."

It is not a step from beverage to peerage, however. The Guinnesses are a respectable and prosperous Irish family, seeing that the gentleman now ennobled is a son of a baronet and married the daughter of another Guinness who is a member of Parliament. The petty publican may be a sinner, but the colossal distiller or brewer is honourable. Such is the European Rule of Caste.

A SOUTHERN paper, in its review of the year just closed, refers to the chance which has raised a member of the Civil Service for the nonce to the throne of a satrapy, and speculates on the contingent possibilities.

"At the close of the past year, the Hon'ble Mr. Garstin became our Provisional Governor. Had the Hon'ble Mr. Stokes not been on furlough, he would have occupied the high position, as he is the senior Member of Council. The Hon'ble Mr. Hutchins transferred to the Calcutta Council, also lost his chance of playing Governor for two months."

Just so. Once a Governor always a Governor—somewhat. And our Madrasees know this well, specially the officials. Sir W. Denison, an officer of Engineers, after passing his life in distant and obscure Colonies, had at last the luck to obtain Indian preferment in the shape of the Government of Madras. Luck is luck, however, and one advantage leads to another, till the late Lord Mayo did him such a turn as neither his father nor his patron ever did. The generous Irishman submitted to assassination in order to give the poor Welshman an opportunity to play the rôle imperial. No sooner was the news of Lord Mayo's murder in the Andamans flashed to the world, than Sir W. Denison left his Government of Madras to his second in Council and steamed up the Bay to seize the Government of India. He came and stepped into the viceregal throne and kept possession of it for the few days till the regular successor arrived from England. And then he retreated to his surf-beaten beach as quickly as he came. It was a brief brave sensation that he experienced—a Tantalus draught that he tasted. But he scarcely complained of either brevity or the tantalising. He knew how to make the most of the accident, and he made it. He ever afterwards regarded himself a superior man—not only a ruler of men or a provincial statesman, but a very Agamemnon almost, a salaried king of kings. He assumed viceregal airs. By way of striking coins and inscriptions to perpetuate the memory of his accession to viceregal glory, he published a book in 2 vols., which, by its very title proclaims to the whole world and all ages the fact of his viceregal promotion and triumph. It is called Varieties of Viceregal Life. Well may our Mulligatwany brethren complain of the hard fate of Mr. Hutchins being deprived of a chance of playing "Our Governor-General in the East."

We revert to Sir William Moore, under the guidance of the careful writer of the account given in the Times of India. With the growing recognition of the importance of the questions of public health, the old scorn for the healing art has passed away and the doctors are coming to the front. Sir William Moore with Sir Joseph Fayrer occupies in the public mind the position formerly held by Sir Ranald Martin. We think our readers will be glad to have his opinions in a compact form. All the more that these opinions have an individuality of their own. On the burning question of Leprosy, we read:—

"Its ravages may, he grants, be considerably mitigated by careful treatment, and the patient may even be restored to a certain appearance of health; but the poison once in his system will ever remain there, and to his dying day he will be a leper."

Again:—

"He believes that while the disease is in many cases hereditary, it may be communicated from a leper to any person who happens to have an open sore, or even a slight abrasion of the skin, by leprous discharge coming in contact with such sore or abrasion. A frequent source of this sort of contagion, he believes, is the practice universally followed in India of removing shoes before entering houses or public or religious buildings. A leper's shoes are put on by mistake by a healthy person who perhaps has a slight sore on his foot, and the mischief is done. But for all that the eminent specialist is far from recommending the wholesale segregation of lepers. He thinks that it will be quite sufficient for all practical purposes to merely segregate those with open sores. A modified system of this kind is more likely, he conceives, to find favour with the natives, than a sweeping measure of segregation, which would bring terror into many homes."

Sir William is nothing if not original. Who could have anticipated that, in treating of the etiology of Leprosy, this doctor would make a final solution—and it is a solution satisfactory to all liberal men and friends of civilisation—of the Great Shoe Question that had vexed so many generations of Indian politicians?

In the same spirit of practical originality, he addresses himself to the exchange question:—

"As a panacea for the ills of falling exchange and diminishing incomes, he boldly advocates intermarriage on a wide scale between Europeans and natives. The Hindoo woman, he asserts, makes a faithful and dutiful wife, and as her ties are all in the country, she does not require to make those frequent visits to Europe which are so necessary to the well-being of the mem-sahab. There is something so utterly appalling in this proposition to conventional ideas, that it is perhaps natural that Sir William Moore should have been roughly handled by the critics. One indignant writer, indeed, went so far as to say that the exponent of such subversive principles should be drummed out of every drawing-room in London. But the criticisms were not all adverse. Soon after the article appeared in the Asiatic Quarterly, in which the novel system of meeting the evils of diminished income was propounded, Sir William Moore received a letter from an anonymous correspondent stoutly supporting his views, and enlarging with suspicious fervour upon the domestic virtues and lovable qualities of the Hindoo wife."

He first made his mark as an observer and thinker on the Opium question:—

"It was as long ago as 1871, in his Rajootana dispensary reports, that he first ventured to advance the thesis that he has since so boldly maintained, that the exaggerated results of using the drug, detailed in the reports of the Anti-Opium Society, are only applicable to the extreme cases, and that it is not, as a whole, more destructive in its effects than dram drinking or the use of ether or chloral. His experience amongst the Rajpoots, who are habitual opium consumers, had led him to this conclusion, and he was able to justify his opinions by many facts within his personal knowledge, which were infinitely more valuable than the sensational records of writers who had at least only an amateur knowledge of the subject."

A MAN was convicted at Sydney for hooting the Governor. The defence was that the accused was a recent arrival from the country. So much the worse for the green cucumber. One would have thought that there was more respect for authority—more reverence for superiors—among the inhabitants of the country than among the radicals and ragamuffins in town. But alas! the evil schoolmaster has been abroad and the world at large has been moulded by him, and there is now little to choose between town and country. The country mouse and the city mouse are nourished on pickings of the same pabulum, hot and heating, and of course show the same mind and manners. Very often the rural "Rad" is the more impudent of the two fruits of the same wonderful diffusion of knowledge and confusion of ideas in this age of which we so unceasingly boast.

A GYAN CHUNDER BANERJEE has arisen in the South. The Madras High Court—Mr. Justice Wilkinson—has dismissed the insolvent petition of one Mahammad Ali Khan, a lad of 19 years of age. He had no capital and no assets. His only income was an allowance of Rs. 25 a month from his parents, and yet his dealings with the Banks amounted to two lacs and with the merchants to 15 or 16 lacs of rupees, which the Judge characterized as gambling speculations depending on the rise and fall in Government paper. He was not deserving of pity or protection.

PRESS of matter compelled us last week to keep back the account of an interesting ceremony. As we are not sure whether we shall find space enough for the whole proceedings and papers connected therewith, we mention here that we allude to the address of greeting to Sir Charles Elliott on his assumption of the Lieutenant Government presented on Wednesday the 21st January. As a demonstration it was independent of the standing organisations, for whatever it may be worth. The movement, with whomsoever it originated, was carried through by the energy and perseverance of one man, Baboo Benode Behary Mullick. He got together a mixed committee of varied elements representing different sections, namely, Father Lafont, Shew Bux Bogla, Mr. Mehta, Babu Surendra Nath Pal Chowdhry, Nawab Meer Mahomed Ali, and Raja Gobind Lal Roy. We have thus the Church, Commerce and Banking, Manufacturing, Land. Here are the representatives of European intellect, of the Hindustani merchants, of the political camp of Young India, of landed families Hindu and Mussulman, and of the new nobility, joined together. The deputation that waited upon the Lieutenant-Governor was still more various, being headed by the Hon'ble Prince Furrook Shah, and the address being read by Kumar Debendro Mullick. The reply to the address was an event. In it, Sir Charles Elliott practically withdrew the letter of his Private Secretary declining the invitation to the sittings of the Congress and announced the present Government of India's interpretation—a most liberal one—of the previous circular which had caused so much anxiety and dissatisfaction.

THE Cesarewitch has been and gone. He reached Calcutta in the afternoon of Monday and left it on Wednesday night. He was accompanied by Prince George of Greece and his own suite, and the whole party was piloted in by Sir D. M. Wallace, formerly Private Secretary to Lord Dufferin in India. The Viceroy in person received the Cesarewitch at the Howrah railway station, and a dense crowd along the whole route to Government House cheered him lustily. On the steps of the viceregal palace stood the pillars of state and the pageantry—the European chiefs, civil and military, the Judges, the leading merchants, and all the native respectability of the town, with representative men from the country, were in attendance. But the whole concourse was so awkward and wanting in adroitness, that not the faintest ghost of a cheer was raised at the entrance of the imperial visitor. Perhaps, the apparition of the Russ at the British Palace of Power built by the great Wellesley overpowered them, giving rise to visions prophetic of the end. They order the matter better in France, we think. The French in such a situation would at least have employed claqueurs to keep up the spirits of the people and shout welcome to the stranger. At the head of the stairs, the Viceroy introduced him to the high officials already named in the Gazette of the arrangements. The most interesting incident of the afternoon was the enthusiastic reception, by his old Hindu, Mahomedan and Parsee friends, of Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace. As soon as the Viceroy and the Princes passed into the house and their backs were turned, the Baboos and Rajas and Nawabs pounced upon him, great chiefs in their enthusiasm running like little children. They all seized him by the hand or the arm, the tail of his coat or the star on his breast, and—did not know what to say. But their embarrassment was most eloquent. The same evening, there was a state banquet and a Reception at the Government House. The Evening Party was the densest of any that we can remember within these fifteen years, there being hardly moving space. There were besides the rank and file of the Government House List, the Nawabs of Chitpore, the Princes of Oudh and of the House of Hyder Ali, the Rajas of Sobhabazar and of Pathuriaghata. There were the great landed chiefs of Behar, Durbhanga and Bettiah, the former of whom had come that morning. The Nawab Bahadoor though in town being confined, Moorshedabad was represented by his next brother Nawab Wali Kuds Hossein Ali Mirza and his brother-in-law Nawab Zamool Abdeen. All the various races and creeds and denominations were fully represented. The military element was the strongest. The presence of the high priests of the different Christian Churches and at least one Hindu abbot lent solemnity to the scene which might have been too gay. Both Lord Lansdowne and Sir Charles Elliott introduced several of the party to the Cesarewitch. The observed of all observers, the Prince bore himself well. At last, however, he failed to make head against the gathering clouds. Having with the assistance of his host advanced as far as the centre of the great colonnaded Saloon, he came to a stand. The sight of respectable humanity fiercely beating one against another in the struggle to catch a glimpse of the stranger, must have been too much for his youthful susceptibilities. He had little time for musing on the exhibition of moral weakness, before the inexorable laws of physics threatened his own position of vantage and both viceregal host and imperial guest, by instinctive concert as it were, made a strategic movement to the rear. The next day was spent in sight-seeing. The Zoological Gardens first attracted attention. His Imperial Highness was next taken by river to the Botanical Gardens, both the Viceroy and Lady Lansdowne accompanying. The evening was spent at Belvedere, where Calcutta society had once more an opportunity of a scramble with the Imperial visitor. On Wednesday, the entertainments consisted of visits to the mint and the museum, and closed with a Garden Party at Government House. It was a disappointment to Calcutta that the heir to all the Russias' visit was so short, and that the full programme could not be carried out.

It has ever been the glory of the Catholic Church, above all other denominations, Christian or non-Christian, to be the friend of the slave. While others have been indifferent or wavering, and some have not scrupled to quote Scripture in support of the unhallowed dominion of man over man, the Church of Rome alone has, through good report and bad report, despite every temptation, against all odds, proclaimed and sustained the Gospel of human brotherhood—the noblest doctrine of Christianity. This justice it has not only taught but has always striven to realise. As before, so now. We are glad to be able to announce to our readers from a Continental source a most interesting movement at this moment in progress.

Cardinal Lavignerie, the great and good Bishop of Adumeta, who has devoted his life to the suppression of slave trade in the Dark Continent, has at last succeeded in establishing an Order of Volunteers, who will consecrate their lives to the pacific conquest of Sahara.

"To those who wish to enter this association," says the Bishop of Adumeta, "we promise neither gold nor silver, nor do we demand from them religious vows or obligations, we offer them only a life of sacrifice, an occasion to unite themselves to defend oppressed feebleness and perhaps also the flag which they had formerly served. Such is the work of the Brothers of Sahara."

It speaks not a little for the vitality of ascetic religion and for the spirit of self-denying devotion in Christendom, even in this material Age, that such an appeal should be heard.

At the call of the Cardinal, 1,700 men presented themselves to be enlisted as Soldiers of the Cross. From among them, he has selected 50 persons, who form the members of the Order called "The Brothers of Sahara." Biskra is the head-quarters of these hardy pioneers, who will stay there for 15 months to learn the dialects of Sahara and Soudan before they proceed to spread civilisation among the dwellers of the Great Desert.

The Cardinal proposes to open a certain number of stations of work and charity, where those who wish to take an active part in this noble work will receive their practical training, where the travellers of the desert will be received and nourished and where the fugitive slaves, who wish to secure liberty with work, will find a refuge and an asylum.

As we informed our readers last week, the Mahomedans are not unaffected by the Age of Consent Bill, and their objections, though not yet loud, are sufficiently deep. In another column, a genuine Mussalman discusses the subject from the Islamic stand-point with knowledge and calmness. A Mahomedan protest is even more formidable than the Hindu opposition.

ANOTHER Correspondent on a different subject asks a seemingly innocent but really ticklish question. We are in no haste to answer it. The attitude of the shameless man who, after doffing the blanket of the Criminal Jail, flaunts with emphatic bravery his grubby skirts at public places and social parties at Belvedere and Government House, deserves no tenderness. But the poor officials who, in ignorance of the antecedents of native social aspirants, introduce black-sheep into the society of gentlemen and ladies, ought to have an opportunity of rectifying a blunder.

The Rangoon Times has started a mischievous canard. It seems that after the troubles of the last few years, the Burmese of the Upper and Lower Provinces are availing themselves of the peace that at length smiles on them in right earnest as it never did even in the later period of national administration, to repair, repaint and redecorate their religious edifices. Nothing could be more natural. But nothing could be more disastrous to the British power, we are told. The Rangoon Times has sounded the alarm. It is said that there is a general movement for the repair of temples. Not only the Shway Lagon of Rangoon and the Priyodh of Prome may be seen regilding, but the meanest shanties of Buddhist chapels in Burma are said to be under rehabilitation and redaubing. And can all this be a joke? Just so. But the alternative of jest is not madness. And it is a suggestion of madness for the Burmese to rise against the conqueror when they are most down and firm in his grip. Such is the condition of all the Burmas, Upper and Lower, Shans and no Shans. The Burmese are far too sensible to kick at the staring pricks. They will not plunge with open eyes into self-destruction. The Lower Burmese are content and the Upper Burmese, having satisfied their conscience by such resistance as they could make to the stranger, must be now appreciating the peace and certitude of things under the new rule.

THE THEOLOGY OF THE BILL.

WITH reference to the opinion that has been propounded in our last issue as to the proper age for Garbhādhāna, it may be said that the inference, which we drew from the text of Yama,* laying down that after a girl has passed her 12th year without being given in marriage, the father incurs sin, and from Raghunandan's definition of the word Ritu, could not be made to affect the meaning of the texts that declare that consummation was imperative within a certain number of days after a certain event. Fairly considered, such an argument can have no weight whatever in the estimation of Hindu lawyers, as they are bound to interpret the texts of the Saṁhitās in such manner as to avoid the possibility of conflict. Although there is a large number of texts enjoining consummation after Ritu, the interpretation to be put upon them must be such as to make them harmonise with the texts that declare that the maximum limit of age for the marriage of girls is the 12th year. Manu himself says:—

"A man of thirty years may take a girl of twelve years; a man of twentyfour years may take a girl of eight years. One marrying earlier incurs sin."

MANU. CHAP. IX. v. 94.

It cannot be said that this rule applies only to the case of girls in whom the signs of womanhood do not appear at the usual time, for a text of Mahabharat cited in the Udvāha Tatva p. 27, declares expressly that a girl not sufficiently mature may be taken in marriage in her sixteenth year. Taking together all the texts on the subject, it appears that the 12th year is the maximum limit of the proper age for the marriage of girls in all ordinary cases, and even in cases in which puberty may come on prematurely. There are no doubt texts which lay down that the father does incur sin by not giving his daughter in marriage before maturity. But these texts ought to be read with those that declare that the 12th year is the maximum limit of the proper age for the marriage of girls.

* Kanyā dvādaśa varṣāni jā pradatta grihe bharat

Brahma hatyā pitu stāshya śhā kanyā barayet svayam.

Yama cited in Udvāha Tatva p. 26.

By so doing, we arrive at the following results :—

(1) That the father must, as a general rule, marry his daughter within the 12th year.

(2) That in cases in which the signs of womanhood do not appear at the usual period, the father may postpone the marriage of his daughter till her sixteenth year, though by doing so he runs a great risk, for, at any moment, an event might happen that would make the girl ineligible for marriage and consign his soul to hell after his death.

It may be contended that, although the marriage of girls is enjoined, by some texts, within the twelfth year, what our Rishis really meant was that it should take place before the occurrence of a certain event. But there is no ground whatever for supposing that they mention the age limit without any object. On the contrary, the reason why they have done so is so obvious that we cannot afford to overlook it, in interpreting their ordinances. Marriage of girls before puberty is no doubt enjoined by our ancient legislators. But their terrible denunciations are certainly not meant to apply to the father of a girl in whom menstrual symptoms appear prematurely in the tenth or eleventh year.

The view which we take of the texts referred to above, is in accordance with Raghunandana's exposition of the law on the subject, and also with his definition of the term Ritu. But if the considerations which we have already urged, be not sufficient to remove the apprehensions entertained by the orthodox among our countrymen, who take exception to the Consent Bill as an attempt to interfere with our religion, we have only to draw their attention to what is said on the subject in the most authoritative commentary on Manu's Code, namely, that of Medhatithi.

In reconciling the text of Manu which lays down that consummation is obligatory after a certain event, with the direction, given in treatises on ritual, enjoining abstinence from sexual intercourse during the first year after marriage, the great commentator says that, even in cases in which a certain well known event occurs within the first year, the married pair must not proceed to consummate at once, but they must wait till the end of the period, unless their craving for cohabitation be such as to be beyond control.

The following is a translation of the passage in Medhatithi to which we refer :—

"The law relating to marriage has been dealt with. The relationship of husband and wife being complete after the ceremonies, the natural inclination of the parties, unless restrained by the Shasters, might lead them to consummate at once. Hence the prohibitory injunction contained in the text.* The meaning of it is that sexual connection should not commence from the day of marriage, but the parties must wait till the occurrence of a certain event. In the treatises on rituals, it is laid down that after the marriage ceremonies, the married couple must observe the practice of a Brahmachari, and abstain from sexual intercourse and luxurious food, for a certain period, which may extend from three days to one year. This must be reconciled with the above text by holding, that, if a certain event takes place within one year, the parties shall not have sexual intercourse within the period.† It must also be held that the parties should wait till the happening of a certain event if it did not take place within the year. By this interpretation all inconsistency between the different Smritis is avoided."

From the above, it will appear that consummation after a certain event, is not imperative, in all cases. The authority of the great commentator on Manu's Code is clear on the subject, and must be regarded, even by the Bengal Pandits, as conclusive, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the Smriti Tatwas of Raghunandan, the founder of their school.

The Consent Bill in its present form may well be taken exception to on grounds other than religion. But it is hardly fair to our holy Rishis to interpret their ordinances in such manner as to support the view that, under any circumstance, consummation on a child wife of less than twelve years may be obligatory.

JOGENDRA NATH BHATTACHARJEE.

SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT ON LOCAL SELF GOVERNMENT.

Sir Charles Elliott is a plain-spoken man, and we believe there are occasions when plain-speaking in the head of the Government is a salutary departure from the usual official reticence. It removes misconceptions and lets the public into the confidence of Government in matters in which misconceptions breed mischief. Such an occasion was lately furnished to our new Lieutenant-Governor at Cuttack. In an address of welcome given to him by the Municipality of this town, the patriotic fervour generated and kept at white heat by the Congress, found vent in the patronizing expression of a hope that Sir Charles Elliott might have "the same kindly feelings towards Local Self-Government as his illustrious predecessor." Apart from the impropriety of personal allusions of this kind in an interview between persons related to each other in their official capacity, the references in the present case have either no meaning or are an impertinence. Let us see in what sense the words quoted were used by the Municipal Commissioners. As they stand, they are scarcely intelligible. What has the personal kindness of the head of the Government to do with the affairs of a single small municipality? If the Commissioners are modestly conscious of their deficiencies in the administration of their local affairs, the kindness and leniency of the district Magistrate may stand them in some stead. The Magistrate may help them out of difficulties, correct their errors, teach them, advise them, warn them. Even as to the Magistrate, his personal feelings have little scope in a strictly official sphere. He is responsible for the good administration of all district affairs, and those of a municipality being a part of them, he must judge them by the usual standard of efficiency and the accepted principles of official business, without having much room for the exercise of his personal friendliness or, as it is put, "kindly feelings." But let us suppose that in the infancy of this so-called Local Self-Government, the Magistrate, without expecting a too high standard of efficiency, is lenient enough and is easily satisfied with such work as is done, gives kindly guidance and support and thereby does much to help the experiment of non-official administration. But this is so far as the Magistrate, with his direct contact with the municipality, is concerned. How does the Governor's "kindliness" come into the matter? We fail to see. We wonder there was nobody to tell the Cuttack patriots that the head of the Provincial Government is too far-off and great a personage to give them trouble about his personal feelings. They had better try in the first place to win the good graces of the local officers with whom they are more directly concerned.

But we misunderstand our Cuttack friends. They were not bespeaking a kindly attitude in their Ruler towards themselves in particular, but to that fetish of Local Self-Government. They were far from having any modest consciousness of their own shortcomings. They who in their own conceit were well qualified for higher representative institutions were simply incapable of such a libel on themselves. They were on the contrary only suspicious of latent hostility to their political advancement in every incoming Ruler. Now that Sir Stuart Bayley has gone, he is credited with the kindest disposition towards the political aspirations of the people, or at any rate towards Local Self-Government, though as long as he was here, there were the same suspicions as against Sir Charles now. It is all pretence that his noble example is placed before his successor who is asked with a pat on his back, "Well, will you be as he, eh! or do you harbour murderous thoughts upon Lord Ripon's boon?" If this is not the meaning of the Orissa politicians, we are very much mistaken. And they had a match for them in their interlocutor. Sir Charles understood their meaning, and gave them a shrewd reply the meaning of which, we are not sure, they are able to catch. Sir Charles said: "He would show all reasonable encouragement to all Municipalities and Boards. That all people who had anything to do with them should remember that Local Self-Government meant efficient government as well as local. They should not allow matters to take their own course and make it equivalent to non-government. He hoped to see the sanitation of the town properly looked after, and roads in good order." The italics are not ours, but they emphasize the slap Sir Charles gave for the pat given by Orissa's men of light and leading.

Such references in an official document to the personal politics of an official, would be impossible if the nature of the official relations of the two parties were realized. The Municipal Commissioners are either independent of the Government or they are officers subordinate to the Government in respect of their charge of the municipality. We believe the fact of their being honorary officers does not exempt them from a position of quasi subordination and the demeanour and etiquette proper to such a position. But this is not usually understood. A great deal of misconception prevails with regard to the relations of these self-governing bodies to the Government and its responsible officers, and it is in no small degree due to the unfortunate nomenclature of the system. Self-Government is a high-sounding misnomer and anomaly. The Government and the public have no idea of the spirit of disrespect with which instructions issued by the District Magistrate or the Divisional Commissioner, are often treated by these high and mighty Mayors and Aldermen. A Divisional Commissioner, for instance, directs that, in preparing the Budget, the expenditure on education should not exceed a certain percentage. The law gives that officer absolute authority in regard to the Budget, and yet he receives the scantiest respect. The Municipal magnates have their heads turned by the designation of their office. Are they not Commissioners as well as the Commissioner of the Division? and they fly into a rage and talk of resigning in a body, and of other things scarcely meet for ears polite. Probably, the records of the proceedings of their meetings do not bear much trace of the spirit of insubordination which is really shown, but that is often due to the influence of some solitary sober men of business in their counsels. But as to the fact of such a spirit being there, there is no doubt. It is therefore from no feelings of modesty, we may be sure, that the Cuttack Commissioners approached Sir Charles Elliott with their impertinent address. But they have got for their pains what they should lay to heart and not burn their fingers again.

THE MAHOMEDAN OPPOSITION TO THE BILL.

SIR,—It is very strange that, when the discussion on the raising of the age of consent has engrossed the minds of all the enlightened men, the educated Mahomedans here have kept themselves aloof from expressing their views publicly on the present Consent Bill which has already been referred to a Select Committee for report within five weeks. This indifference on the part of the English educated Mahomedans is indeed disheartening to the cause of Islam. It is absurd to suppose that the passing of the Bill will not affect the Mussalmans, on the other hand the Bill interferes with the Mahomedan religion in more than one respect. The Hindoos object to the Bill only on one religious ground. Though we have not the Garbbadban ceremony to observe, yet we have much more weighty grounds, in the interest of the wives under 12 as well as that of the husbands, which go strongly against the passing of the Bill in its present shape.

In case the Bill passes into law, could a wife under 12 years of age justly demand her subsistence allowance called Nafqa from her husband without being cohabited by him? Will it be binding on a husband to give Nafqa to his wife after her attaining puberty, and before cohabiting with her? If the answer be in favour of the wife, then surely the law of Islam will be grossly infringed. In case the wife having attained puberty within 12 years of age, could not get her Nafqa from her husband, the guardian of the wife will have necessarily to supply her with all the necessities of life till she attains the age of 12 years. This burden on her guardian and her own loss are against the law of Islam. The next point is that a wife cannot claim the full amount of her dowry unless she and her husband, both being fit for sexual intercourse, be in a private place, which circumstance is known as the Khelwaati sabiba. The proposed Bill in a manner prohibits the husband from such an intercourse with his matured wife under 12 years of age. Thus the wife's right to her full dowry has been deferred to a period when she will reach her twelfth year. During this period if she becomes widowed or divorced she will for ever lose the half of her dowry. On the other hand, if the husband be compelled to pay his wife the full amount of her dowry without the fulfilment of the holy injunctions of the Mahomedan Law, then surely the religion of Islam is interfered with.

Now let us suppose the husband having consummated the marriage with his wife, on her attaining puberty but under 12 years of age, refuses to pay the Nafqa and full dowry to her. The wife must either give up her claim or go to law. In such a suit against her husband, she must prove the consummation of marriage, which the husband, to escape the punishment prescribed for rape, will be tempted to deny. It is now the wife's turn to establish the truth of her allegation. She is forced to extreme measures, and submits herself to medical examination to the eternal disgrace of the persons concerned and their families. The next is the husband's turn. He has laid himself open to perjury and may also be prosecuted for rape on his wife, and probably passes a portion of his days in prison.

Moreover, it is to be considered whether the offspring or the issue of such a pair is to be looked upon as legitimate or not. If the issue be legitimate, then the father of the child could not be criminally prosecuted according to the Mahomedan Law. On the other hand, if the issue be stigmatized as illegitimate, then the marriage itself will be null and void, and the child will be forced to lose much of its social status in Mahomedan society, against the law of Islam.

I need hardly mention that the views expressed by the Hon'ble Nawab Ashanullah Khan Bahadur are not consistent with those of the well versed in Mahomedan Law. Our marriage law is so intricate that a change in the age of consent cannot be achieved unless the law relating to Dower, Nafqa, &c., is accordingly altered, and to make any alteration in this respect is an unlawful interference with the divine law of Islam.

If the Bill is meant to put a stop to Hari Maitism, it must be amended in a way that it may afford free scope to the observances of the religious rites of the Indians, and at the same time discourage marriages between adult husbands and child wives. I would therefore suggest that the section in question should run thus :—If the sexual intercourse was by a man above a certain age (here the age is to be limited), and not by a man under that age, with his own wife under 12, it shall be &c., &c. If the wording of the Section be something of the above nature, the parents of the female children will try to marry their daughters to individuals of proportionate age and avoid giving away their infant daughters to adults; and thus the great evils that often accrue from sexual intercourse by adult husbands with child-wives will be exterminated. And at the same time marriages between boys and girls of proportionate age will be resorted to and such unions will in every respect end happily. There are other social advantages in marrying such pairs.

In conclusion, I again beg to protest against the Bill in its present shape on behalf of the Moulvies and the theologians of the Mahomedan religion, and humbly beseech the Government either to abandon it altogether or make such alterations that it may answer the religious purposes of the Indians.

A MUSSALMAN.

THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AND ETIQUETTE.

SIR,—Is it permissible in English Society or Etiquette for the Government to invite at the Government House or at Durbars or indeed at other similar public gatherings, or to grant interviews to one who has been convicted and has undergone rigorous imprisonment for a long term, on a serious nonbailable and noncompoundable offence under the Indian Penal Code, and would not such action of the Government compromise other visitors? Craving your valuable and experienced opinion in a foot note,

INQUIRER.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpur, 25th January 1891.

We had very foul weather recently. There were rains accompanied by gale for some time, which made the atmosphere almost unbearably cold.

Some changes in the personnel of the higher grade of the E. I. Railway Company, such as Agent, Traffic Manager, &c., are to take place shortly.

The New Year opened here very quietly, there being no sports, as in previous years.

Messrs. Moore & Co. and Arthur Campbell & Co., of Calcutta, having opened branch shops here prior to the Xmas Holidays, secured a goodly sale of their piecegoods, dolls and other fancy things at hard cash prices, to the detriment of the local traders.

For Christmas festivities, we had a Magician in Professor Hoffman who entertained us with his jugglery and ventriloquism in the E. I. Railway Company's Mechanics' Institute for two successive nights. He enlivened and enchanted the Jamalpur public with his wonderful skill.

There is an outcry all over the country over the Age of Consent Bill. Meetings are being held not only in the metropolis, and its suburbs, but also in the mofussil in country towns and the principal Railway changing stations, and memorials drawn up for presentation to the Viceroy protesting against the Bill. As the matter is of vital importance to the Hindoo community at large, nay to Aryans generally, the point being socio-religious and as the majority of the people are against the measure, it being repugnant to their feelings, I for one would humbly suggest to our enlightened and educated countrymen to ponder over the matter seriously and come to a proper decision after careful and mature thought. It is an admitted and well known fact, that as education spreads, men's tastes for enlightenment advance. This is a common law or rule every where, no one can possibly deny it, as alleged by our so called reformers. But that is no reason why the sayings of our sages, the old Rishis, should be ignored altogether. If the bill be passed into law, it will lead to evils graver than those of early marriage at which it is aimed.

THE CONVOCATION OF THE CALCUTTA UNIVERSITY.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR'S ADDRESS.

The Vice-Chancellor (the Hon'ble Justice Gurudas Bannerjee) delivered his address as follows :—

Your Excellency, Sir Charles Elliott, Ladies and Gentlemen.—The year that has just gone by has not been without incidents worthy of notice on this occasion. To some of these I shall briefly allude, before I turn my attention to matters which concern us in the present and near future. Foremost among the incidents of the year under review, I should mention the recognition of the elective principle in the appointment of Fellows. Under the law, as it now stands, the right to appoint Fellows is vested in the Governor-General of India in Council; and His Excellency the Chancellor, in accordance with the views expressed in his last Convocation speech, was graciously pleased to invite the M. As. and holders of corresponding Degrees in the other Faculties, to choose from among themselves two gentlemen whom they would recommend for appointment as Fellows, the number two being about a third of the total number of Fellows then considered likely to be appointed. The graduates, who naturally prized the privilege, evinced a lively interest in the election that was held at the Senate House on the 1st of January, 1891, and I am happy to be able to say that their choice has met with the approval of His Excellency the Chancellor. You will be delighted to hear that among the electors present on this occasion was the distinguished lady graduate who is now the Superintendent of the Bethune College. * * The 1st of January, 1891, will be a memorable day in the history of the University, and we may hope that the principle of representation will be recognised in its constitution as fully and definitely as sound policy and right reason will allow. In close connection with this topic, I should notice the recent resolution of the Senate to apply to the Legislature for the amendment of our Act of Incorporation so as to allow the graduates the right to nominate one-half of the number of Fellows to be appointed every year, and to enlarge the scope of the University by removing the restriction which makes it at present a mere examining body. Of this application it is not for me now to say more than this, that the recommendations of the Senate proceed for the most part upon the lines on which the Allahabad University Act is based, and that the Metropolitan University may well hope to have as liberal a constitution and as free a scope as her younger provincial sister has already been favoured with. Another measure carried out last year, which is of importance to us as an examining body, deserves here a passing notice. The Syndicate has formally adopted the rule that no one shall be appointed to set questions on any subject of which he teaches the whole or a part. The rule is not meant to imply in the least degree any slur on the integrity of our examiners. It will relieve the public mind from all possible apprehension that one class of candidates may have any undue advantage over another. It is intended also to relieve the examiners themselves from an embarrassing conflict of duties. * *

DISCOURAGING CRAM.

No objection has, so far as I am aware, been raised that the courses of study prescribed for our different examinations include anything but useful knowledge, though objection may be taken that they exclude certain branches of useful knowledge. I wish very much that every graduate of our University and every educated man had some knowledge of the structure and functions of the different parts of that wonderful piece of mechanism, whose regular working is a necessary condition for the acquisition of knowledge, such knowledge, by confirming our faith in the laws of nature, will be sure internally to influence our conduct for the better in many matters in which external influence, however benevolent, may prove irritating or powerless. I hope it would be possible to introduce elementary physiology into our general curriculum of studies without increasing very much the burden of our students. I also deem it not merely desirable, but necessary, that we should encourage the study of those Indian vernaculars that have a literature, by making them compulsory subjects of our examinations in conjunction with their kindred classical languages. The Bengalee language has now a rich literature that is well worthy of study, and Urdu and Hindi are also progressing fairly in the same direction. In laying stress upon the importance of the study of our vernaculars, I am not led by any mere patriotic sentiment, excusable as such sentiment may be, but I am influenced by more substantial reasons. I firmly believe that we cannot have any thorough and extensive culture as a nation, unless knowledge is disseminated through our own vernaculars. * * A pernicious practice has, I fear, been growing with our students preparing for the under-graduates' examinations of indiscriminately and unintelligently committing to memory the contents of their text-books. Such a practice should be put down by teachers, and it should be discouraged as far as possible by examiners by leaving out minute questions which can only test mechanical memory. Examination papers should not, as a rule, exact from candidates greater knowledge of minute details in any subject than they should be required to carry in their memory in after-life. It must be freely admitted that ordinary examinations can afford no test of the culture of the emotions and the will, except so far as the prosecution of vigorous study which is essential to success at such examinations, implies a well regulated moral nature. The only way in which a mere examining University like ours, as distinguished from a teaching University, can encourage and assist the cultivation of the emotions and the will is, by insisting upon regular preparatory training and discipline of a thorough and strict character as a necessary condition for appearing at its examinations. The framers of our Act of Incorporation must have fully perceived this; and accordingly they have provided in the Act that, as a rule, no one shall be admitted as a candidate for any of our Degrees, unless he produces a certificate that he has prosecuted a regular course of study in a recognised institution. It is very much to be regretted that the importance of such certificate is often not fully realised. It is generally supposed that the object of requiring this certificate is to obtain evidence of a candidate's intellectual fitness for an examination, and if that is its object, it is naturally considered a hardship that it should be strictly insisted upon, when the candidate is prepared to take the risk of failure, and when the examination to be undergone will be a sufficient test of fitness. But the real object of a systematic course of college discipline is to produce, not mere intellectual fitness, but also moral fitness, by training the emotions and the will, and by fostering habits of punctuality, patience, and perseverance. This was the object of that stern discipline and rigid self-denial, that brahmakurva which our sages enjoin on the students, and the strict observance of which was the principal cause of that intellectual and moral greatness of ancient India which we still look back upon with pride. When once the real object of our rule for insisting on a systematic course of preparatory training is fully understood, our students, who justly take pride in their character for obedience to law and authority as a national virtue, will, I am sure, be the foremost to carry out the rule scrupulously and in an ungrudging spirit. We are often asked whether our examinations afford any good test even of intellectual merit. I do not deny that young men not possessing any solid knowledge or power of thinking may, with the help of mere mechanical memory, make a show of knowledge, and come out successful at our examinations. But I deny that this is anything peculiar to our system of examination. The evil complained of is almost a necessary concomitant of competitive and qualifying examinations wherever they are held. We learn from eminent men of Oxford and Cambridge, who have written on the subject, that the evil is just as prevalent in those great seats of learning as it is here. The truth is, that, with the growing importance of examinations, there has grown up an art known by the unenviable name of cramming, the object of which is to enable students to pass examinations without possessing any solid knowledge, and without spending much thought, though certainly not without spending much time and labour. The art is in high favour with lazy and indifferent students, who think it easier to learn how to make a show of knowledge than to acquire knowledge;—to appropriate the thoughts of others than to think for themselves. And they may sometimes deceive examiners and frustrate the object of examination. The question for us to consider is how to put down this evil. To my mind the only practical remedy appears to be to conduct our examinations so that students may perceive that cramming is neither necessary nor sufficient to ensure success. Two things appear to me to have led students to consider cramming necessary—first, inordinately long examination papers, and secondly, disproportionately difficult questions. I am fully aware of the reasons in favour of long papers and difficult questions; it is only by means of these that the qualities of readiness and aptness can be tested. But on the other hand, we must remember that if examination papers are so long that candidates must (to use the words of Dr. Whewell) “scribble in tempestuous haste” to answer them fully, or if they are so difficult that candidates left to their own resources are unable to answer them, they must have recourse to the kind of help that cramming gives to prepare themselves for their examinations. If you do not give them time to think in the examination hall, or if you demand from them thoughts beyond the reach of their powers, you cannot complain that they depend entirely upon memory, or borrow the thoughts of others without going through the process of thinking. Again, students find that the necessary qualifying standard may be attained by the help of memory alone, the less able and less ambitious among them will not find much inducement to go through the arduous process of exercising the reasoning faculty. If we want to put down cramming, and encourage thought, we should then be careful not to set too long or too difficult papers, or papers in which the minimum pass marks are obtainable by the exercise of memory alone.

Holloway's Pills.—Factory Operatives and Workers in Manufactories.—The remarkable remedies which have been discovered and perfected by Thomas Holloway, and which have for more than fifty years been successfully used in every quarter of the globe, are especially useful in all the manifold ailments which afflict those who by reason of their occupation are confined for years, or all their lives, in crowded buildings and workshops. Holloway's Pills and Ointment are associated remedies, the former restoring the vital powers when diminished, and always acting as an efficient blood purifier, whilst the latter relieves local maladies, checks inflammation, and acts as a cleansing and healing agent in cases of bad legs, bad breasts, ulcers and unhealthy sores of all kinds.

We should also discourage the taking up of too many honour subjects by candidates for our examinations. We should aim at securing depth even at the expense of surface. There is more psychological truth than poetical fancy in Pope's well known lines—

“One science only will one genius fit :
So vast is art, so narrow human wit.”

Whilst this seems to be almost all that we can do, our efforts in this direction, in order to be effective, require the active co-operation of the teachers and professors of our affiliated institutions. They should always bear in mind that teaching should never be subordinated to examination, but that the purposes of examination are subordinate to those of teaching. They should impress on students the mischievous effects of cramming which involves waste of time and energy, without training the mind or imparting real knowledge. Our students should be exhorted not to allow the distressing phantom of an impending examination to haunt them in their hours of study, but to read whatever they have to read thoughtfully, and with the cheering assurance that they are thereby either training the mind or storing it with useful knowledge.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

There is one other point connected with our system of education which deserves notice. As the learned professions and all departments of service, whether public or private, in which persons who have received a liberal as distinguished from a technical education can find employment, are getting daily more and more over-stocked, some true friends of the country think that the kind of education which our University now encourages cannot be regarded as useful for all those who are seeking it, and that it is time that the University should begin to recognise the necessity of technical education, and institute examinations, and confer marks of distinction for its encouragement. I fully see the importance and necessity of technical education. In these days of keen competition and hard struggle for existence, unless we can utilise and improve the products of Nature, and unless our artisans are trained in the application of science to art, we can never hope for the material prosperity of the country. If therefore Government or enlightened private liberality should establish suitable institutions for imparting technical education, the University should feel no hesitation in encouraging it by introducing an alternative practical Entrance examination as was once suggested by a high authority, or by conferring marks of distinction on deserving persons educated in such institutions, or in such other modes as may be thought fit. Perhaps this would be beyond the scope of the University as limited by the present statute, but it may be hoped that this limitation on our scope will be removed. But whilst saying so, I must not be understood for one moment to admit that liberal education has in this country reached anything like its saturation point, and that its further progress is not to be encouraged; or that an educated man will be any the less fitted by reason of his education to fill any station in life however humble and however inferior to that generally occupied by men of his class it may be.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

Turning now to my young friends who have just earned their well-merited marks of distinction, I must first of all heartily congratulate our lady graduates in Arts for the high proficiency they have shown, one of them, Florence Holland, having obtained double first class Honours, that is, Honours in English and Latin, and the other three having all obtained Honours in English. (Applause). I should next offer my hearty congratulations to the lady graduates in Medicine for the proficiency they have attained in that noble science, and I am sure that the knowledge they have acquired will not only be useful to them, but will be of incalculable benefit to their secluded sisters in the zenana. The encouragement of female education by its degrees and other marks of distinction must rank as one of the highest useful functions of this University. No community can be said to be an educated community unless its female members are educated, that is, not simply taught to read and write, but educated in the true and full sense of the word. For however proud man may boast of his intellectual superiority over the gentler sex, the simple truth must be admitted that woman is the primary educator of humanity. With the first dawn of reason, and before our baby lips even learn to lisp, our real education begins in the mother's arm; and every fond word she speaks and every anxious look she casts impresses silently but indelibly some lasting lesson on the growing mind. And what moralist is there that can better teach the cultivation of the finer feelings than a loving mother, a loving sister, a loving wife, and a loving daughter? It is, therefore, that our Eastern mind, notwithstanding its supposed antipathy towards the fair sex, conceived the genius of learning to be a female divinity (applause); and it is therefore that our sage lawgiver Manu, notwithstanding the harshness to females which characterises archaic codes, has inculcated that memorable precept, “Where women are honored, there the gods rejoice; where they are not honored, there all rites are fruitless.” (Applause). To the other graduates I must offer my congratulations generally, making special mention of two—Nilratan Sarkar, an M.A. of the University, who has just taken the highest degree in Medicine, and Upendralal Majumdar, who has had an exceptionally brilliant career, having been the first man of his year in all our Arts examinations, and who has now passed the highest of them, and won our highest prize—the Premchand Roychand studentship. (Applause.) But while saying this, I must earnestly remind each of them of the noble precept—“Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required.”

The Vice-Chancellor concluded with a few words addressed to the graduates, and then declared the Convocation closed.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

SHAMUS O'BRIEN—A BALLAD,

BEGUN IN IRELAND, AND FINISHED ELSEWHERE.

The mornin' was bright, an' the mists rose on high,
An' the lark whistled merrily in the clear sky ;
But why are the men standin' idle so late ?
An' why do the crowds gather fast in the street ?
What come they to talk of ? what come they to see ?
An' why does the long rope hang from the cross-tree ?
Oh, Shamus O'Brien, pray fervent and fast,
May the saints take your soul, for this day is your last ;
Pray fast and pray sthrong, for the moment is nigh,
When, sthrong, proud, an' great as you are, you must die.
An' faster an' faster the crowd gathered there,
Boys, horses, and gingerbread, just like a fair ;
An' whiskey was sellin', an' cussamuck too,
An' ould men and young women enjoying the view.
An' ould Tim Mulvany, he med the remark,
There was n't sich a sight since the time of Noah's ark ;
An' be gorry 't was throe for him, for devil such a scruge,
Sich divarshin an' crowds, was known since the deluge.
For thousands were gathered there if there was one,
Waitin' till sich time as the hangin' id come on.
At last threw open the big prison gate,
An' out came the sheriffs and sojers in state,
An' a cart in the middle, an' Shamus was in it,
Not paler, but prouder than ever, that minute.
An' as soon as the people saw Shamus O'Brien,
Wid prayin', and blessin', an' all the girls cryin',
A wild, wailin' sound kem on all by degrees,
Like the sound of the lonesome wind blowin' through trees.
On, on, to the gallows, the sheriffs are gone,
An' the cart an' the sojers go steadily on ;
An' at every side swellin' around of the cart,
A wild, sorrowful sound, that id open your heart.
Now under the gallows the cart takes its stand,
An' the hangman gets up with the rope in his hand ;
An' the priest, havin' blessed him, goes down on the ground,
An' Shamus O'Brien throws one last look round.
Then the hangman drew near, an' the people grew still,
Young faces turned sickly, and warm hearts turned chill ;
An' the rope bein' ready, his neck was made bare,
For the gripe iv the life-strangling cord to prepare ;
An' the good priest has left him, havin' said his last prayer.
But the good priest did more, for his hands he unbound,
And with one daring spring, Jim has leaped on the ground.
Bang, bang ! goes the carbines, and clash goes the sabres ;
" He's not down ! he's alive still ! now stand to him, neighbors ! "

Through the smoke and the horses he's into the crowd,
By the heavens, he's free ! than thunder more loud,
By one shout from the people the heavens were shaken,
One shout that the dead of the world might awaken.
Your swords they may glitter, your carbines go bang !
But if you want hangin', it 's yourself you must hang ;
To-night he 'll be sleepin' in Aherloe Glin,
An' the devil 's in the dice if you catch him agin.
The sojers ran this way, the sheriffs ran that,
An' father Malone lost his new Sunday hat ;
An' the sheriffs wor both of them punished severely,
An' fined like the devil, because Jim done them fairly.

A week after dis time, widout firing a cannon,
A sharp Yankee schooner sailed out of the Shannon,
And the captain left word he was goin' to Cork ;
But the devil a bit—he was bound to New York ;
And that very night she ran so near the land,
That some thought she would strike upon Galtimore strand ;
But before the daylight, like a winged sea-mew,
As swift and as fleet to the westward she flew.
" Bad luck," said the police, " Bad luck," said the sojer,
" We tot dat we had him," but Jim proved a dodger.

The very next spring—a bright morning in May—
Just six months after the " great hanging day,"
A letter was brought to the town of Kildare,
And on the outside was written out fair,
" To ould Mrs. O'Brien, in Ireland or elsewhere."
And the inside began—" My dear good ould mother,
I 'm safe and am happy---and not wishin' to bother
You in the radin, (with the help of the priest,)
I send you enclosed in this letter at laist
Enuf to pay him, and to fetch you away
To this, land of the free and brave, Amerika.
Here you 'll be happy, and never made cryin',
So long as you 're Mother of Shamus O'Brien ;
Give my love to swate Biddy, and tell her beware
Of that spalpeen who calls himself ' Lord of Kildare ; '
And just say to the judge, I don't now care a rap
For him, or his wig, or his dirty black cap.
And as for dragoons, them paid men of slaughter,
Say I love them as the devil loves holy water.
And now, my good mother, one word of advice ;
Fill your bag with potatoes, and whiskey, and rice,
And when ye start from ould Ireland, take passage at Cork,
And come strate over to the town of New York,
And there ax the mayor the best way to go
To the State of Sinsnaty—in the town of Ohio,
For 't is dare you will find me, widout much tryin',
At ' The Harp and the Eagle,' kept by Shamus O'Brien."

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

HAVING, from week to week, been compelled to keep back, locked up in type, our account of the address to the Lieutenant-Governor and the documents connected with or arising out of the most important part of his reply, we decide to introduce these here at the outset.

On the 21st January, about forty native gentlemen, headed by Prince Furruck Shah, Coomar Debendro Mullick and others, waited on the Lieutenant-Governor with a welcome address from the general community signed by about one hundred citizens. The occasion was marked by the reply. Sir Charles Elliott, as a practical man and relying on a gracious Providence, means to govern Bengal himself. He will use his own eyes and ears in the art. He regretted that, unlike the Governors of other Provinces, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is obliged to keep to Calcutta during the winter months, while the Governor-General is here and holding his Council as it is also the season for the Bengal Legislative Council. He will therefore make short tours into parts accessible from Calcutta in a few days, such as his last Cuttack tour. We hope, however, he will not, like Sir Richard Temple, leave Belvedere to darkness and silence, to scour the country at his own sweet will. He will, besides, hold confidential, free and open intercourse with the leaders of society. We may take it upon ourselves to add, from what we have learnt from those who saw him in Assam, that he will not neglect the led. He will miss no opportunity of information. The conclusion of the reply was a surprise to the courtly Fort. It was an agreeable surprise to the general community. The Lieutenant-Governor withdrew the reply of his Private Secretary to the Congress (Reception Committee) Secretary. Sir Charles himself, on his return from Cuttack, had been surprised with a communication from the Viceroy, and he explained to the deputation that "There has been a mistaken impression which has got abroad, that the Government is hostile to the Congress. That has been partly due to a misapprehension as to the intention of the orders of Government, which has held that in a country like India, where an official is hardly ever able to divest himself of his official position, it is difficult for him to show any interest, or take any share, in a movement like this, without its being supposed that he has a bias one way or the other in the matter. Now, it should be understood, that while the Government has no bias whatever either for or against the Congress, Government is extremely desirous of obtaining such information as the leaders of educated society, who form the Congress, are able to give it (applause). Those of you, gentlemen, who are sufficiently near to the seat of Government, know what anxious and painstaking care and efforts are made to learn the tone and tendency of public opinion on any of the great measures which are put forward, or are in any form contemplated. It is difficult for me to describe to those who don't know it the pains which are taken in this direction, and the extent to which circulars are sent out, and copies of bills circulated to every person who is thought likely to be able or willing to furnish the Government with useful information on contemplated measures. I have been surprised to learn to what extent that fact has failed to be recognised amongst those visitors from England who come here interested in the state of public opinion, and anxious to learn what the development of the new movement will be. I am glad, therefore, to take this opportunity, in the presence of you gentlemen who know the facts, and would contradict me if I was mistaken or exaggerating: I am glad to say that if the Government of India is, to a certain extent, and must be from its nature, a despotism, it is a despotism tempered in the highest degree by an anxious and careful endeavour to feel the pulse of the public, and to follow in the direction which the wisest and most influential members of the public indicate as the tendency which ought to be adopted. I do not suppose that any cautious statesmanlike mind can conceive that representative government, as it is understood in England, can be, in the present state of things, introduced into India; but all that representative government can give in the way of indicating its views as to what can be done, how any measure should be carried out, all that a representative government can supply, is supplied, when a community represented by such leaders of public opinion as you are, come forward to meet the Lieutenant-Governor and profess yourselves ready, at the sacrifice of your own time and your own private interests, to assist him by every means in your power with your advice and with the knowledge you possess." His Excellency the Viceroy has lately been moved to write a letter indicating these views of the Government, which letter is about to be published."

The very closing words were still more cheering:—

"I shall value the handsome casket in which you have enclosed it (the address) as a mark of the excellence of the workmanship of the Native artisans of the country, whose skill and taste will, I trust, always be encouraged by the Government, and not be allowed to be superseded by the works of European artists."

THE letter alluded to in the reply runs thus:—

"Government House,
Calcutta, January, 19th 1891.

DEAR SIR,

With reference to the communications which have recently taken place, first, between Mr. Mehta and the Viceroy, and, after Mr. Mehta's departure from Calcutta, between yourself and His Excellency, upon the subject of the letter received by the Secretary of the Reception Committee from the Private Secretary of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, in reference to the attendance of Government servants at meetings of the Congress, I am authorized by His Excellency to say that Mr. Lyon's letter of December 26th, in which it was stated that "the orders of the Government of India definitely prohibit the presence of Government officials at such meetings," and the Circular in which that letter was communicated to the heads of departments under the Bengal Government were issued under a misapprehension as to the purport of the orders of the Government of India. It was at once recognised both by the Government of Bengal, of its own motion, and by the Government of India, that the letter in question went beyond those orders, and an amended Circular, in which it was pointed out that the expression "absolute prohibition" had reference only to the participation of Government officials in the proceedings of a political meeting, was subsequently issued by the Bengal Government to the heads of departments. I enclose herewith a copy of the orders of the Government of India.

These orders, which arose out of a totally different matter, had no special reference to the Congress movement, and were certainly not framed in a spirit of hostility to it. The publications of some of the supporters of the Congress have, in the opinion of the Government of India, been open to serious question; but, apart from this, the movement is regarded as one of those which, in the words of the Circular, are "perfectly legitimate in themselves, and which private persons are free to promote," but from participation in which Government officials are, for the reasons specified in the orders, necessarily debarred.

The Government of India recognise that the Congress movement is regarded as representing in India what in Europe would be called the more advanced Liberal party, as distinguished from the great body of Conservative opinion which exists side by side with it. They desire themselves to maintain an attitude of neutrality in their relations with both parties, as long as these act strictly within constitutional limits.

They intend that all Government servants shall preserve a similar attitude of neutrality, and shall abstain from active participation in political or quasi-political movements of all kinds; and also from putting pressure upon others in order to induce them to take part, or not to take part, in any movement which is legitimate in itself. It was with the above objects that the orders of March 1890 were issued.

In reference to a specific question which you addressed to His Excellency, I am to say that the orders apply only to those who are actually, at the time being, Government servants, but not to pensioners and others who have quitted the service of the Government for good.

Yours truly,
J. C. ARDAGH, COLONEL,
Private Secretary to the Viceroy.

To
A. O. HUME, Esq., C. B."

WE reproduce below the order of March last:—

"No. 11—679-88.

FROM—C. J. LYALL ESQ., C.I.E.,

Off. Secy. to the Govt. of India,

TO—ALL LOCAL GOVERNMENTS AND ADMINISTRATIONS.
Home Department-Public.

Calcutta, March 18th, 1890.

SIR,

I am directed to say that the Governor-General in Council has had under consideration the attitude which should be maintained by officers in the service of Government towards political or quasi-political movements with which they may be brought in contact. Servants of Government have not the same liberty of action as private individuals, and are bound to hold themselves aloof from many movements which are perfectly legitimate in themselves and which private persons are free to promote. Their participation in such movements is open to objection, because their connection with them is likely to create, and even to be appealed to for the purpose of creating, a false impression in the minds of ignorant persons that such movements have the countenance of Government, and because their influence with the community at large is liable to be impaired by their identifying themselves with the class by which the movement is promoted.

2. For these reasons His Excellency in Council desires that the following rules may be observed by all Government servants:—

- (a) As a general rule no officer of Government should attend at a political meeting where the fact of his presence is likely to be misconstrued or to impair his usefulness as an official.
- (b) No officer of Government may take part in the proceedings of a political meeting or in organizing or prompting a political meeting or agitation.
- (c) If in any case an officer is in doubt whether any action which he proposes to take would contravene the terms of this order, the matter should be referred to the Head of the Department or District, and if necessary to the Local Government or Administration."

THE following is Mr. Hume's confidential commentary on the Government letter of January. Though marked not for publication, we make no hesitation in publishing it, as it is out in all the papers. The italics in the letter are those of the original. It originally appeared in the Pioneer:—

"Urgent. Strictly Confidential. And for your own information only: Not under any circumstances for publication.

Calcutta, 21st January 1891.

To
The Secretary of the Congress Committee.

Dear Sir,—I enclose herewith . . . copies of papers, which I have sent for publication to all newspapers.

They are of vital importance, and embody a charter of liberty of opinion and action in political matters for which we have long been calling.

I trust that your Committee will use their best efforts to spread a knowledge of Lord Lansdowne's letter in every village. Nay more, Native Chiefs, many of whom are favourable to our cause but have hitherto abstained from pecuniary assistance, or have contributed only under promise of secrecy, owing to the pressure put on them by the officials, should all be furnished with copies; and every Committee should send such to every Chief and Noble, with whom, in consequence of friendship with any of his officials or any other cause, they are in any degree in touch.

It cannot now be too widely made known, or too emphatically pressed home, that the Viceroy has formally declared that the Congress is a perfectly legitimate movement; that every one, not a Government official, is perfectly free to join it; and that all officials are explicitly enjoined not to impede the movement in any way, and not to put any pressure on any one to induce them to abstain from aiding or joining it.

Of course, it will now be one of your most prominent duties to watch closely to see that his Excellency's orders are loyally carried out, and to bring at once publicly to the notice of the local administration any infraction of the just and statesmanlike rules laid down by the Viceroy.

It seems almost needless to point out that His Excellency had taken a great, decided, and unusual step to secure justice for us: that he has done so in the teeth of strong bureaucratic opposition; and that it is our duty, while absolutely abstaining from any note of triumph over the officials—from any word that may embitter further a feud that we can now afford to ignore and suffer to fade into oblivion—to show in the most unmistakable manner how highly we appreciate Lord Lansdowne's courageous vindication of popular liberty of speech and action in political matters; and how grateful we feel to him for this renewed charter of civil liberty.

I think Public Meetings should be called and thanks publicly voted to him; but at these the utmost care should be taken that nothing is said to wound the feelings of our late opponents (and persecutors in many cases)—the local officials. Really Lord Lansdowne, if the whole facts could be stated, has behaved most nobly. Let us show that we can behave with equal nobility.

Yours obediently,
ALLAN O. HUME.
General Secretary, Indian National Congress."

MONSIEUR Clement Thomas, the new Governor of French India, arrived at Pondicherry on Sunday, the 1st February, and was immediately installed in his post.

ORDERS have been passed for the abolition of the British Consulates in Pondicherry and Karaikal. The Consuls in those small French specs in British India have very little if anything to do.

ANOTHER small reform is announced. Members of Council are no longer to have the exclusive luxury of travelling with their families in railway saloons constructed and set apart for their special use. The Secretary of State has detected therein an abuse of power, and has ordered that those carriages are to be used for any purpose for which they are fit. A Member of Council may have such a carriage if available and must pay for his family travelling with him.

SIR Auckland Colvin has renewed his Legislative Council. Mr. J. Deas, the new Legal Remembrancer of the N.-W. P., has, as a matter of course, been taken in as an Honorable Member. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan and Mr. W. C. Bennett have been given a fresh term. The new members are Mr. J. J. F. Lumsden, Mr. G. T. Spinkie, Rana Sir Shankar Baksh Sing, of Khajurgaon, Baboo Bireswar Mitter of Benares, Mr. A. Izat, and Mr. J. Woodburn.

MR. A. P. MacDonnell arrived at Nagpore last week and took over charge as Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces.

MR. Justice Tottenham will preside at the next Criminal Sessions, being the first of 1891, which has been fixed for Wednesday, the 18th February.

MR. F. J. Marsden, the Chief Presidency Magistrate on furlough, has taken seven months' extraordinary leave without pay.

BABOO Hurri Chaitanyo Ghose, First Inspector of Registration Offices, having taken three months' leave, the second Inspector Mr. H. B. Beames acts as the First Inspector and Moulvi Syed Mahomed Khan

Bahadar, Deputy Magistrate and Deputy Collector, Patna, officiates as the Second Inspector. The Moulvi has had registration experience before he was taken in in the subordinate executive service, and has well deserved the confidence of Government.

MR. Spencer exhibited his parachute skill at Madras on the 30th January last. There was an immense crowd of 15,000 in the enclosure and 70,000 outside. The receipts at the gate are said to have come up to Rs. 13,000.

THE Magistrate of Shahjehanpore and the Inspector-General of Police proposed to billet additional Police on the village of Dhakia Penth in that District, by way of punishment for its turbulent spirits. The Lieutenant-Governor has given the order.

ON and after the 15th February 1891, port dues will be levied at the rate of one anna per ton at the Port of Pooree upon every sea-going vessel of the burden of ten tons and upwards whenever the vessel enters the port, except in the case of mail steamers and coasting vessels, which will not be chargeable more than once in sixty days.

WE read in the Deccan Times that Captain Farrell has imported into India the hydrophobia virus. He keeps it, "so to say, alive by continuing to inoculate healthy rabbits from diseased ones." No arrangements have yet been made for "carrying out his experiment in one of the Hyderabad hospitals."

ONE Bhagwan, a Hindu Pariah we suppose, by profession a ship's cook, has been brought over to Liverpool from New York charged with murder on board. He was cook of the British ship Buckingham, Captain Lyall, which sailed on the 9th October from Dundee for New York. Captain Lyall was accompanied by his wife. The 11th October was their wedding anniversary, and it was signalised by the mariner husband with abuse and assault on the Asiatic cook. This fellow proved no mild Hindu. He watched his opportunity, and in less than a quarter of an hour sprang upon the doomed commander in the mess room, in the presence of poor Mrs. Lyall, and inflicted with a sheath knife four successive cuts any one of which might prove fatal, they all penetrating to the brain.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Bengal Times reports that the princely Shao of East Bengal, Baboo Mohini Mohan Das, has by an arrangement paid off his debt to his cousins the brothers Rupa and Raghu. It seems that the Babu, during the time he was under the cloud of debt, had not been well-treated by his previous friends. That is the way of the world. We only hope that the "arrangement" is thorough and beneficial, and that Mohini does not escape the frying pan to leap into the fire.

In his day, he lived in style. His name was heard at every race meeting in India. The Turf was a formidable drain on the purse. And then he had to purchase—by borrowing—the share of his brother, Kshetra Mohan, and a part of Lal Mohan's share in the family estate. On these occasions, Rup Lal advanced the money. The original over two lacs swelled to near three. At length, the creditor sued the debtor.

IN the New York Tribune, Mr. Earnest Whitney earnestly suggests "a committee chosen by the philological societies of England and America to take up the work" of harmonizing the pronunciation. He says that "in England, where we should naturally look for a standard, pronunciation in general is worse than in America." The "one hundred Americans, representing all cultured professions in all sections of the nation," who were asked by Mr. Whitney to give their pronunciation of a list of 150 words, have only enveloped him in Cimmerian confusion. Eightythree out of the hundred referees themselves call several of these cultured pronunciations simply "extraordinary." Others are surprising for the variations between English and American sounds of even the simplest words. Thus, we are told that the short "a" is used by a large majority of the 100 in such words as "azure," "pageant," "patent," and even in "rather," while the long "a" is preferred in "satyr," 64 per cent. give "vase" as if it were spelt "vaice."

THE will of the late Countess of Rosebery which was lately reported in the papers, gave an erroneous impression of her fortune. It appears from a letter of the London Correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, that her father, Baron Meyer Rothschild, bequeathed to her absolute disposal, free from conditions, settlements or trusts of any kind whatever, real property—lands, houses, &c.,—with an income of over a lac of Rupees (about £10,000) and over three crores of personalty (two millions and a half pounds sterling.) When the accomplished Earl wooed and won the magnificent heiress, the good lady settled her vast fortune by an elaborate deed on her husband and children, Mentmore, for one, and all its costly contents being settled on the second son.

CAPTAIN Hayes thus announces the end of the Crofton-Hayes suit:—

"My readers will remember that Mr. Crofton brought a suit against us for Rs. 15,000 damages; for, as he said, publishing a libel against him and his company, in that our drama critic doubted their ability to play Shakespeare. Before this suit was instituted, we apologised for commenting adversely in anticipation on Mr. Crofton's show; but nothing except heavy damages would satisfy him. As we considered the remarks made in our paper were in no way libellous, the suit went on. About a month ago Mr. Crofton made the overture to us that if we were willing to pay the costs on both sides, he would withdraw the suit and all claims for damages. Feeling convinced that there was no libel, we refused the offer; but in deference to the uncertainty of law and its heavy expenses, we were willing to pay our own costs. In considering this, the plaintiff wished us to give an undertaking that we would not in the future publish anything against Mr. Crofton's Company. As this idea of being muzzled was even more repugnant to us than the prospects of having to pay all the costs and full damages, we rejected it; but intimated that we were willing to express our regret for having published the article, as it had caused loss to Mr. Crofton. The plaintiff agreed to this."

THE death is reported of Biggs Holloway, the last survivor of the crew of the Investigator, which, commanded by Captain M'Clure, sailed from England on the 20th January 1850 in search of the unfortunate Expedition of Sir John Franklin. M'Clure's party did not come upon Franklin or any of his companions, but they persevered in their voyage for five long years and succeeded in reaching by water all through from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The public appreciation of the arduous and important service in the cause of science was poor. The discoverers of the long sought North West Passage received besides thanks a bonus of £5,000 to be divided between commander, officers, and crew.

THE Punjab Notes and Queries is to be revived. Mr. W. Croke, C.S., Magistrate of Mirzapore, will now edit the journal. He may meet with cordial help from his neighbouring brother Magistrate of Benares, who, before Captain Temple came to the field, meditated an Indian Notes and Queries.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Scotch strike has ended—in a victory for the railway companies. At one time, at Glasgow it degenerated into a guerilla warfare. The North British Company were obliged to use armoured locomotives.

MR. Charles Bradlaugh was buried at Woking Cemetery on the 3rd. The workmen of the principal towns in England were present by their delegates. Mr. John Morley, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Burt and other Members of the House of Commons also attended the funeral. At the House itself, general regrets were expressed at the death.

MR. Parnell believes, as he announced on the 1st instant at Ennis, that a permanent settlement has been achieved which assures future legislative freedom to Ireland. So far as it has transpired, under the terms of the Parnellite compromise, Mr. Justin McCarthy or Mr. Dillon becomes the leader of the Irish party in the House of Commons, while Mr. Parnell with Mr. O'Brien goes to America, but the Irish members are not yet definitely agreed as to their course.

ON the morning of the 31st January, four hundred of the garrison of Oporto mutinied in favor of a Republic. The rebels entrenched themselves at the Town Hall. Their ammunition falling short, they submitted to the Loyalists who bombarded the Hall. The casualties on both sides numbered fifty killed and wounded. Three hundred arrests were made and all the Republican clubs have been closed and Republican papers gagged by order of Government. The Oporto insurgents had planned simultaneous risings in other provincial garrisons and joint advance on Lisbon. Martial law has been proclaimed in the Province of rising. For suppression of Republican electoral meetings and demonstrations, there is a great Republican agitation at Barcelona and other cities.

THE Chilean revolution is running out its course. The regular troops, after an engagement lasting several hours, beat the insurgents heavily and regained possession of Valparaiso.

THE Italian Chamber of Deputies not accepting their financial scheme, Signor Crispi and his Cabinet resigned. This is welcome news to France, for the French journals herein smell Italy's disinclination to the Triple Alliance, which may modify her adhesion to the compact. There is difficulty in the formation of a new Cabinet.

THE French painter M. Jean Louis Ernest Meissonier is dead.

MR. Gladstone's Roman Catholic Disabilities Bill enabling a Roman Catholic to become Lord High Chancellor or Viceroy of Ireland, was, on the second reading, at the instance of Mr. Smith, on a division, thrown out by a majority of thirty-two votes. Mr. Gladstone urged that while Jews and Mahomedans were free to fill those posts, it was shameful to exclude the Catholics. Mr. Smith pointed out that neither the Catholics nor the public in general wanted the measure.

THE Grenadier Guards, proving good boys at Bermuda, will, in July next, be brought Home. They are too well-connected for punishment in right earnest!

NOT so Arabi the unfortunate Egyptian Patriot and Statesman. He must remain where he is, the fixture that the hasty justice of England made him. He is but a Pasha, even a Turk, above all, a Moslem. The doctors have reported that he does not suffer from the Ceylon climate, and he must continue there. Such is the verdict of Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords.

THE Canadian Parliament has been dissolved. The Premier, Sir John Macdonald, will negotiate for a Treaty of Commerce with the United States of America, and it is desirable that a fresh Parliament will consider the Treaty.

THE Lieutenant-Governor started on his second short tour—in Midnapur—on the 5th. Arriving on the 6th, he halts there this day and leaves it tomorrow, arriving at Calcutta on Monday in time to take part in the annual meeting of the Countess of Dufferin Fund the same afternoon. He has selected Chittagong for his next visit. It will be more protracted. Starting on the 13th, he does not come back before the 26th. Sir Charles Elliott will, however, take in Rangamati and Dacca, at the last of which places he remains for two days, the 23rd and 24th, arriving there on the 22nd and leaving it for Calcutta on the 25th.

THE High Court has directed Sessions Judges and District Magistrates to comply, as far as possible, with the wishes of Government as regards the holidays, public or other, for 1891, Gazetted in December last, and to arrange the business of the courts accordingly. The order of Government is specific that the Magisterial Courts in Bengal shall be closed during the days Gazetted. The direction of the High Court, we are afraid, may be construed by zealous officers as not favoring absolute suspension of business.

MR. Justice Norris goes on furlough from the 26th March, for five months and eight days, and does not rejoin court till after the Long Vacation. The state of business does not call for an officiating Judge in his place. But if one is still to be appointed, the choice may fall on Mr. Hill of Allahabad.

THE cattle-trespass Act (I of 1891) received the assent of the Governor-General on the 30th January 1891, and was published the next day for general information. It comes into operation from the first April next and applies to the whole of British India, excepting the Presidency-towns and such local areas as the Local Government, by notification in the official Gazette, may from time to time exclude from its operation. It is competent to the Local Government to cancel or vary such notification. The new law allows compensation up to Rs. 100 for illegal seizure or detention of cattle.

IN our issue of the 17th last, we noticed the miserable death by the violent hands of villains who suddenly sprang upon him on his way home from Durbār, of the Maharaja of Cashmere's unworthy menial confidant. The Police have been inquiring, with a startling result. The murder is suspected to be a parricide. Indar Singh, the son of the unfortunate victim Sawul Singh, has been arrested as the author of his parent's death. The deed was the work of more men than one, of course, and the Police are on the look out for one other wretch in particular.

THE Behar Herald calls upon the Vice-Chairman of the local municipality to resign. The municipal administration of Patna has been condemned by both the Commissioner of the Division and the Bengal Government. And who, in the opinion of our contemporary, is responsible for the state of things but the Vice? For our part, we are afraid that a ruling Vice of six years has become a constitutional disease, hard to combat.

If our contemporary may be taken to express the opinion of the town, Syed Badshah Nawab is the coming man. We think he ought to be tried. Although the richest citizen of Patna, the heir of Nawab Looft Ali Khan is no Sybarite lounging away his life, but an active young man of respectable habits. It would be a blessing to him if he could take kindly to the new occupation, and he might, under good guidance, prove a blessing to his fellow-citizens. He might require an incentive to expend adequately on sanitation and other improvements. There need be little fear of his wasting public funds.

RAJA Sashi Sekhaheshwar Roy, of Tahirpore, is a lucky man. Projectors or founders as a rule never profit by their zealous efforts. They toil unceasingly, under discouragement and against odds, patiently sowing for others to reap. Not so our young Zemindar of Rajshahye. Before his Zemindary Panchayet is fairly and firmly established or is recognised among the institutions of the land, he is the first to benefit by it. It appears that there is a long-pending family dispute between the Raja and his cousin Tarakeswar Roy. It was probably this dispute, coupled with the Raja's wise aversion to waste his patrimony in litigation, that led him to devise a cheaper and more respectable machinery for settling such feuds. It is said that on the representation of the Zemindary Panchayet and the good offices of Sir John Edgar and Mr. Price, the Collector of Rajshahye, the two cousins have agreed to submit their differences to arbitration, and three Pleaders of the District, Babus Bhubun Mohun Moitra, Mohendra Nath Sandel and Brojo Gopal Bagchi, have accepted the office of arbitrators.

THERE is joy in Kuppoothulla. The Maharaja has obtained the sanction of the Supreme Government for a higher Khellut. Higher or lower, as these Khelluts are in every instance not only paid for but paid for extravagantly out of proportion to their worth or market value, there seems little room for triumph in a concession involving no sacrifice to the conessor. Nevertheless,

'Tis something in the dearth of fame, in India, for young Kuppoothulla to be permitted to appear in a dress of Rs. 6,000 as appraised by the plunderer in the pay of Government and paid by himself, instead of one of Rs. 4,500, donned heretofore by his predecessors on the masnad. It is a step in the Indian Peerage. The presents of honorary robes, turbans, swords and jewels, from Government to native princes, chiefs and gentlemen, though all paid for by the recipients, are regulated according to the importance and rank of the parties. What does it amount to, after all? "Tis something, nothing."

This infinitesimal lift is a vicarious promotion. It is the reward for the good services of the State during the Candahar campaign and its efficient administration during the minority. Here, then, at last is a cheap gilding for the pill of British regency in native principalities.

J. E. B. BUDD, late District Registrar of Fyzabad, charged with taking bribe or illegal gratification and with perjury, has been sentenced by the High Court, N.-W. P., to eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment. The jury found him guilty on only the first charge, under sec. 161, of receiving an illegal gratification of Rs. 1,800 in connection with a will suit valued at 28 lacs, from Tribhubin Datt, as a motive for doing a certain official act. On the pronouncement of the verdict, the prisoner exclaimed, "My God, I received the notes from my wife." Mr. Justice Straight, in passing sentence, said:—

"It is a matter of very great pain to me to see you standing in the position in which you are. I heard you say when the verdict was given that you got these notes from your wife. My own firm conviction is that you did get them from her, and you knew perfectly well from whence they came; and that you have been trying to make yourself believe that you did not know whence they came. It was impossible your wife could have come into the possession of this large sum of money without your making enquiries and ascertaining whence it came. The case has been most thoroughly threshed out, and you have been defended as well as I ever heard an accused person defended in the course of my whole life; and the jury have exercised the greatest care. I was careful to put the case before the jury so as to give no indication of my own views. I have no doubt about your guilt. If the money came through the hands of your wife it is only another indication of those lamentable devices to which people in this country will resort for the purpose of trying to influence public servants in the discharge of their public duties. It is an advantage to the community that you have been detected and it will be my duty to visit you with severe punishment. But I am not satisfied that you did go the full length of criminality, and I shall pass upon you a lighter sentence than I otherwise should have done. I cannot forget that on your behalf the most fearful allegations of forgery and fraud and perjury have been made against various persons. As to the idea that those notes came to you legitimately in the course of exchange through public channels it is idle and absurd. I have very little doubt they came to you through the hands of your wife, and she must have known perfectly well from whence they came. She has not been called, no doubt for the very best reasons, and under the best advice of your learned counsel."

It is impudent and blasphemous of counsel to appeal to Divinity to give point to the asseveration of their client's innocence. So poor Charles Phillipps was long accused and is even now by many believed of having done in defence of Courvoisier, the Swiss valet who murdered his deaf old master Lord William Russell in his bed sleeping, for mere robbery. So poor Dr. Kenealy, if we mistake not, did, in court and out of it, in favour of the Tichborne Claimant. Prisoners at the bar have more excuse, their temptation being enormous, though they damn themselves thereby irretrievably. Deceiving the All-knowing is impossible, nor do they mean it. Enough for them if they can deceive men. And they do. We are all poor simpletons, ready to believe. The most suspicious are open to a degree unknown to themselves. And such solemn appeals to God are simply irresistible. They are none the more worthy of credit, though. A deliberate sinner sticks at nothing. A thorough villain is a villain through. As for blasphemy, what care they? These desperate fellows are practically all atheists. Look at Budd. How glibly he takes the name of God in vain! How boldly he calls Heaven to witness his falsehood! Even in that solemn attitude, his language betrays the pettifogger. "My God, I received the notes from my wife." What then? oh miserable quibbler! For that is not the point. All that may be true without absolving thee. The question is, Was the money yours or your wife's? And was it not received for you and for corrupt purposes. We are glad that Mr. Justice Straight nullified the prisoner's illegitimate effort to create a public impression in his favour and exposed his reckless and daredevil demerol.

NOTWITHSTANDING the busybodyishness of many of the Politicals, the British Government does not lightly interfere in the general internal affairs of native states. And that for the sufficient reason that it is not a simple or easy matter. Such interference, if it does not amount to annexation of a state, certainly means the annexation of an administration—the bouleversément of a time-honoured bundoust. Nor is the particular state alone affected. The effects are far-reaching. The whole nation is exercised. The native states in particular are alarmed. The more so that the enemies of the surrounding chiefs and administrations are roused and the hour is seized by intriguers for their activity.

Is Sukeyt going the way of Cashmere? The complaints against that Hill State have at last attracted serious notice. The Commissioner of Jullunder lately went to inquire. Before his report has been submitted, there is a rumour abroad that Sukeyt is about to be made over to the Raja of Mandi. We do not know if he has been intriguing. If he has, it is very impudent of him. Whether he has an eye or not on his neighbour's chiefship, we hope the Government of India will not make any arrangement of the kind. The political segregation is no doubt a nuisance. The Himalayan belt is in the condition of Italy before Victor Emmanuel. It would be a good thing were some of the fractions combined. The necessity of supporting so many civil lists presses too heavily upon the poor inhabitants. But such a policy has its dangers. The internal intrigues of these minute principalities are bad enough. But to let one chief have the domain of another, would kindle the ambition of them all and set the Durbars to compass each other's ruin.

THE Calcutta Correspondent of the Pioneer laments that the Fine Arts Exhibition in Free School Street just closed did not "draw" the natives. He says:—

"It is stated that the attendance has not been so good as might have been expected, and the native community certainly have proved themselves poor patrons, a score at most from among them having visited the rooms in Free School Street. The difficulty, of course, is to find a place for the exhibition which is easy of access and which can yet permit of the pictures being well displayed. People here will not go out of their way even a few hundred yards unless a show 'catches on'; and Mr. Westmacott, who has worked most unselfishly to make the exhibition a success, must lament that there is no convenient gallery in Calcutta where it could be held under the most favourable conditions."

The poor natives! They have always in every matter their full share of reproach reserved for them. Few have kindness enough for them to examine whether the reproach be deserved or not. Not unfrequently are they blamed for not doing the impossible. Here at any rate is a close show of pictures for the mutual glorification and amusement of the Upper Ten—the Big Wigs, with just a sprinkling of Jewelled Turbans, to soften the too glaring colour of official and racial exclusiveness—held in a back-slum of the European town, far away from the City and the Native quarter, without notice to the inhabitants in general, and the natives are blamed for not having crowded to the scene to be charmed by the chef d'œuvre of official art—

The might that slumbers in the official's brush—and be astonished at the prodigies turned out in a trice by Mr. Jobbins at the Government School, and to swell the coffers of the Mutual Admiration Society of Amateurs in India!

The absence of natives from the Exhibition is certainly lamentable. But what could the poor fellows do? They were wholly innocent of the business. They were not apprised of what was expected of them. There was no communication—no proper advertisement. No body cared for the natives and the natives did not thrust their base presence into the show of the elect. And if they are now taxed for their perverse ingenuity in keeping out of the way, that too is the usual way—they are used to that kind of kindness.

The whole thing is of a piece with the way in which natives are treated in matters affecting the natives themselves, except when money is required of natives. Probably, this present complaint owes its origin to the same financial prudence. From time to time, during a long series of years, we hear of Art Societies and Exhibitions at Simla and at Calcutta, but in the vaguest way imaginable, generally only when a Viceroy or other great gun delivers a speech. Occasionally, we have met with criticisms in the newspapers of the Sahel-logue's exhibits. No more. Certainly, within the ten years' life of this journal, we do not remember ever to have received any kind of report or other account or message or a single scrap of paper from any of these institutions. And our weekly is not a mere newspaper, but a "Review of Politics, Literature and Society," having for its main object the weaning our people from the vicious absorption in ephemeral questions, and indulgence in crude patriotism and noisy agitation. There is, we believe, in our midst in this very city a Government School of Art for the benefit of the natives and a few young men of the neighbourhood had found their way into it, but Bengal knows it not. There is even a state art collection somewhere, we believe, equally unknown. Not but what the poor British exiles condemned to draw their tens of thousands of pay and allowances in the East resort with their families to it as a palliative in, if not cure for, nostalgia. Practically, it and things of the kind are reserved for the governing aristocracy. The mobility of the governed have nothing to do with them. The people are unconscious of their existence, because their existence is not brought home to the people. So with this Art Society and its Exhibition. The Society scrupulously maintained the precedent, proceeding on the strictly orthodox principle of practically excluding the canaille. And its success has been complete. Why then this complaint? Do they want money?

It would not be fair to ourself or the public to withhold the fact that we have been to the Exhibition. But it was by the purest chance that we found ourself in the notorious quarter which the men of light and leading of the metropolis chose for their temple of art. We had been debating within ourself whether it would be for the dignity of the Indian Press in general, or for the honour of Reis and Rayyet in particular, for us to go uninvited. Thus time passed, when one day we made the acquaintance of a gentleman of the European press connected with the Exhibition. His conversation settled us. The same afternoon we went both Editor and Assistant Editor. Our new friend who came after us must have been surprised at the prompt result of his "unadorned eloquence." We thanked him heartily for the gratification we obtained at the outlay of Rs. 2 for two tickets and Ans. 8 for a catalogue between us. We made some marks in the catalogue and took some pencil notes. But the same respect for our profession which had at first kept us out, prevented us from publishing our experiences and thoughts. Indeed, why should we advertise a concern that ignores us?

THERE is no unmixed good in this world, and it is no discredit to Mr. Bradlaugh that his connection with India was not without a flaw. But there can be no question, that his death is a great loss, and it may even be regarded as a pure loss, to India. It is a loss that will not be easily or soon replaced. We are accordingly very happy to see that efforts are being made to do something for him and his.

At a conference at Mr. W. C. Bonnerjea's residence in Park Street, it was decided to call a public meeting through the Sheriff, to give a public expression to the sorrow occasioned by the death of the Member for India, Charles Bradlaugh, and to take steps to perpetuate his memory. It is intended to send a purse of Rs. 20,000 to his daughter to save the valuable library he has left behind him and to pay off his debt.

THE Consent Bill has given an opportunity to our demagogues for stumping for which at least they ought to be thankful to Government. Ever since the tocsin of alarm was first sounded by Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter, the soi-disant Paribrdjak and Kumar, Mr. Krishna Prasanna Sen, has, from day to day, been entertaining his countrymen with the display of his "gift of the gab." This evening he is to lecture in the Town Hall, Mr. Justice Banerjea presiding. Such exhibition of the feats of a rara avis like Mr. Sen may have quite as much attraction as the stage or the circus. But, if he is a true Hindu, he cannot deny that his proper vocation is medicine, and that it is a highly sinful act on his part to encroach on the province of Brahmans of pure blood. Although he has dropped his patronymic, the fact is too well known that he belongs to a caste which is neither fish nor fowl, and he can no more pass as a Brahman than the fool of a weaver who tried the trick of putting on the sacred thread, in the hope of being allowed to dine with members of the superior caste on festive occasions. To us it is simply a wonder how our educated countrymen can stand the infliction of being regaled with the vapid nonsense of his so-called lectures. It is much to be regretted that the Hon'ble Justice Gurudas Banerjea has thought it fit to take such an adventurer under his protection.

THE HINDU SCRIPTURAL CONTROVERSY IN A NUTSHELL.

THE mischief has been done. At the outset, some of the Pundits of the country gave an opinion for which there is no express authority within the four corners of our Shasters. The demagogues and penny papers took up the cue, and they have succeeded, to some extent, in spreading the belief that our religion is at stake. Those, however, who profess to belong to the orthodox class, ought to have greater regard for their holy Lawgivers than is implied in accepting an interpretation that gives their ordinance such an absurd and monstrous character as to make them abhorred by the wise and the good. If our Rishis enjoin consummation on a child wife of 10 or 11 years, in any case, then the feeling of reverence which is entertained for them by their followers is certainly misplaced, and the sooner we discard their authority the better for us. But we have always cherished a very different opinion with regard to them, and we feel no hesitation in avowing the belief that it would be a great calamity to the country if their legislation gave place to the fads of sham reformers and misguided philanthropists.

The Government proposals are open to rational objection. We were not in favor of the Consent Bill. And even now we cannot say that we are reconciled to it, in its present shape. But our objection to it is not theological. After giving the subject the fullest consideration, we do not entertain any apprehension that the Bill as it is, if passed into law, will interfere with our religion. Under the circumstance, it becomes our sacred duty to draw the attention of the public to what we deem to be the correct interpretation of our Shastric injunctions on the subject, so that, not only the orthodox may be reassured, but the easy-going reformers also may be led to appreciate the legislation of our Rishis better than they seem to do at present.

For the opinion that we have propounded on the subject, we are being abused by some of the vernacular penny papers in no measured terms. This is neither more nor less than what we expected. But abuse is not argument, and we are not inclined to take any notice of mere vituperation. If we find any fair criticism anywhere, we will take the earliest opportunity to answer the same. For the present, we only ask our opponents to take into consideration the following issues which, we hope, may facilitate, to some extent, the solution of the main question :

I. Is there any text laying down expressly that consummation on a child wife of ten or eleven years is obligatory on the occurrence of a certain event ?

II. When so high an authority as Medhatithi has laid down that consummation is not imperative on the occurrence of a certain event, within the first year after marriage, is there any warrant for the opinion that the rule of our Shasters which enjoins generally the performance of Garbhádhan, on the occurrence of a certain event, is not subject to any exception ?

III. The object of Garbhádhan being to beget a healthy child for perpetuating lineage, can it be held, consistently with other Shastric rules and injunctions, that it is imperative, even when the wife is a girl of ten or eleven years ?

IV. When the Rishis declare expressly that the twelfth year is the maximum limit of the proper age for marriage of girls, is it unreasonable to hold that the proper season for their Garbhádhan or impregnation can never arise before their twelfth year ?

An able writer in a weekly* contemporary considers our reasoning on some of the points mooted above to be altogether fallacious. According to him, the age when a girl becomes capable of Garbhádhan or impregnation ought to be determined, not by the evidence of the Shasters, but by that of medical authorities. Our critic no doubt thinks he has made a great point against us, but he deceives himself. His logic is plausible but no more. It will not hold water—nor stand Shashtra. It is a fundamental article of our faith that the Rishis knew everything, and whenever their codes afford any data for arriving at a proper solution of any question of medical or other science, we do not feel called upon to refer to the works of experts on the subject. If the necessity arose, we could have referred to Charak and Susruta, whose Sanhitas stand almost on the same footing with those of Manu and Yagyavalkya. But we consider that the indications contained in the texts of our legal codes afford sufficient data for the proper determination of the question.

Our critic says that, in our method of reasoning, we have overstepped the limits of our own proper province. According to him, "what is the time for giving birth to a child is a question not for Pandits but for physiologists." That may seem a rational contention, but it is not Hindu doctrine. The radical maxim—the assumption sine qua non—of Hindu scripture and tradition and Hindu life, is the omniscience and infallibility, positive or constructive, of the holy Rishis. Apart from that consideration, the point under discussion is one for Pandits and not for physiologists. For the question is not what is the time for giving birth to a child, but what is the time, under Hindu Shastras or Law, for giving birth to a child. Thus, it is a question for Lawyers—that is, Hindu theologians—and not for anatomists and physiologists or Kavirajs or Vatel.

In the present instance, the question is not when girls first become capable of child bearing, but at what age their husbands are bound to perform their Garbhádhan. As a matter of course, Garbhádhan or impregnation must follow marriage, and if marriage of girls is imperative only in their twelfth year, their Garbhádhan cannot, in any case, be obligatory within that age. The question is not when Garbhádhan is allowable, but when does it become sinful, on the part of the husband, not to perform it. The Pandits say that it is sinful not to perform it on the first occurrence of menstruation. But when an authority like Medhatithi says that even if a certain well known event occurred within the first year after marriage, Garbhádhan should not be celebrated within that period, it cannot be said that the view which the Pandits take is free from error. Our own opinion is that the general rule which makes Garbhádhan obligatory on the occurrence of menstruation, is subject to several exceptions. Medhatithi infers one such exception from the directions given on the subject in treatises on ritual. Following his spirit and taking other texts bearing on it into consideration, we think that the general rule is subject to other exceptions.

The writer already referred to finds fault with that part of our reasoning also which is based on Raghunandan's definition of the word Ritu. Raghunandan says that Ritu is the time when a female is capable of child-bearing. If he meant to take it in its usual sense, he might not have defined it at all, or he might have defined it as Sonita darshanapolakshitah Streenám-ábasthá bisheshah. But when he has defined it otherwise, and when that definition is more consistent with the conclusion derivable from other texts, we are bound to accept the meaning that follows from its wording, instead of going out of our way, and taking into consideration what the commentator had in his mind, according to the ipse dixit of our esteemed critic. It is a rule of interpretation that words which are defined in our Shasters, must be taken in the sense given to them by their definitions and not in their ordinary sense.*

THE POLICE COMMISSION.

COMMISSIONS as a rule do not inspire us with much hope if we are to rely upon our past experience. Otherwise, the importance of the Police Commission cannot be underrated and its results are naturally very anxiously looked for. Some non-official representative men have also been added to it, but it is doubtful if these gentlemen possess any practical knowledge of the working of the Police system. They can only supply second hand information to the Commission. At least a couple of experienced and able Judicial officers retired or in the service should have been on this Commission whose assistance would have been invaluable to the reformation of the Police, but as they as a body are not in the good books of their masters, they have been judiciously omitted. As regards the evidence which is being collected, so far as we have been able to judge, it is not quite satisfactory. Nor is it to be wondered at. Old Judges of the Small Causes Courts are not expected to know much about the points into which the Commission has directed its enquiries.

Very few persons seem to know or realise the critical position to which the proper administration of justice in this country has been driven. Talk as boldly as you can of your admirable system of administration of justice and be as conceited as possible without knowing the real state of things, the fact will remain unaltered and you will never make an inch of real improvement. In fact, there is no justice at present for the poor or for those who cannot spend freely. With a foreign law ever changeable, with rulings never explainable, with a Law of Evidence beyond one's conception and understanding, with a stupid and dishonest jury, with a discontented and disheartened native Magistracy---slaves of half a dozen masters---and with a Police corrupt to its very backbone, what justice can we expect in this country? We do not blame the Government, we do not speak ill of the officers at the head of the administration, but we do reproach the system and the law. These surely deserve condemnation. We more urgently want honest and competent persons in the lower ranks of the Police than in the higher. In the latter this Force is, to some extent and in certain respects---and particularly as regards honesty, properly manned. And no great matter if not. Inefficiency and dishonesty there, if it be even found, do not affect us so directly and so injuriously as when found in the lower ranks which have chiefly to deal with enquiries and writing of statements of parties and witnesses, upon which depends the issue of cases involving the lives, honor and property of the public. The superior Police officers are only administrative machines and they have, ordinarily, little concern with the investigation of cases. Although it is said that they direct investigations by their subordinates, there are few who have that knowledge and experience of the country necessary for the successful conduct of such investigations. In consequence, they play into the hands of their subordinates and are generally led by them in such matters. As ornamental heads they are very good, and as inspecting officers they may be very careful and strict with the forms and their filling up, but as Police officers for detective and preventive purposes they understand and know very little their business. Government laments the result of the Sessions cases in serious crimes, but Government does not find out the true cause. Every one knows what weight, importance, and credibility is attached by the European Magistrates and Judges particularly, to the first information and statements of witnesses before the Police officers, and the fate of 75 out of 100 cases generally depends upon those statements. A native Magistrate believes it less, but he cannot also altogether reject or ignore it without sufficient cause in the record. This is commonly one of the fatal elements in these cases. These statements are never written regularly, honestly, and accurately in such cases in which even one party can pay, for there is hope of extortion on both sides. These statements and informations are written by the Sub-Inspectors or his assistants down to the literate constable. They are written and they are not written---in due course. For, excepting undefended cases of old offenders or very poor people, they are never written at the time the complaints are lodged or the witnesses are examined. The duty is purposely deferred; indeed, in order to deceive the parties, something is written on pieces of paper. Until the terms are settled with one party or the other, the first information is seldom written. According to the interest of the paying party, it is shaped and the foundation of the case is thus spoiled by dozen means which a judicial eye can only detect. After that, the investigation is also conducted upon the same corrupt and pre-concerted lines and a case made out by the Police to advance the interest of one party and is placed before the Magistrate for trial. Here the parties and witnesses on making truthful statements are contradicted by their alleged previous statements before the Police, which are freely, openly, and dishonestly sold to the party by whom the Police was bought or to both the parties if necessary, in two ways and in distinct versions, to suit their purposes. Even honest and truthful men are threatened with perjury and in some cases they are prosecuted for it. Sometimes a sentence, a name, a single word is changed in the statement so ingeniously as to spoil the whole case. Any amount of solid, truthful, and reliable evidence in Court cannot have any effect against the injurious statements alleged to have been made before the Police, and the Court must give weight to it without considering the fact that the whole thing was false in order to obtain a miscarriage of justice. We are afraid the diaries kept under Section 161 C. P. C. have spoiled hundreds of cases: without them the Magistrates could have done better. All these safeguards are good things for the ends of justice if they are punctually and regularly written and kept by honest and efficient officers. In reality, however, they help in defeating the ends of justice and in bringing discredit on the administration. A regular sweep of this class of men should be made and this should be the first step towards reformation.

Even at the best, what supervision can be exercised upon such shortcomings and misdoings as we have described above? There are some officers who are so insufficiently educated that they cannot readily and accurately write a statement without making a draft of it beforehand. Crooked and erroneous statistics certainly can be supplied by them upon which elaborate but meaningless reports are drawn up by their heads. The District Superintendents and even their assistants ever ready to side with their wrong-headed and in most cases unscrupulous and corrupt subordinates, and when the native Magistrates, who alone are capable of coping with the native Police, point out their faults or comment upon their misconduct, they must prepare for a hundred troubles. Nor is this all. The native Magistrate must submit to the risk of sooner or later incurring the displeasure of his superior who, being the executive head, must support his supposed right-hand man in all executive matters.

If Government wants that justice should be administered in India according to their good and generous intention, the sooner it separates the judicial from the executive, the sooner it will gain that object, and many abuses will disappear of themselves without any action being taken against them. The cause of delay in the disposal of cases, the bad quality of work on account of undue haste in getting through it and the unpleasant interference of the executive which discourages and irritates the judiciary, all will disappear with this change in the system. What would a European judge think if his record is sent for by the Inspector-General of Police or his subordinate and his judicial proceedings criticised in a hostile way with closed eyes. In England, a judge would shudder on hearing of such a procedure authorised, encouraged and upheld, as it is here, by an enlightened Government.

THE ALLAHABAD UNIVERSITY. CONVOCATION DAY—THE CHANCELLOR'S SPEECH.

The Chancellor (Sir Auckland Colvin) thus addressed the Convocation :—

Mr. Vice-Chancellor and Gentlemen of the Senate,---More than two years have elapsed since the passing of Act XVIII of 1887, known as "an Act to establish a University at Allahabad." When, towards the close of 1887, my distinguished predecessor, to whose generous sympathies with the higher life and aspirations of the people of this Province our University owes its existence, laid down his office, the Act indeed had been passed; but almost all the measures which the Act required in order to complete the mechanism of the University, and to subordinate to its influence the growth of education in the North West and in Oudh, remained to be carried out. In his speech on the occasion of our first Convocation, Sir Alfred Lyall lucidly explained the ideas by which he and his advisers were animated in creating and constituting the University. It remained for us, in giving practical effect to those desires, to assure their adequate fulfilment. We have to thank the Vice-Chancellor, Sir John Edge, who was appointed the first Vice-Chancellor under the Act, the Registrar, Mr. Gough, Mr. White, the Director of Public Instruction in these Provinces, and the Fellows who shared their labours, for the completion, during the two following years, of the Rules of the University regarding the Senate, the Faculties, and the Syndicate, and for the Regulations in Arts and Laws, which defined the attributes of the several bodies, prescribed the several duties and spheres of authority of the constituent sections of the governing and administrative body, and laid down the scheme and scope of the University examinations. There were also determined in 1888 and 1889 the text-books for the examinations of 1890 and 1891. Various Colleges were affiliated; and the University, as its Minutes show, entered fully into that life of discussion, debate and decision which is inseparable from the healthy operation of its functions. In the conduct of labours during these early but all important years of its existence, it was its good fortune to be guided by the sure and steadfast hand of the high official I have named; who, in addition to his many other heavy labours, consented, not only for the two years which formed his initial term of office, but again at my earnest request for two ensuing years, to take upon himself the onerous duties of Vice-Chancellor. In his Convocation speech last year the Vice-Chancellor enumerated the several measures which the University in the first two years of his office had completed. It sweetens to me the labour of this discourse and assures it at your hands a more certain welcome, that I should use it to declare the debt we owe to Sir John Edge for his invaluable guidance and co-operation.

[The Lieutenant-Governor then went on to quote an array of figures bearing on the progress of the University and the increasing number of students presenting themselves at its examinations. He continued :—]

I have spoken in an earlier part of this Address of the delay imposed upon me before I was able to meet you. That there should have been regret on this account was inevitable, but, on the other hand, I feel in my own mind that experience has been gained, and knowledge acquired, by us all during the late year which now are of no small advantage. The office of Chancellor, if I may speak of my own part in the matter, although it may be called incidental to the Lieutenant-Governorship, is far from being an honorary office. Indeed, for the reason that it is held by the Lieutenant-Governor for the time being, the exercise of the authority and influence vested in that officer by virtue of the Act creating him Chancellor, may prove, if judiciously used, of the greatest benefit, or, if ignorantly exerted, of grievous harm to the interests of the University. Especially is this so in the days of its early growth. I think that each of us, in his own degree, must be sensitively alive to the responsibilities laid on him, in these first years of University organisation. If the generations which profit by the wisdom of predecessors by whom the growth of a University was guided, look back upon them with respect conceded to men in but few other relations of life, we have to remember that it is to us, to our hands, and to our time that there has been entrusted the opportunity and the option of that early day to use or to abuse. We stand in the morning of the life of our University; and though our eyes may be darkened to it, the light which will beat fuller upon us from a latter day, and will reveal what manner of counsellors we have been, is even now collecting and concentrating its rays upon us. It is no light burden and responsibility that is more particularly laid upon those of us in India to whom there has been entrusted the seed of the higher Western education to transplant as an exotic. Since we are ourselves necessarily ignorant of much that surrounds the process of its acclimatisation, our difficulties are so much the graver compared to those which attend men who in their own land, watch, but without anxiety, over their Universities. We have, indeed, to guide us the experience gained in other parts of India; but while we can judge for ourselves that influences are there at work which in a measure distort and disturb the fair growth of the tree of knowledge, we are unhappily at a loss precisely to detect the inimical germs. Even could we trace them to their source, we could not confidently assert that the avoidance of the errors of others would necessarily smooth the path of our own progress. For India is not one, but many; many in its modes of thought, many in its ethnical types, many in its ethical aims and standards, many in its languages. Many are the avenues, whether of history or of race descent, from which India approaches our University portals. Multiform, therefore, must be the difficulty of dealing with the problem of adapting to the various intellect of each great Province of India, in that form which shall be the most congenial and sympathetic to it, the knowledge and science of the West.

Holloway's Pills.—Nervous Irritability.—No part of the human machine requires more constant supervision than the nervous system—for upon it our health—and even life—depends. These Pills strengthen the nerves and are the safest general purifiers of the blood. Nausea, headache, giddiness, numbness and mental apathy yield to them. They relieve in a summary manner those distressing dyspeptic symptoms, stomacic pains, fulness at the pit of the stomach, abdominal distension, and regulate alike capricious appetites and confined bowels—the commonly accompanying signs of defective or diminished nerve tone. Holloway's Pills are particularly recommended to persons of studious and sedentary habits, who gradually fall into a nervous and irritable state, unless some such restorative be occasionally taken.

There are, nevertheless happily for us and for our endeavours, certain axioms,---I may say, perhaps, adopting for my purpose language which lends itself naturally to the transmission of secular as of other instruction, certain articles of belief,---to which we all, or, if not all, at least the large majority, whatever may be their views as to the ritual or the minor canons and observances of education, alike subscribe. We are nearly all here, I think, agreed that, for the present at least, we must be content in India, and especially in Provincial India with a University which examines, but which does not teach. We must be content, that is to say, with a University which confers degrees as the results of its examinations, but does not group round it a staff of Professors to prepare its undergraduates for such degrees. We all, I think, subscribe to the belief that usefully to fulfil its functions, such a University must not only affiliate to itself the more important of the educational institutions within the sphere of its influence, and restrict its degrees to men who have been trained at such institutions, but must freely admit into its own council the more competent of those by whom such affiliated institutions are conducted. It must have councils both to deliberate and to administer; and there must be in both its councils a direct representation of affiliated Colleges. Again, in all these Colleges, the University itself, if it be not immediately represented, must be able at least to secure for its views full and authoritative hearing. There must be between University and Colleges, action and re-action. On the former of these two articles we accept and subscribe to the examples set us in the three Presidency towns, on the second, we propose more particularly to insist on such a reciprocity of relations between the University and the affiliated institutions as shall ensure the exercise on the one hand of the supreme influence of the former, and, on the other, shall furnish a guarantee to those bodies that in the influence so exercised they are not severally unrepresented. We are agreed (to resume and to come to what is perhaps the most important article of our creed) as to what are the duties, and what, within the sphere of learning and education are the functions of a University. It is less than 40 years ago that, in our own country, men were debating bitterly what the duties of a University should be. Nor had the strife of controversy wholly ceased when, in 1857, the University of Calcutta received its Charter. The establishment of that University was an acknowledgment that University is independent of form; and that it may discharge widely different functions so long as it devotes them to a common end. It may examine only like the University of London; or, it may gather round it, and immediately about it, its Colleges of instruction. The root of the matter lies elsewhere. "Many other secondary purposes may be served," it has been well said, "by a University; it may be the home and nurse of learned men, it may promote the progress of science, it may qualify for the learned professions. None of these are its true or primary purpose. If science be promoted by a University, well and good; but such promotion is not to be required of it. Academies or learned societies are for the furtherance of special sciences. The promotion of their science is the sole end of such societies; but in a University every science sinks into a means to a worthier end,---the cultivation of mind. This is the one use to which it puts knowledge---the light in which it regards science.

The products of a University are not inventions, improvements, discoveries, novel speculations, books, but the fully educated man." I have been quoting the words of one---Mark Pattison---who sought throughout many of the best years of his life to raise, from the unconsidered depths to which it had fallen, the ideal of a University. Another, even more eminent, writing from a widely different standpoint, but under the influence of a similar order of ideas, has jealously claimed for knowledge that, in proportion as it tends more and more to be particular, it ceases to be knowledge. Cardinal Newman distinguishing between instruction and education, says:

"We are instructed, for instance, in manual exercises, in the fine and useful arts, in trades, and in ways of business; for these are methods which have little or no effect upon the mind itself, are contained in rules committed to memory, to tradition or to use, and bear upon an end external to themselves. But education is a higher word; it implies an action upon our mental nature, and the formation of a character; it is something individual and permanent, and is commonly spoken of in connection with religion and virtue." There is a knowledge which is desirable though nothing come of it, as being of itself a treasure and a sufficient remuneration of years of labour. Such knowledge, he says finely, "is an acquired illumination; it is a habit, a personal possession, and an inward endowment." "The true and adequate end," he adds, "of intellectual training and of a University, is not learning or acquirement, but rather is thought or reason exercised upon knowledge, or what may be called philosophy." I shall be pardoned, I hope, for quoting passages which are familiar to many of those whose profession identifies them more peculiarly with this University; but I venture to do so because it seems to me that this one article of belief is not only of primary importance, but comprises in itself the germ of all the group of conceptions from which spring and grow, and are ultimately matured, our conclusions in regard to the proper sphere of University teaching. The true test of any scheme having for its object to mould or influence the course of University education, is whether it is consistent with the principles laid down in the words which I have quoted. In proportion as we lose sight of the central idea that the product of the University is the fully educated man,—and that by the fully educated man we mean not the man of mere learning and acquirement, but the philosophically-minded man,—in proportion as we lose sight of that idea, we are in danger of error, and of the educational miscarriages which such error will produce, in proportion as we guard it, we raise a University above the contending claims of the several professions and industrial arts; above the rivalry of competing theories as to the relative merits of instruction in Arts or in Science, or in any other branch; and we secure for it that serene indifference to all but the cultivation of the intellectual life which is its high and unique prerogative.

We are all, I hope, finally agreed (for this follows from the last proposition) that nothing need be taught in a University which can be taught as well elsewhere and, further, that no University should undertake to teach rudimentary matter, or to receive among candidates who submit themselves to the test of its examination, any but those whose acquirements prove them already to have possessed themselves of all that can be taught them by High schools, or by other similar subordinate institutions.

I may take this opportunity, perhaps, as I pass on, of pointing out that throughout this Address I have neither regarded the University in its relations to Government, nor have I taken into my consideration its position, or the position of its Colleges, in respect to the Department of Public Instruction. I have preferred, for my present purpose, to regard the University as self-centred, and independent of all external bodies.

These important propositions comprise, then, those articles of our educational creed on which I take it we are nearly all agreed. Like other similar articles, however, it is not in their text but in their application, that we find our difficulties arise. Considerable as such difficulties may be when a University is the outcome of national life of which it at once receives the impact and assists the direction, far greater do they become when, as in India, it is the means by which the mind of one people proposes to itself to direct the communication of its instruction to another people who are foreign, and whose training and habits of reasoning and of thought are widely dissimilar and divergent. That there should be the initial difficulty to those who take the chief part in the councils or in the examinations of such a University, or of those charged with the instruction preparatory to its examinations, of keeping themselves, in their absence from the centres of light in their own land, illumined with knowledge and infused with its spirit is obvious. But this difficulty may be, and, as experience shows us, is ordinarily, overcome by the capacity and devotion of those who are charged in India with the mandate of instruction; and in the case of their lay and non professional coadjutors by that high intellectual impress which the educated mind when exercised in the discharge of the liberal professions, and the more important functions of Indian public life receives. When we look, therefore, to the application in these Provinces by a competent body duly qualified, of the four propositions I have enumerated, we find that the two former are concerned with the agency of instruction, and the two latter with its subject-matter. The restriction of our University to examining functions, the system of affiliation, and the representation of the affiliated bodies on the University councils regard the structure, as the subjects of instruction and the tests to be adopted as qualifying for matriculation or graduation, concern the functional life of the University. Dealing first with these latter propositions, and reserving, for the present, consideration of the structural aspect of the University, we are met at once. When we come to deal in India with the subject-matter of instruction, we are met by an initial difficulty. We are met by the difficulty of the classical language of India. To one, the study of these languages has little to commend it; to another, they are the medium through which the mind of a people foreign to our processes of instruction, to our conception of the aims and objects of knowledge, and to our systems of thought and reasoning, may be best introduced and brought into harmony with them. The Senate and Syndicate of the University, in a wise spirit of conservatism, have laid the lines of our University in this respect on the model of those which exist in other Provinces. But I doubt, for myself, whether we have yet arrived at what we can accept as the final decision of the University in this particular regard of the use to be made of the Indian classical languages by which I mean Sanskrit, Arabic and Persian. To prevent misunderstanding, let me premise that, in saying this, I have no thought in my mind of any question of the passing moment; what I seek is to lay before you considerations which to me seem most in conformity with the principles which I have stated, in regard, generally to the higher study by natives of India of the Indian classics. Inasmuch as we have to deal with the mind of a people which is in many respects out of sympathy with our own, it seems to me then, in the first place, prudent that we should neglect none of those means by which we can most influence it to our ends. We should avoid what I think, without disrespect to the eminent men I refer to, may be said to have been the recognised error of those who, in 1835, secured for English education the commanding position which it now occupies in India the error, namely, of holding that because English education is best, compulsory instruction of a high class in the Native classic languages must necessarily be otherwise than good. Our University has included in its course of studies the option of selecting, when graduating, one of the classical languages of India. But at the Entrance and Intermediate tests only, is examination in a classical language compulsory. This decision, so far as it goes, is not open to question. What may be regarded as open to question is whether the decision goes far enough. I shall not be understood as desiring to include, in a University course, study of our vernacular languages. They can be taught elsewhere. I would also in passing only observe that such of us as have had opportunities of learning the opinions of foreign Oriental scholars, cannot but be sensible of the justness of their reproach that comparative philology, which owes so much to Sanskrit, is so little associated with Indian or Anglo-Indian names. The decay of Arabic learning and research in India must be similarly regretted by all who recognise, not only its place in the world's history, but the value of the language as a medium of instruction and as a means of training the reasoning faculty. But, these considerations apart the spirit by which a University, with aims such as I have indicated, should be animated, must, in the first place, compel it to encourage instruction in the whole circle of literature falling within its purview, more especially of such literature as occupies an eminent place in the republic of languages. And, secondly, a University cannot, at the risk of failing to maintain its just relations with the mind of the people among whom it labours, neglect those sources of knowledge which, because in them are found the first records of their intellectual growth, most powerfully appeal to their sympathies. It cannot treat in my judgment, even as optional, some adequate final study of those ancient books from which are to be gathered all that in history, in ethics, and in language is most nearly related to the people among whom it is planted. If there is one fact which seems characteristic of the Indian educated mind, it is, I think, that especially in Upper India, as it emerges from the darkness of the later centuries, and finds in acquisition of Western ideas no adequate satisfaction of its intellectual desires, it seeks to re-ascend the stream of history, and to search for some solution of its cravings and aspirations in the wisdom and lore of its ancestors. We have evidence of this tendency, as regards one large section of the people, in the interest with which enlightened Hindus have returned to a study of their Vedas, and the increasing reverence with which they regard them. To ignore, and to leave to unassisted and unguided research, this desire, seems to me to be both illiberal and unwise. It is illiberal, because it neglects a branch of recognised learning which is especially identified with this country; it is unwise, because it declines to guide or to sympathise with speculations which are quickened by our own ethical teaching, and stimulated by the mental discipline received from us. I trust, for my part, that in any future deliberations on this subject, we may continue, while regarding the study of English as paramount, in an increasing degree to recognise and to act on the considerations I have referred to; endeavouring not only to promote the scientific study of those great languages as languages, but by their aid seeking to affect less violently and less abruptly than at present the acceptance by the Indian mind of our Western culture. What we have to do is to fix for and with the educated mind of India the relative value of the knowledge which it can extract from its own classical languages; and to encourage it in drawing strength from all natural elements of instruction in the degree in which each has strength to yield; not to regard partial assimilation of any one of those elements, however important, as alone sufficient for the development which awaits it.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE SINGER.

UNTO the loud acclaim that rose
To greet her as she came,
She bent with lowly grace that seemed Such tribute to disclaim ;
With arms meek folded on her breast
And drooping head, she stood ;
Then raised a glance that seemed to plead
For youth and womanhood ;
A soft, beseeching smile, a look,
As if all silently
The kindness to her heart she took,
And put the homage by.

She stood dejected then, methought,
A captive, though a queen,
Before the throng, when sudden passed
A change across her mien.
Unto her full, dilating eye,
Unto her slender hand,
There came a light of sovereignty,
A gesture of command ;
And, to her lip, an eager flow
Of song, that seemed to bear
Her soul away on rushing wings
Unto its native air ;
Her eye was fixed ; her cheek flushed bright
With power ; she seemed to call
On spirits that around her flocked,
The radiant queen of all ;
• There was no pride upon her brow,
No tumult in her breast ;
• Her soaring soul had won its home,
And smiled there as at rest ;
She felt no more those countless eyes
• Upon her ; she had gained
A region where they troubled not
The joy she had attained !
Now, now, she spoke her native speech,
An utterance fraught with spells
• To wake the echoes of the heart
Within their slumber-cells ;
For, at her wild and gushing strain,
The spirit was led back,
By windings of a silver chain,
On many a long-lost track ;
• And many a quick unbidden sigh,
And starting tear, revealed
How surely at her touch the springs
Of feeling were unsealed ;

They who were always loved, seemed now
Yet more than ever dear ;
Yet closer to the heart they came,
That ever were so near ;
And, trembling to the silent lips,
As if they ne'er had changed
Their names, returned in kindness back
• The severed and estranged ;
And in the strain, like those that fall
On wanderers as they roam,
The exiled spirit found once more
Its country and its home.

She ceased, yet on her parted lips
A happy smile abode,
As if the sweetness of her song
Yet lingered whence it flowed ;
But, for a while, her bosom heaved,
She was the same no more,
The light and spirit fled ; she stood
As she had stood before ;
Unheard, unheeded to her ear
The shouts of rapture came,
A voice had once more power to thrill
That only spoke her name.
Unseen, unheeded at her feet,
Fell many a bright bouquet ;
A single flower, in silence given,
Was once more sweet than they
Her heart had with her song returned
To days for ever gone,
Ere woman's gift of fame was hers,
The many for the one.

E'en thus, O, earth, before thee
Thy poet singers stand,
And bear the soul upon their songs
Unto its native land.
And even thus, with loud acclaim,
The praise of skill, of art,
Is dealt to those who only speak
The language of the heart !
While they who love and listen best,
Can little guess or know
The wounds that from the singer's breast
Have bid such sweetness flow ;
They know not mastership must spring
From conflict and from strife.
" These, these are but the songs they sing ; "
They are the singer's life !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE game of agitation proceeds merrily. Not content with their Bengali brethren at home, the Calcutta wizards are trying to make sport of their Hindu co-religionists outside the Ditch and beyond Bengal. Their Congress connections and experience have stood them in good stead. Luckily, there has yet arisen no Hume nor Bonnerjee to find the sinews of war. They have more blood-suckers—leeches, and so forth—than self-bleeders for conscience or the public good. Otherwise, they could have got up a truly formidable scarecrow against the modest little Bill. Still they are making desperate efforts—on the cheap. And they have succeeded in creating a neat little tornado over a trifle.

BOMBAY long resisted, but at last succumbed to persistent entreaty from Calcutta to do something to save appearances. And she has just not only done that but entered a striking appearance. A meeting of Hindus by private invitation was held on the 1st of this month, under the presidency of Vunjeevndas Madhavdas, at the Madhav Bagh, at which two hundred people attended, of whom the following names, mostly Shettias, are given :—

Rao Bahadur Nana Morjee, Mahamahopadhyaya Bhimacharya Jalkikar, Mahamahopadhyaya Bhimacharya Jalkikar, Mahamahopadhyaya Rajaram Shastri Bodes, Messrs. Vandrawandas Purshotandas, Tribhovandas Varjeevandas, Damodar Tapidas, Jamietram Nanabhai Haridas, Domodar Thakarsi Mooljee, Dharmsi Sunderdas, Shamrao Pandurang Vakil, Raoji Vinakran, Jagunnath Shankerset, Narayan Vishwanath Mandlik, Jagmohandas Vurjeevandas, Mahadev Chinnajee Apte, Sridhar Ganesh Jinsiwala, Ishvarlal Amaratal Dave, Liladhur Jeram Nananjee, Jumnadass Narsee, Vassanjee Manjee, Babajee Kassinath, Muncharam Jeshanker Davinidi, Gordhundass Shivram Vyas, Baburao Ramchander Vakil, Ddongeisi Ganjee, Nagindas Jumnadass, Anna Martand Joshi, L. R. Vaid and Dr. Govindram Bhow Parbhakar.

It was resolved to hold a public meeting to protest against the Age of Consent Bill and memorialise Government. Two Deccani Hindus voted against the motion, but they were told that they had nothing to do with the business and had not been invited.

THE public meeting came off on the 8th, at the same place, under the presidency of the venerable Nana Morjee, for some time minister of Indore. If the artistic telegraphic account flashed to all parts is to be believed, the attendance was unprecedentedly large. But the meeting was obviously invited on false pretences, and if some went to protest against the Bill, others certainly went only to mourn for Mr. Bradlaugh. This sharp practice not only discredits the movers, but also minishes the clearness and force of its meaning.

SATURDAY week, the Hon'ble Mr. Cotton presided at the distribution of prizes at the Oriental Seminary, the oldest independent native educational institution in this city. As a friend of the people amongst whom he is a sojourner, he utilised the occasion for a friendly advice bearing on the question of the hour. He approached the subject with great caution, wishing not to be offensive. After the necessary apology due to a conceited people enamoured of their stagnant semi-civilization, Mr. Cotton thus concluded his address :—

"Nearly ten years ago I wrote in a letter which has been re-published in New India :—'I have never heard any sound argument adduced in favour of the institution of infant marriage. It is intended no doubt as a preventive of immorality. But even from this aspect it is a failure, for it allows boys and girls a free scope and indulgence in their passions at an age when they have reached neither physical nor mental maturity, and when the observance of chastity ought to have been enforced on them as a moral discipline.' With your permission I will expatiate a little on this theme. It is absolutely essential, in every proper system of education, to accustom the young to moral discipline. The cultivation of chastity and continence, and the complete elimination, as far as possible, of impure thoughts and associations, then, are the first conditions of moral training which it is incumbent on the parents, and especially on the mother, to impose on their children. Just as truthfulness is insisted on from the earliest years, and obedience and reverence are rightly taught as primary virtues; as greediness in all forms is discouraged and bodily cleanliness inculcated, so it is equally the duty of parents to keep the minds of their children unsoiled by contact with impure suggestions, and their bodies free from any opportunity of degrading temptation. As the young grow up to maturity, the necessity increases of exercising the strictest discipline over every tendency to give way to their passion. The moral training of the young must always be lamentably neglected so long as the most selfish of all instincts is undisciplined and uncontrolled. The key-note of moral discipline is self control. The alleged necessity of yielding to sexual appetite at an early age is utterly without foundation, and is disproved by the fact that in innumerable cases the desire has been successfully overcome. A life of labour, and, still more, the constant influence of deep family affection, are the best protection in all cases. It is a mother's holiest duty to secure her son against vice, and it is nothing short of a gross insult to human nature to assume that the family influence rightly exercised is not sufficient to preserve the younger members of the family pure in body and mind. Nothing can be more objectionable from the point of view of sexual morality than that from their early infancy boys and girls should be accustomed to hear from their parents and grand-parents about marriage, and the relationship between husbands and wives. But that Hindoo children are so accustomed cannot be denied. The evil is a palpable one, which it is incumbent on the educated members of the community to eradicate. Legislation or no legislation, and be the age of consent under the Penal Code what it may, there is need of a complete revolution in public opinion on this serious and momentous question. Among Hindoo families, as at present constituted, the children are not subjected to the moral discipline which is essential to the proper growth of their body, character, and intellect. Early marriage, and all the associations connected with it, are destructive to purity and self-control. Nothing is commoner than to have early marriage defended from a moral standpoint; but never was there a grosser perversion of the very essence and object of true moral discipline, and it is, above all others, from the point of view of morality that early marriage stands self-condemned."

These views are thoroughly just. They are not perhaps strikingly original. But a people wallowing with pleasure and glory in the mire of garbhadhan, require instruction in the A. B. C. of ethics and social economy.

AS might be expected, the recrudescence of Indian barbarity at the present juncture is affecting the opinions of the other sections of the community. It has already changed the tone of even those organs of the European press in India which were hitherto favorable to our countrymen. The Indian Daily News writes :—

"It would be as well, perhaps, for all Europeans and Eurasians, between the ages of 18 and 50, to take counsel with themselves and consider whether Sir Auckland Colvin is not right, and whether every man who is not already a Volunteer (either active or reserve, according to age and opportunity) ought not to become one as a matter of patriotic duty and principle. Let those who are doubtful read or re-peruse the history of 1857, and remember that, in spite of all the work done by colleges and schools during the last thirty years, in spite also of all the benevolent efforts of the Government, the elements of barbarism are still strong in India, and may at any time, given a favourable opportunity, burst the thin veneer of superficial culture and civilisation with which British rule has succeeded in covering it. How thin and how deceitful the outer polish is may be seen occasionally, as in the current controversy regarding the Government's mild effort to raise the people a short step in the scale of civilisation. Bengal bids fair to provide a parallel proverb to that which says, 'Scratch a Russian and you'll find a Tartar.'"

We confess we have not the face to blame the writer. It would be a miracle if these sentiments were not echoed back from Europe.

THE Maharaja Sahib Takhtsinghji Jaswantsinji, G.C.S.I., of Bhow-nugger, celebrated his thirty-fourth birthday on the 1st February. The ceremony was observed with more than usual clat. It was the first after the conferment of the title of Maharaja by the British Government, and the Maharaja marked the occasion by annulling the orders for the writs of arrest and attachment of property against the persons charged with attempting to create disaffection among His Highness's subjects and of discrediting his administration.

SIR Alexander Wilson, Kt., having retired from India, Mr. James Lyle Mackay, C.I.E., rises into prominence. He has been re-elected President of the Chamber of Commerce and taken in as an Additional Member of the Governor-General's Council. Mr. H. B. H. Turner was offered the last seat, but he declined the honor as he too goes away from India.

THE story will never be forgotten how for want of nerve in Lieutenant Carey, the brave and unfortunate Prince Imperial of France got killed by the Zulus far away down South Africa. We are now called on to revise our belief on the subject. Count Dr. Herrysson has lately published a book in which he virtually hints that Carey was a scoundrel who sacrificed the poor heir of Napoleon III. of set purpose, in the interest of a French political party.

MR. EDWARD Lawrence, of the Indian Civil Service, Bombay Presidency, has obtained a Degree of Honour in Arabic in the first Division, and won the authorized donation of Rs. 5,000.

COLONEL J. G. Forbes, R. E., Secretary to the Government of India, in the P.W.D., notifies that three vacancies in the Superior Accounts Branch will be open to competition at the next examination for admission into that Branch of the service.

THE following is going the round of the press :—

"The largest university in the world is said to be the great Moslem University at Cairo, founded in 975, with its 10,000 pupils and 370 professors. The pupils have no benches or chairs, but study, eat and sleep on blankets or straw mats. The Koran is the only book used for grammar, law, physiology and theology, and the students study it, learn it, and repeat it continually. The professors receive no salary, but are supported by private instruction, by copying books, and by presents from rich scholars. From this great university goes forth annually a small army of fanatics whose whole influence is entirely and constantly exerted against progress and reform. Their creed and war cry is 'There is one God, and Mohammed is His prophet.' These men are imbued with prejudice, and eager to war both with Christianity and with heathenism."

That is of a piece with the misrepresentation which Islam receives at the hands of Christendom. Still we are not a little struck to see the paragraph figuring bravely in the Islamite organ of Southern India without protest or apology.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

FOR libelling the officers of a Uhlan regiment, two German newspaper editors have been sentenced to three months and six weeks' imprisonment respectively.

SOME of the British India steamers were frozen up in the Scheldt.

THE Marquis de Rudini—a Conservative and a supporter of the Triple Alliance—has been able to form a coalition Cabinet to succeed the Crispi, with himself as the Salisbury of the Ministry—at once Premier and Foreign Minister—Signor Colombo, Minister of Finance and Signor Nicotera, Minister of the Interior. Almost the first act of the new Premier was to issue a circular to the Foreign Powers assuring continuity of the policy of the resigned Cabinet and friendship with the Powers.

TO promote the emigration of the Jews to America, Baron Hirsch has given half a million sterling.

THERE is a lull in the Chilean revolt. Only a few skirmishes between the insurgents and the Government but no serious fighting are reported this week. The rebels captured a new ironclad just arrived from Europe.

IN the House of Commons, Sir Roper Lethbridge gave notice of a motion that it was desirable to have a free discussion on Indian affairs at least once every session, and also to amend the Standing Orders so as to permit of the debate on the Indian Budget being brought on before the Speaker leaves the Chair. A notice of a similar motion was given by Sir W. C. Plowden and his motion comes off before Sir Roper's on the 17th.

THE negotiations for the reunion of the two Irish parties which were expected to end soon amicably, have fallen through. Mr. O'Brien attributes the collapse to heated partizanship and empty disputes. One version is that Mr. Parnell was not satisfied with the adequacy of the pledges made by the Gladstonian-Liberals. The campaign over, Messrs. Dillon and O'Brien came over to England and surrendered themselves. They were to have been taken to Dublin for trial on the 13th.

A SYSTEMATIC movement is being made by the Egyptian Government to completely dislodge the Dervishes from Tokar. The Governor of Suakim has orders to proceed there with all available forces—no British troops—to fortify the town and form a Civil Government. The expedition, at the cost of the Egyptian Government, is intended not only to relieve the neighbourhood of Suakim from the oppression of the Dervishes but also to facilitate the opening up of trade in Egypt.

MR. McLaren will move an amendment to the second reading of the Indian Councils Bill, regretting the absence of the elective principle. Mr. Maclean will move a further amendment expressing satisfaction. The present discussion in India on the Age of Consent Bill, will, we doubt not, open the eyes of our countrymen to the danger of the Election fad. The electionists, if they speak their heart, will have a more sweeping and revolutionary measure than the innocent one now in council. Here is a warning to the true patriots of the country. They will consult their own true interests by accepting both the Bills.

SIR Charles Elliott awaits further reports for the closing of the Hindu School. Sir Stuart Bayley had almost decided on it. The bulk of the funds originally contributed to the Hindu School having been transferred to the Presidency College, it was considered a precedent in favour of a proposal to use the Hindu School building for another educational purpose when that for which it was erected was no longer of first-rate importance. Pending the complete scheme for establishing a training college, final orders with regard to the Hindu School have been deferred.

ANY Member of the Indian Civil Service permitted to present himself for examination in the Russian language while on furlough, may be granted an advance of pay not exceeding 35 days' furlough pay and also not exceeding £100. Such advance will only be granted to an officer who draws his furlough pay from the India Office, and will be recovered in instalments spread over eight months after his arrival in Russia.

IN Madras, they have ruled that no Barrister, Vakil or Attorney shall take more than two apprentices at a time without the special sanction of the High Court, and that each apprentice shall keep a record of work done by him for his principal for the inspection of the Registrar. The rule aims to discourage B. Ls. aspiring to be Vakils from taking to employment elsewhere, while continuing articulated and learning the business of the profession.

A SCHOOL peon at Shapoor, after fruitless attempts to wean her back from her disloyal course, proceeded, in a fit of jealousy, to denude his wife Janki of her charms for her paramour. He tied her hands and cut off her nose and ears. He made no secret of the affair but offered himself up for justice. He was tried and sentenced by the Sessions Judge Mr. C. E. G. Crawford, Tanna, to two years' rigorous imprisonment. In review, the Bombay High Court—Messrs. Justices Birdwood and Parsons—rising to the height of the cowardly brutality, enhanced the punishment to seven years' transportation.

MR. W. H. Moor, of the Ceylon Civil Service, was deputed as Additional Police Magistrate, to investigate, at the village Depaneme, in the Western Province, a charge against some of the villagers for riot and causing hurt. He himself was hauled up before Mr. J. D. Mason, Police Magistrate of Colombo, for causing Kottalawellegey Frederick Alwis of Kottawe to be handcuffed, unlawfully and wrongfully and with intent to cause injury, fear and annoyance, causing him to be paraded about the public road at Depaneme, and by beat of tom-tom proclaiming him as a bar, and threatening to make him stand on a chair during the rest of the day and proclaiming him as a lying rascal, and wrongfully confining him in a shed. Mr. Moor has taken two initial objections to the proceedings of the Colombo Magistrate. He contends that he as a Magistrate having concurrent jurisdiction with Mr. Mason, was not amenable to prosecution before that Magistrate. The other plea is that the acts complained of were in his opinion "legal" and that the Magistrate had no power to dispute his opinion. Virtually, his opinion is law and he is above law.

THE furniture of Citizen Dom Pedro, ex-Emperor of Brazil, was lately put up to auction. It was a poor business. His Imperial throne was knocked down for about £74. In comparison, other articles sold better, such as a Chickering square piano for £200, a writing-desk belonging to the ex-Empress for £300, a prie Dieu for about £13, and the suite of furniture of the ex-Emperor's private room for about £450. That Brummagem "Euramerican" throne deserved to be kicked out.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL H. H. Goodwin Austin did not live to complete his "Land and Fresh water Mollusca of India." The Government of India is, however, anxious that the research thus begun, should, if possible, be carried through. The Government of Bengal has accordingly been called upon to enquire of the officers of the Indian Museum, of Dr. D. D. Cunningham, Dr. G. King, or the Secretary, Asiatic Society in the Department of Natural History, if any of them are willing to continue the work.

BARON HAUSSMANN, the Adile of the Capital of the second Empire, is dead. He was the most magnificent Prefect that ever lived. Under him, Paris, already a thing of beauty, became a charming spot. He lacked the true eye for delicacy of artistic effect, but his recklessness of cost and his passion for bulk and for light made thorough amends for his unfortunate proclivity to straight lines.

ANOTHER star has disappeared from the galaxy of the French Theatre. Scarcely had the Comédie-Française recovered from the shock caused by the death of Madam Samary, when it sustained another loss in the death of Madam Montaland. She was born at Gaud in 1843, on the very plank of a theatre, where her father was an actor, and she played, as a child, the rôles d'enfant in Gabrielle and Charlotte Corday. Of her performances of that period, a well-known French critic says: "We admired her not as a precocious child but as a great artist playing the part of a child. We heard her with care and attention as if she had been Mlle. Mars herself." She grew up in grace and power. Her very appearance on the stage charmed, until the brilliant French girl—

A creature not too bright or good

For human nature's daily food—

came to be called "a smile incarnate."

After a strange and wandering career of more than 40 years, a good portion of which was spent in Russia, Celine Montaland took up her quarters at the Comédie, where she made her debut in 1884 in Bataille de Dames. In 1888, she was made a partner in consequence of her great success in Souris. It was while lovingly attending upon her daughter, who was attacked with measles, that this charming artist fell a victim to her maternal love, in the full splendour of her popularity and in the maturity of her talents and elegance. After Samary, Montaland! and they are the noblest examples of the preservation of domestic affection under the difficulties of the theatrical profession. The mother was not lost in the actress!

ONE after another, in quick succession, two of the highest nobles and greatest landlords have died at the beginning of the New Year—the Dukes of Somerset and Bedford. They both belonged to old historic lines, the late St. Maur having been the thirtieth holder of the duchy of Somerset and the late Russell the ninth Duke of Bedford. The house of the former had in our times been distinguished by the parts and attainments of a late Duke who was at once a political philosopher and an epigrammatic orator. The Russells are probably the most illustrious family in the peerage for their accomplishments and their services and, above all, their sufferings in the cause of civil and religious liberty. The Duke of Bedford is one of the largest landed proprietors—zemindars—in the kingdom. Besides his splendid property in town—markets, houses, &c., in London and other cities and towns, he owns estates in twelve counties. The bulk of these lies in Cambridgeshire, Devonshire and Bedfordshire. In the first, he has 18,800 acres and in the second 22,607 acres, while in his khass zilla he holds 32,269 acres. The total in the twelve counties comes up to 86,335 acres, with a gross annual rental of £141,793. Add the income of the valuable London property, and you have a veritable Cicæsus!

THE Indian Planter's Gazette, with which is now incorporated Sporting News, has opened a portrait gallery. Seven planting, mercantile and sporting notabilities have already had their likenesses taken. The pictures are all artistically executed and of a high order of merit. The last issue contains an excellent portrait of Mr. John Phillip Thomas, the senior partner of the well-known firm of Messrs.

Thomas & Co., Indigo-brokers. The letter-press accompanying gives interesting particulars relating to the history of commerce and of metropolitan localities. The business originally belonged to the now defunct firm of Tulloh & Co., who occupied premises facing Dalhousie Square and extending to, and opening out in, Mission Row, now shared between Newman & Co., Harold & Co., and others, and partly by the Currency Office and the Agra Bank. Messrs. Tulloh were the oldest auctioneers of Calcutta who sold everything from pins and crockery up to indigo and silk, and even houses and estates. The crash of 1830 in which the princely house of Alexander & Co. went down, was Tulloh's opportunity for aggrandising their indigo connection. They separated this business under a distinct name, More, Hickey & Co., in a separate place at their back, then No. 2, now No. 8, Mission Row, bringing out a young man from Mincing Lane of the name of Robert Thomas to assist in it. Thus arose the New Mart, the first separate Indigo auction in the country, and now the oldest. And thus commenced the line of the Thomases. Mr. More died and Tulloh giving up the connection, the firm changed to Hickey, Thomas & Co. In 1840, Mr. Thomas was tempted by the plethoric grandeur of the mercantile and agency house of Fergusson Brothers & Co. to join it. A French planter of Mirzapore, owner of the Camareah concern, took his place and Hickey, Thomas & Co. became Hickey, Bayley & Co. Fergusson Brothers soon failed, and poor Bob Thomas reverted to his proper vocation of indigo-broker. His new mart at the Bonded Ware House so menaced Hickey, Bayley & Co., that they were glad to take him back. Thus matters went on from 1843 to 1847, when Calcutta was overtaken by one of its periodical mercantile crises, with the fall of the Union Bank, when Hickey, Bayley & Co., with many a greater concern, failed. The next year, however, Mr. R. Thomas revived the mart in the old place in conjunction with Mr. Charles Martin, the well-known sportsman, and Mr. Richard Dodd, under the style of Robert Thomas & Co., and Mr. Bayley started with Mr. W. Moran the Old Mint Mart as W. Moran & Co. John Phillip Thomas like Thomas I. had served his apprenticeship in the city of London for four years. Brought out as an assistant in 1889, he was, on Mr. Martin's retirement, admitted a partner. Thenceforward, till his death, Mr. Bob Thomas and his firm had a prosperous career. A year after his death, which took place in 1865, Calcutta was shaken by the Agra Bank stopping payment, and Thomas & Co. shut up shop. It was a brief spell of paralysis. If the partners failed, the assistants came to the rescue. These were Mr. John Thomas, Mr. R. S. Hills and Mr. E. A. Thurnburn, and they not only opened the mart but took in both Mr. R. Dodd and Mr. J. P. Thomas as assistants, and, we dare say, treated them, notwithstanding their altered position and relation, with generous respect. In due course, these assistants were again admitted as partners, Mr. J. P. Thomas rising to be the head of the firm. Dodd died in 1870, Hills retired in 1874, and John Thomas and Thurnburn in 1884, leaving now in the field three Thomases (Mr. J. P. Thomas, Mr. W. L. Thomas, and Mr. R. E. S. Thomas), Mr. R. R. Hills, and Mr. McIntosh. There is a lesson to all in that history. We can wish our countrymen nothing better than to cultivate the energy and perseverance of these indomitable Britons.

THE new magazine Forum, following the method of focussing facts and ideas introduced by the great magazines and weeklies like the Pall Mall Gazette, is publishing a series of articles on "Formative Influences." The December number contains Archdeacon Farrar's contribution. It is a strain of autobiography in which he refers to the principal influences which he underwent. These include a dozen and a half of the leading men of letters, with a couple of the most eminent scientific men of the day, to wit,

"Lord Macaulay, Charles Darwin, Thackeray, Carlyle, the late Lord Lytton, Sir Arthur Helps, Archbishop Tait, Archbishop Trench, Dr. Whewell, Bishop Fraser, Bishop Lightfoot, Lord Hatherly, Canon Kingsley, Dr. Edwin Hatch."

Nor were these all. He names other "formators." Thus—

"In Bishop Cotton, of Calcutta, I knew a man whose whole life was one continuous growth in power and faithfulness. Mr. Matthew Arnold was a friend of many years' standing. For several years I was thrown into almost daily association with Dean Stanley. Much also learnt from Mr. Robert Browning, not only as a poet but as a man. He illustrated the simple dignity of man as man; the way in which high self-respect—the holy reverence of each for his own intrinsic gift of manhood—can raise a man above the reach of hostile influences, and command the homage even of those who sneer. And besides the advantages which I may have derived from the society of such men as these, and of others scarcely less eminent whom I do not name, I was for three years, a constant hearer, and for many years a friend of Professor Frederic Denison Maurice. He was one of the best men, and one of the greatest whom I have ever known."

We had the privilege of knowing Bishop Cotton well, and can imagine the influence such a noble soul would exercise upon an impressive spirit. He was one of the true gentlemen of Christian life and Western learning. Since Heber, probably India has not known such a prelate or even dignitary of the Church. It is within our own knowledge that the good Bishop did much to strengthen the hands of Lord Canning in 1858, by repressing the unholy passion for vengeance which, not without cause, animated the Anglo-Indians, and which had become as great a danger to Government as the rebellion itself in the preceding year. His death was a great loss to India.

WITH respect to his early studies, the Archdeacon says:—

"In the distant days, when I was a boy, books—at any rate among us school-boys in secluded Mona—were not easily procurable, but we could get hold of Sir Walter Scott's novels, and Fenimore Cooper's and Captain Marryat's, and had read them all, and discussed their characters among ourselves. We had to learn a good deal of English poetry by heart including such poems as "The Deserted Village," and "The Traveller," and Heber's "Palestine." Nearly all of us had read more or less of the better poems of Byron, Scott, Shelley, Moore, Coleridge, and Wordsworth for ourselves; and frequently, lying awake in the dormitories after the early hours when we were sent to bed, we discussed and fought over their merits. From early years I have been fond of poetry, and I owe an immense debt to the poets, not only because I have found in them the greatest and best of moral teachers, who revealed to me, or confirmed in me, the purest truths on which it is possible to live, but also because they have illuminated many a dark hour, and have added fresh sunlight to many a bright one by noble lessons set to natural music in noble words. They have helped me to hang the picture gallery of imagination with lovely and delightful scenes, and to take refuge from any storm which might beat upon me from without in that flood of unquenchable sunshine which they had kindled for me within."

THE Amir is reported to be convalescent, and to have resumed the duties of State.

THE garrison at Mogaung on the North Burma Frontier is being fast strengthened, in view of a rumoured filibustering raid from China.

THE Mu Valley Railway cannot be pushed on to completion, in consequence of the difficulty of transporting rolling stock over the river from Mandalay to Sagain. This will delay the opening to Shwebo for some months, it is feared.

WHILE so many Bengalis are making themselves uncomfortable over the consequences, here and hereafter, of the Age of Consent Bill, the Hindus in general have just enjoyed a splendid opportunity of cheap salvation. On Sunday last, the 8th February, after a quarter of a century, occurred a starry conjunction—the Ardhodaya Yag—which to an inconceivable degree enhances and multiplies the merit of good deeds and religious observances, performed under it. Chief among the deeds and observances is bathing in the Ganges. The opportunity was utilised to the utmost for a dip. From source to sea, the long stream, one of the longest in the globe, was at certain hours covered with bathing millions. The Hoogly was as crowded as the main river. The city was invaded by pilgrims from the interior. The Eastern Hive sent forth its myriads. The Municipality and the Police were on the alert and made all possible arrangements for their reception and comfort. But the crowd was so vast, that they spread unhealthiness around and a number of them died of cholera.

THE annual meeting of the Countess of Dufferin's Fund was, as usual, held at the Town Hall, on Monday. The Viceroy presided. The gathering was respectable, admission to the reserved seats being by cards. It was prominently brought out that Bengal lagged behind in this benevolent charity. Dr. Sircar spoke eloquently in behalf of it, and gave powerful indirect support to the Age of Consent Bill, denouncing the barbarous treatment of women.

THE Sphinx of the hour is the Emperor of Germany. The peace of Europe—the destinies of nations—all depend, in a great measure, on this young prince. Everybody tries to fathom him, but not to much purpose. The French are particularly interested in the subject, and one of their ablest writers throws considerable light on it. His deliverance is translated specially for this journal below.

When we compare his visits to the Kings and Emperors with his socialistic congresses and academic commissions,—when we follow him in his incessant journeys—in his reviews of fleets and armies,—when we see him sit by turus at the tables of sovereigns and at the banquets of towns, and when we read speech after speech which he delivered, we ask ourselves whether in this perpetual agitation—in this life on waggon, on horseback and at the table, he does not betray the incoherence of Schiller's student born for a crown. But after reflection, we propose another question to ourselves—What marks does this young sovereign wish to leave on history?

Is it, after having accorded to the social reforms what the Chief of a State can accord, is it after having given to the academic reforms the double note of the religious spirit of the past and the modern contempt for Greek and Latin, that this young Emperor will continue to wish to impose conciliation on contrary principles? Is it that, being supported by a formidable army, he will one day propose a universal disarmament?

It would seem that the young Emperor, who loves to take the initiative in the most extraordinary ideas, meditates to propose to France a disarmament, of which he will be the first to give the example. The motive of this resolution is the laudable desire to lighten the most heavy burden which the present great armies press on the nations of Europe. Indeed, every year the Great Powers are obliged to spend a little more than three milliards of francs for the maintenance of their armies. It is evident that if they have not to pay this formidable budget of war, they can ameliorate considerably the well-being, the happiness and the prosperity, which they stand in need of. This formidable budget of war will no doubt prove, within a few years, the ruin of Europe.

The suppression or a notable diminution of this budget of war is certainly most desirable; but, in the present situation of Europe, how is this to be brought about? Two solutions of this difficulty are set forth. The first is war, the second disarmament. The first solution is of course out of the question, for a war now-a-days means a national death. The second recommends itself to every thinking man who has the peace of the world at heart. The question is how is the general disarmament to be effected? Will it be proportioned to the population of the Powers? Now, Germany has 43 millions of inhabitants, and France 35 millions. In establishing the exact proportion, Germany will have an army of 450,000 men against an army of 350,000 French. This will place France in a position of flagrant inferiority, which no Frenchman will tolerate for a moment.

Emperor William evidently wishes to try to group around him some new forces. Yesterday, it was the workmen; to-day, they are the mothers of families whose benedictions he covets. Finally, he will propose the disarmament. If France refuses it, it is France that puts the obstacle to the peace of the world. The disarmament—it is for France the definite acceptance of the defeat,—it is the abandonment for ever of Alsace and Lorraine, it is the negation of the modern right of the people to dispose of themselves as they like, to choose their country, to depend no longer on treaties between Chiefs of States in which they are not consulted. Never, in France, will any Government, be it what it may, be able to agree to any proposition of disarmament, which will not be preceded by a revision of the Treaty of 1871.

Is it not this impossibility that the young Emperor counts on? Is it not this refusal of France that he looks for? Is it not this case of war that he caresses in pursuing his dream of social and academic reforms?

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, February 14, 1891.

OUR RISHIS AND THEIR METHOD OF LEGISLATION.

ALTHOUGH we do not entertain any apprehension that the Consent Bill will interfere with our religion or our religious observances, it is not to be supposed that we have any sympathy with the advocates of so called social reforms. Our views on the subject are well known to our readers, yet, for convenience of reference, we may cite the following from one of our recent issues:—

'It must be obvious to every one that the parties, who make love, generally dive too deep and lose their heads in the torrent. If left to themselves, they run the risk of taking in marriage actresses, nautch girls and wily strumpets. The miseries brought about by such marriages are only too well known to our European friends, and, if they are real well wishers of India, they ought not to be anxious to give us the benefit of a form of matrimony which must, in a great many cases, end in the Divorce Court. * * *

If we are to have the gandharva form of marriage reintroduced into the country, we must also have a law for enabling the Sakuntalas of new India to claim heavy damages against their quondam lovers. Let our reformers think seriously of the matter, and say whether they are prepared to subject the courts of the country to the infliction of having to deal frequently with cases like Birdle v. Picwick.*

Our belief is that the cry for what is called social reform, is due chiefly to a very imperfect appreciation of the legislation of our Rishis. Although there are many treatises in English which profess to deal with Hindu Law, there is hardly a single work which throws any light on the peculiarities of Hindu Jurisprudence, or the successive steps by which it has been gradually developed and improved. The scholars and jurists who have devoted their attention to the subject, have placed the republic of letters in possession of a few historical facts and dates—and a great many conjectures too—about the authorship of our legal Codes and Digests. But Hindu Jurisprudence has not been reviewed by any one in that philosophical method which characterises Sir Henry Maine's Ancient Law. The result is that the Institutes of our holy legislators are very imperfectly appreciated. At any rate, they are very erroneously regarded by many as mere ideal pictures and not Codes of Law.* The truth, however, is that the Sanhitas of Manu and Yagnyavalkya are Codes, in a far more comprehensive sense, than the modern legislative enactments to which the name is usually applied. The Sanhitas deal not only with what Mr. Austin calls Positive Law, but they affect to regulate the action of all classes of men, in almost every concern of life. Social etiquette, domestic duties, education, diet, cleanliness—all these, and many things else, come within the scope of their legislation. They not only lay down rules for the guidance of the several castes, but they define the duties of the kingly office, and they succeeded in making even crowned heads bow to their authority. So great is their influence even at the present time, that the strenuous efforts made of late years for what is called "social reformation" have not been productive of any result whatever: nay, the Widow-Marriage Act itself, of the all-powerful British Indian Legislature, remains a dead-letter in the statute book.

The principles which, according to Sir Henry Maine, govern the origin and development of juridical ideas, are applicable only to the systems of law with which the learned jurist was familiar; but so far as Hindu Law is concerned, those principles have little or no application. In fact, both as to province and method, the dissimilarity between the Hindu Codes and the legal systems of Europe is so great, that the same principles cannot possibly hold good with regard to both. In European countries, the primary object of legislators is to frame rules for adjudication of forensic disputes; but the ultimate aim of the Hindu Rishis was to regulate the action of men in every department of life. In Europe, the temporal rulers make laws, and enforce them by temporal punishment; but, in the belief of orthodox Hindus, Law is eternal and immutable. Even Manu and Yagnyavalkya are not, strictly speaking, the authors of our laws. Theoretically, they are mere compilers, who have collected together, in a handy and convenient form, the ordinances of the Vedas. The fact or fiction is that the Vedas are too vast to be mastered by ordinary mortals; and the Rishis and their books are, therefore, accepted as the safest and most reliable guides. The legal systems of modern Europe are like mechanisms for artificial irrigation. There is no mystery about their source of supply, or as to the channels in which they flow. Their course is always direct and straight to the point; but their range and sphere of action are extremely limited, and they very seldom make any permanent impression, or wash away for ever the evils which they are meant to remedy. In fact, they generally cease to work so soon as the power at their source is withdrawn or crippled.

The character of Hindu Jurisprudence is altogether different. Its origin is so completely lost in the inaccessible heights of remote antiquity, that we regard it as the direct gift of Heaven. The binding force of a very large portion of our laws is not dependent upon the power or inclination of any temporal sovereign or administrator to enforce them: they carry with them their own sanction. It, therefore, happens that, in spite of all the changes in the political condition of the Hindus, their Law still retains, to a great extent, that vitality which it had in the days of Brahmanical ascendancy. Considering all these peculiarities of Hindu Jurisprudence, it is no wonder that its development has taken a different course altogether from that of the European systems. According to Sir Henry Maine, the agencies by which law is improved and modified are:—

1. Fiction.
2. Equity.
3. Legislation.

We have in our Jurisprudence a large number of fictions which have served as instruments for modifying and improving it. But the most important agencies which have answered that purpose in our system are:—

1. Direct Legislation.
2. Indirect Legislation.
3. Interpretation.

Theoretically considered, direct legislation may appear to be better than the indirect methods to which we are about to refer. But so long as human nature continues to be what it is, direct legislation must, in some cases, be quite as undesirable as direct taxation. The Rishis had little or no temporal power. In bringing about such changes in the customs of the time as they deemed necessary, it would have been a fatal error on their part to ride roughshod on the feelings and prejudices of the men whom they sought to rule and civilize. They eradicated the barbarous institutions of primitive society, not by high-handed measures of enforced reform, but by a kind of legislative tact, which, when clearly understood, cannot but elicit the admiration of every reflecting mind.

Among the ordinances in the Code of Manu which have led European scholars to conclude that it is only an ideal picture, the most important are, perhaps,

Holloway's Pills.—Important for the delicate. It is difficult to determine which is the more trying to the human constitution, the damp, cold days of autumn and winter, or the keen, dry, easterly winds of spring. Throughout the seasons good health may be maintained by occasional doses of Holloway's Pills, which purify the blood and act as wholesome stimulants to the skin, stomach, liver, bowels and kidneys. This celebrated medicine needs but a fair trial to convince the ailing and desponding that it will restore and cheer them without danger, pain, or inconvenience. No family should be without a supply of Holloway's Pills and Ointment, as by a timely recourse to them the first erring function may be reclaimed, suffering may be spared, and life saved.

* Vide Sir Henry Maine's Ancient Law, p. 18.

those which require every member of the twice-born caste to pass through certain Asramas or stages of life. In practice, very few Hindus observe these precepts, and perhaps there never was a time when they were, in strict conformity to Shastric injunctions, observed. Such texts, therefore, apparently support the conclusion that Manu's Sanhita is not a Code of Laws, but a work of the same nature as More's Utopia. But, in this very instance, the sage displayed that practical turn and that tact which were the main causes of his success as a legislator. Reading the texts between the lines, it would appear that what the Lawgiver really intended, was to encourage men to marry and live as peaceful householders, instead of observing celibacy, and running the risk of drifting into a disreputable course of life. Asceticism naturally calls forth the admiration of the vulgar; and the man who renounces the world, on the plea of religion, generally attains a high place in public estimation, though he may be only an adventurer or a swindler pure and simple. It was, however, not consistent with Manu's policy to declare that there was no merit whatever in the life of a Sanyasi or a Paribrajak. He does not say that ascetics are either lovers of notoriety or misguided enthusiasts. The sage knew too well how to maintain the dignity of his profession, to expose even the impostors to infamy; so, instead of discrediting asceticism, he actually recommends it, though at a period of life when it can have no attraction even to the most adventurous spirits. It is laid down in his Code that, after completing the study of the Vedas, men should marry and live as householders till their fiftieth year, or till the period when the decay of the physical powers of the body visibly commenced. (Manu, Chapter VI, verse 2.)

The device answered its purpose. By means of it, religious vagrancy was checked, and the Brahmanical priests were enabled to marry and beget children without losing their sanctity. The ultimate result of this was that their profession became hereditary. There are other religions which sanction the marriage of the priestly class. But Hinduism is the only religion that places marriage on a higher footing than asceticism, and declares that, at a certain period of life, it is positively sinful not to marry and beget children. (Manu, Chapter III, verses 77, 78, Chapter VI, verse 37.)

The practical good sense which characterises these precepts, clearly proves that the Hindu Legislators were not mere visionaries and dreamers. According to their conception of religion, its function is to regulate the action of men in all things where they require to be guided. Their ideal may not be acceptable to those who are accustomed to regard religion as equivalent to faith in God, and in the efficacy of prayer; but as to the philosophical thoughtfulness and practical statesmanship of the sages who originated and worked out the idea, there can be but one opinion.

Another instance of what we call indirect legislation, is to be found in the ordinances by which the primitive practice of marriage by purchase, force, or fraud, has been made to give place to the form of matrimony which now prevails among all the higher castes of the Hindus. The device by which this has been accomplished is, in many respects, similar to that by which asceticism has been discouraged. In both cases, the main instruments by which the desired result has been brought about, are classification and marshalling in particular orders. Marriage by force, fraud, or purchase is not declared as altogether illegal; but eight different modes of acquiring marital dominion are enumerated; and, while marriage, based on the gift of the bride by her father, is placed in the highest class, the other forms of matrimony are placed in the lower classes, and declared as more or less sinful. Marriage based on gift is, in fact, so strongly recommended, that it has very nearly superseded all the other forms of wedlock. The legislation of the sages has, in this instance, been rather too effective; for, instead of bridegrooms having to buy brides, the prevailing complaint now is that the parents of marriageable girls have to give heavy bribes to eligible bridegrooms and their parents. From the definition of the Brahmo form of marriage in the holy Codes, it appears clear that it was originally meant as a device for encouraging the cultivation of learning, and elevating the position of the literary profession. Manu says:

The gift of a damsel richly clad and decorated (with ornaments) to a man learned in the Vedas, whom her father invites, without being solicited, is nuptial called Brahmo.—Manu, Chapter III, v. 27.

As the privilege of studying the Vedas is confined to the Brahmins, the Brahmo form was evidently not meant for the other castes. But the inferior classes of society are so prone to imitate the practice of the aristocracy, that even among the Sudras, the Brahmo is now the prevailing form of matrimony. In this respect, also, the legislation of the Rishis has been rather too successful.

The legislation by which illegitimate sons have been deprived of the status which they had in the primitive state of society, is exactly similar. There was, perhaps, a time in every society when the distinction between bastards and legitimate sons was unknown or practically overlooked. It is only at a very advanced stage of civilization that bastards are regarded as filii nullius. But Hindu jurisprudence alone preserves any record of the successive steps by which the feelings and notions of men on the subject have been moulded into their present shape. At the time when the Rishis legislated, they could not, by one stroke of their pen, deprive children of illegitimate birth of all their rights. In all probability, concubinage was in those times the rule, and marriage, in regular form, the exception, among all but the highest castes. In the nature of things, there is not much difference between the child of a woman kept under protection, and one born of lawful wedlock. At the present time, Hindu feeling is so strong against illegitimacy, that it is extremely rare, and the few whose purity of birth is known to be doubtful, are excluded from the society of all respectable people, and are treated as worse than outcasts. The sentiments of the Hindus in the matter are now so far in advance of their laws that, although the Shasters give certain rights of inheritance to the illegitimate sons of Sudras, in practice, the right is never recognised in Bengal.

In the Heroic Age of Indian legislation, any attempt to deprive bastards of all rights of sonship would have been too far in advance of social sentiment to have been practically successful. By insisting upon the marriage of females before maturity, and by descanting on the spiritual bliss attained through the birth of an Aurasa or legitimate son, the legislation of the Rishis reduced the number of bastards in the country to such an extent that, from a very early period, they ceased to be recognised altogether. The older Codes divided them into several different classes. But in consequence of the early marriage of females, and the abolition of Niyoga, the Kshettraja,* the Kánina,† and the Sahodraja‡ kinds became rare if not obsolete; and it is not surprising that the sage Vrihaspati himself refused to recognise the twelve classes of sons mentioned in the earlier Codes. The Rishi says:—

"Sons of many descriptions who were made by ancient saints, cannot now be adopted by men by reason of their deficiency of power."

The most important instance of indirect legislation by our Rishis, is that by which the practice called Niyoga, or appointment to raise issue on the widow of a deceased person, has been made obsolete. As the marriage of Hindu widows was quite as impossible in former times as it is now, on account of the zenana system, it was but natural that, on the death of any member of a joint family, his widows passed under the protection of one of his surviving brothers. In all probability, the practice was very general in the time of the Rishis, and they could not hope to abolish it by direct legislation. So, after denouncing it as fit only for cattle, and ascribing its origin to King Vena,§ the sage Manu changes his tone altogether, and declares that it is legal, but only when made in a lawful manner, and with a lawful object. He then goes on to prescribe certain ceremonies and conditions, ostensibly to regulate the practice, but in reality to make it impossible. The conditions are:—

- (1) That the levir must be appointed for the purpose by some one having the necessary authority in the family.
- (2) That the parties should meet only once in a month.
- (3) That they should meet only at dead of night.
- (4) That they should not converse with each other.
- (5) That the widow should not dress or toilet like a married woman.
- (6) That after the birth of one male child, the parties should regard each other as father-in-law and daughter-in-law.

Such being the restrictions imposed on Niyoga, it is no wonder that it has become obsolete and unknown. The Rishis who, by such means, abolished widely-prevailing customs, were certainly not mere moral teachers. Their ordinances clearly show that their object was to regulate the conduct of men, and not merely to preach what they thought to be true and proper. For all practical purposes, they were legislators. It is true that they were neither elected by the people, nor appointed by the king to make laws. But the commands imposed by them on the people are generally obeyed, and are, therefore, Laws according to Austin's definition of the term.

From the apparent conflict of texts in our Codes, European scholars and jurists have been led to conclude that there must have been interpolations and alterations in the Sanhitas of Manu and Yagnyavalkya. Mr. Mayne in his treatise on Hindu Law says:—

"It is impossible to reconcile the precepts as to eating flesh meat or as to the second marriage of women. Even as regards men, some passages seem to indicate that a man could not marry again during the life of his first wife, while in others second marriages are expressly recognised and regulated. So

* Kshettraja is the son begotten on the widow of a deceased person by his brother or other relation.

† Kánina is the son of an unmarried damsel.

‡ Sahodraja is a son conceived in the womb of his mother at the time of her marriage.

§ By this account of the origin of the practice, the sage obviously meant to say that it was not an immemorial custom.

the texts which refer to the marriage of a Brahmin with a Sudra woman, and to the procreation of children upon a widow for the benefit of the husband are evidently of different periods."

To our mind, such erroneous notions, entertained by the best scholars of Europe, prove, beyond the possibility of doubt, that our Codes are very imperfectly appreciated. The Reformers who aspire to take the place of Manu and Yagnyavalkya, cannot expect us to believe in them, unless they show at least that they understand what they are about.

The discussion now being carried on with reference to the Consent Bill, also emphasizes the necessity of a clearer insight into our Shasters than what is evidenced in the method of fighting adopted by the belligerents. It is being seriously argued that, because a son is necessary for spiritual purposes, therefore every Hindu must take the earliest opportunity to beget a son. But Manu distinctly says that men shall not ordinarily marry before their twentyfourth year. This injunction is certainly not consistent with the idea that, according to our Shasters, every Hindu is bound to marry and beget children as early as possible. Why is it, again, that the remarriage of widows is reprobated by our old legislators? The fact is, that when it serves their purpose they descant on the spiritual advantages of possessing an Aurasa son. But they knew how to get rid of the doctrine, when it stood in their way in bringing about such reforms as they deemed to be necessary. Manu himself says:—

"Many thousands of Brahmans having avoided sensuality from their early youth and having left no issue in their families, have ascended nevertheless to heaven; and like those abstemious men a virtuous wife ascends to heaven, though she have no child, if, after the decease of her lord, she devote herself to pious austerities; but a widow, who, from a wish to bear children, slights her deceased husband, brings disgrace on herself here below, and shall be excluded from the abode of her lord."—Manu. Chapter V, 159-160.

With reference to this very subject, the author of the Mitakshera cites a maxim which has an important bearing on the questions now under our consideration. It is to the following effect:—

"Practise not that which is legal but is abhorred by the world, for, it secures not celestial bliss."

After citing this maxim, Vignáneshwar goes on to observe:—

"As the practice of offering bulls is shunned, on account of popular prejudice, notwithstanding the injunction 'offer to a venerable priest a bull or a large goat,' and as the slaying of a cow is for the same reason disused, notwithstanding the precept 'slay a barren cow as a victim consecrated to Mitra and Varuna,' it is expressly declared 'As the duty of an appointment to raise up seed to another, and as the slaying of a cow for a victim are disused, so is partition with deductions in favor of elder brothers.' " Vignáneshwar prohibits Niyoga and unequal partition on the ground that, that which is abhorred by the wise and the good ought not to be practised even if sanctioned or enjoined by the Shasters. On the same ground, it may well be said that consummation on a child wife of ten or eleven years ought not to be allowed. But we do not rest upon that ground alone. We have shewn that the practice is not sanctioned by our Shasters.

In order to understand what our Lawgivers have laid down, it is necessary to take into consideration the state of things existing at the time when they legislated. There is no reason whatever to suppose that, in laying down their rules for the guidance of men, they started with the idea that a son was absolutely necessary. It seems to us to be much more reasonable to suppose that their object was

- (1) to introduce marriage in regular form.
- (2) to render marriage irrevocable.
- (3) to prevent promiscuous intercourse.
- (4) to encourage men to lead the settled life of householders, instead of joining bands of robbers and adventurers that in all probability infested the country at the time.
- (5) to pave the way towards declaring that sons, not born of lawful wedlock, were bastards.

The Shasters nowhere declare that they had these objects in view. But, on any other hypothesis, their injunctions are simply absurd and inexplicable. In order to bring about the reforms that were necessary at the time when they flourished, they laid down

- (1) That the father and the paternal relations of girls must give them in marriage before their maturity.
- (2) That an Aurasa son was absolutely necessary for spiritual purposes.
- (3) That it was not proper for females to marry more than once.
- (4) That the best form of marriage was that in which the bride was given to an eligible bridegroom by the father.

There is but one step from bigamy to promiscuous intercourse. In European countries, the mischief is prevented by the law against bigamy. But our legislators had not sufficient temporal power for enforcing their fiats, and they worked upon the sentiments of their followers in such manner as to make it quite shocking to them even to contemplate the marrying of a widow or a grown-up female.

JOGENDRA NATH BHATTACHARJEE.

THE AGE OF CONSENT.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The learned Dr. Bhattacharjee appears to be writing very ably on the Age of Consent question considered with reference to the Hindu Shastras, but I beg to be pardoned for dissenting from some of his views.

He has laid down four issues for the consideration of his opponents.

As regards the first, I would simply say (without taking upon myself to give a direct answer to the question) that if the learned Doctor is of opinion that there is no "text laying down expressly that consummation on a child-wife of ten or eleven years is obligatory on the occurrence of a certain event" to be found, he will do well not to be very positive.* Besides, an injunction not quite express in its terms may, on construction† with reference to the context and the accepted rules of interpretation, be found to be as good (or as bad, if you like) as an express mandate.

As regards the second, I wish to observe that Medhatithi‡ is only one among a number of commentators and is certainly not acknowledged in Bengal as the greatest of them. The next thing that I would like to point out in this connection is that the fact of a rule being subject to certain specified exceptions, so far from proving that it can be broken at pleasure§ and is better broken than observed, proves that it cannot be broken without guilt except in the circumstances enumerated. The express mention of those cases in which infraction of the rule is permissible impliedly excludes all others.

* This is simply captious.—ED. R. & R.

† The construction must be such as to avoid conflict with other texts.—ED. R. & R.

‡ Our correspondent speaks without the book. There can be no question about Medhatithi's eminence as a commentator or jurist. He is cited as a great authority by both Raghunandan and Jimutavahan, and the Bengal Pandits cannot but admit that his opinion carries very great weight.—ED. R. & R.

§ This is not fair to Dr. Bhattacharjee. He never said that the general rule as to the performance of Garbhadhan could be broken at pleasure. He cited the authority of Medhatithi to prove that the rule was subject to exceptions, and that the Pandits were clearly wrong in laying down that consummation was imperative whenever a certain event occurred—whether in the 10th or 11th year.—ED. R. & R.

As regards the third, it appears to me possible to adduce a great many circumstances* pointing to the conclusion that consummation of marriage at the very earliest opportunity must be imperative. The following are some of them :—

- (a) The injunction by the Shastras of propagation as a duty. The object of taking a wife is declared to be propagation.
- (b) The paramount importance from a religious point of view of male offspring for the salvation of one's soul.
- (c) The insecurity of human life.
- (d) The uncertainty of health.
- (e) The possibility of divers unforeseen events happening to place it beyond the power of the husband to meet his wife.
- (f) The prohibition of the remarriage of widows.
- (g) The religious necessity to women of offspring.
- (h) The secular necessity to them of offspring for their support and solace in widowhood, specially early widowhood.
- (i) And also in some cases for qualifying them for inheritance.
- (j) The fact of the Rishis laying down that garbhádhan is to be performed ordinarily on the first occurrence of a certain event shows one of two things, either that their idea was that consummation of marriage at that early period was not likely to be attended with any evil consequences or that the object of garbhádhan is not to beget a healthy child but any child.

As regards the fourth, it is already answered above.

The easiest solution of the question appears to be afforded by the suggestion thrown out by you long ago that the period when a certain event occurs, instead of 12 years or any hard and fast age, ought to be laid down as the age of valid consent.

I may have something to say about Mr. M. Ghose's note on the subject in a future letter. His is a conclusion in which nothing is concluded and everything is assumed. His assumptions are as monstrously huge as they are unwarrantable. He forgets that he is a Bengali. He decries the cry of "religion in danger" as pure bosh, but fights shy of the question as to whether the performance of the garbhadhan ceremony on the first occurrence of a certain event is or is not an indispensable duty. He does not also appear to perceive that the result of the legislation he suggests would be not simply to alter or even revolutionise the Hindu Law, but to abolish it altogether. Whatever may be the worth of the cry of "religion in danger," the cry of "save me from my friends" is sure to involuntarily escape the lips of every Hindu as he rises from the perusal of Mr. M. Ghose's note.—Yours faithfully,

A HINDU.

The 11th February, 1891.

* * Our correspondent is known to us and he is a lawyer of ability. We are in perfect accord with him about the strange document thrown by Mr. Ghose as a golden apple of discord into the field before the contending parties. On the religious aspect of the controversy, "A Hindu" has however failed to make any impression on Dr. Bhattacharjee's position. We hope that, after perusal of the Doctor's elaborate exposition in this issue, he will be satisfied. Our correspondent is the only writer who has tried fairly to grapple with our learned Pandit.—ED. THE ALLAHABAD UNIVERSITY.

CONVOCATION DAY—THE CHANCELLOR'S SPEECH.

Another point on which the University has proposed to profit by the experience elsewhere gained, is in the due recognition of the claims of training in Science as commonly distinguished from Arts, and the provision at an earlier stage of its curriculum than is offered, for example, by the Calcutta University, for independent prosecution of either branch. The University has done this not from any preference for any one form of instruction, nor from any desire to ascribe to physical science greater merit than to literature, or to yield to any one science priority of claim. It had done this because its aim embraces the whole circle of instruction; and its desire is to use all means at its command for according, at the earliest moment, to its graduates the facilities which may best assist them, in view of their various mental aptitudes, in obtaining that cultivation of mind which is the end of all instruction. Its aim is to give intellectual grasp, not merely knowledge of facts; not acquaintance with any one science, but an harmonious survey of all.

I have no desire, therefore, to discuss on this occasion what class of instruction may be regarded as furnishing the best means of training or disciplining the intellectual qualities of the mind. I think, with the former Rector of Lincoln, whose views I have more than once brought before you in the course of this Address,—that "On the one hand, an education in facts, in some one or more special art or science, is not liberal education at all; on the other, the mere habit or power of taking general views, universal notions as learnt from literature, is a hollow and spurious liberalising of the mind." If what German Professors have described as "the ideality of the scientific sense; interest in learning, not dependent upon nor limited by practical aims, but ministering to the liberal education of the mind as such," can be satisfactorily cultivated only by classical learning: on the other hand, "to be general without being exact, to systematise without reference to facts, this is to be superficial."

* A complete answer to the contention based on the spiritual necessity of a son is to be found in the concluding paras. of our leader in today's issue.

I should be inclined, for my part, to hazard the opinion (I speak as a Gentile:) that, with an important reserve which I shall presently indicate, that subject of instruction on the University course, will best strengthen and nourish the mind which is the most thoroughly imparted to it. In other words, the question seems to me to be one which concerns the mode of teaching as much as the subject-matter taught. Every system of teaching which substitutes the exercise of memory for the discipline of thought; every facility, for example, given to students to work up the notes of their Professors, who they hope may in turn become their examiners; every indication that it is the language of a text-book rather than subject taught which may with the best chances of success engage the students' attention, seem to me to be equally injurious. In the following words may be recognised a type with which in India we seem to be familiar: "In such persons" (viz., those who have overstimulated the memory) "Reason acts almost as feebly and as impotently as in the madman; once fairly started on any subject whatever, they have no power of self-control; they passively endure the succession of impulses which are evolved out of the original existing cause; they are passed on from one idea to another, and go steadily forward, plodding along one line of thought, in spite of the amplest concessions of the hearer, or wandering from it in endless digression in spite of his remonstrances." The man whose intellect has been thus cultivated is described as the prey of barren facts and of random intrusions. While, however, this University will not give preference to Arts over Sciences or to Sciences over Arts, I hope that it will never on that account close its eyes to the mental characteristics of the people from among whom its students are supplied. Here is the reserve which I have indicated. Nations have their mental as well as their physical peculiarities; and to ignore one or other, to foster those which naturally are predominant, and to neglect those which are less developed, seem to me to be equally injurious. To us, who are by nature less emotional than the Indian, the refinement of literary studies brings with it influences which subdue grosser elements in the national character. Whether equal advantage will ensue by applying a similar training to the more sensitive and delicate-natured East, may well admit of doubt. If instruction seeks to strengthen those intellectual qualities which in a given people are most wanting to the acquisition of a philosophic mind, instruction must needs take careful heed of the type of mind of each several people. Subjects of instruction which have proved themselves useful in one quarter of the globe, are not necessarily of equal value in another, whose people are as far removed in distance, in thought, in disposition, and in natural aptitudes, as are the men of Upper India from those of our own country. There is, from this point of view, sufficient ground for the opinion that our training in these Provinces, though our people differ much from those in other Provinces, is still defective in its methods, as calling in the exercise of memory, of imagination, and of dialectic skill, rather than of thought. "The fact is," said Sir Henry Maine in one of his addresses to the University of Calcutta, "that the educated native mind requires hardening. That culture of the imagination, that tenderness for it which may be necessary in the West, is out of place here; for this is a society in which, for centuries upon centuries, the imagination has run riot; and much of the intellectual weakness and moral evil which afflict it to this moment may be traced to imagination having so long usurped the place of reason. What the native mind requires is stricter criteria of truth; and I look for the happiest moral and intellectual results from an increased devotion to those sciences by which no tests of truth are accepted, except the most rigid." These words have been verified by the results of time. In one department of speculation, at least, we have of late years seen imagination running riot, and all criteria of rigid tests set aside to make way for rhetoric. Nothing is more opposed to that sober and sane judgment to which it is the aim of the instructed man to attain, than the mental vice of exaggeration, and servile subjection to the influence of declamation.

The objection may possibly be taken that, while all this may be perfectly true, sufficient means of instruction in Physical Science are at present, as a matter of fact, wanting in the schools which prepare students for entrance to the University. The objection is not without weight; and if the University shares this opinion, it will probably cause its views to be laid before the Administration, in order that such remedial measures as are possible may be introduced. Comparatively few candidates, it is unquestionable, have presented themselves in the Physical Science course this year or in the year previous. But while their paucity may be possibly partly due to the difficulty of obtaining adequate instruction in Physical Science preparatory to matriculating for the University, a powerful reason for the preference given to the A course by candidates for University degrees may be also this, that instruction in the subjects which form the curriculum of that course is believed to give a better chance of obtaining Government employ than proficiency in Physical Science. I hope this mischievous error will be combated by all those who have patronage at their disposal.

The last of the two propositions which refer to the matter of instruction in the University, as apart from the mechanism of instruction, is that the University need give no instruction which can be imparted elsewhere. This limitation of its functions appears to me to be one which should be rigorously observed in these Provinces. I hold, with Mill, that "what professional men should carry away with them from an University, is no professional knowledge, but that which should direct the use of their professional knowledge, and bring the light of general culture to illuminate the technicalities of a special pursuit." The province of a University ends where education, ceasing to be general, branches off into departments adapted to the individual's destination in life. We have seen, how Cardinal Newman distinguishes between what he calls education and instruction. This point of view excludes University examination, for example, in subjects of technical education; instruction in which is more properly the business of a polytechnic or special school. It points to the study of jurisprudence, rather than of substantive law. It excludes, in my opinion, examination in engineering. Proposals have, I am aware, been approved by the University with the object of constituting a Faculty of Engineering. But I confess that to me there seems to be valid objections to the University establishing an Engineering Faculty, or conferring degrees for proficiency in a branch of study which the strictly Engineering College now established in these Provinces is perfectly capable of ascertaining and affirming. I mention this as a personal intimation of my own view, which appears to me to be the logical outcome of the conception of the proper functions of a University which I entertain. Should the University desire to establish this Faculty, I have no desire to thwart their wishes. I shall probably hold, in such case, to my opinion; but I shall not seek to obstruct the enforcement of the opinion of the University. The same principle, that the University need teach nothing that can be taught elsewhere, points to the necessity of keeping the test for entrance to the University well above the level of the teaching which can be reasonably expected of a High School. Not only the matter taught, but the mode of teaching in a High School differs from that which we expect in College classes. The one seeks rather to inform the mind, the other to exercise and call out the faculties. The one (in words already used by me) is content that its rules should be committed to memory, to tradition, or to use; the latter aims at moulding mental nature and at the formation of a character; the object of the one is to facilitate acquirement, of the other to assist the exercise of thought or reason upon knowledge. It may be difficult, in the circumstances in which we are situated in these Provinces, to draw the line precisely so as to exclude examination in classes which are not properly speaking University classes. But at this present time, when we are about to establish a Board of Studies, it seems to me especially important that this aspect of instruction should be prominently borne in mind. It may lead, very possibly, to a demand that the Government should devote itself more particularly to the furtherance and improvement of middle class education, a demand of which I do not contest the justice. But, whatever may be the shortcomings of the Government I would not have the University suffer itself to be led by them into mischievous error of its own. If we are to gain and maintain respect for our University degrees, we must make it our first business to see that they are not bestowed on those whose attainments and knowledge are of an obviously inferior standard. There is another side from which this danger besets the University. I have alluded to the tendency of students to enter themselves for the A course, because its training is supposed to give a better chance of employment in the public service; but employment in the public service, though it may be facilitated by a degree, is not the end which the University in conferring degrees proposes. What are called in Germany "bread studies," form a class of studies which may add to the popularity of the University among its immediate graduates, because the class which at present is chiefly attracted to our Universities is the class which is in search of service, public or otherwise, as a means of livelihood. But to subordinate the tests of a University to the need of bread studies would be fatal to the ideal which a University should propose to itself. If a candidate for public employment finds that a University degree is useful to him, by all means let him obtain a University degree. But in doing so let us see that he has to submit himself to adequate mental training and discipline; not merely to a course of instruction of the quality and texture necessary to enable him to show that he has acquired information in a certain class of subjects, and may therefore be assumed to have attained such education as may qualify him for the discharge of public office. Those who, in other words, desire to enter the public service, may usefully avail themselves of the training laid down by the University; but the aim which a University sets before itself is not merely the training of men for the public service. It is necessary, to this end, that the teaching staff in the several affiliated Colleges should, in numbers and capacity, be efficient; and to Colleges which accept this final proposition, it will be self-evident that without maintaining a high level of teaching power they cannot hope to give effect to it.

WONDERFUL MEDICINE.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

ARE universally admitted to be worth A GUINEA A BOX. For Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Blotches on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, &c.

BEECHAM'S PILLS The first dose will give relief in twenty minutes. This is no fiction, for they have done it in countless cases.

BEECHAM'S PILLS Every sufferer is earnestly requested to try one Box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS For females of all ages these Pills are invaluable. No female should be without them. There is not a medicine to be found to equal them for removing any obstruction or irregularity of the system. If taken according to the directions given with each box they will soon restore females of all ages to sound and robust health. This has been proved by thousands who have tried them, and found the benefits which are ensured by their use.

BEECHAM'S PILLS For a Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, and all Disorders of the Liver, they act like magic, and a few doses will be found to work wonders on the most important organs in the human Machine. They strengthen the whole muscular system, restore the long lost complexion, bring back the keen edge of appetite, and arouse into action with the rosiest of health the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are facts testified to continually by members of all classes of society, and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is, BEECHAM'S PILLS have the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

ENERGY.

BY THE LATE MARTIN TUPPER.

INDOMITABLE merit

Of the Anglo-Saxon mind!
That makes a man inherit
The glories of his kind,
That scatters all around him
Until he stands sublime
•With nothing to confound him,
•The conqueror of Time—
O mighty Perseverance!
O Courage, stern and stout!
That wills and works a clearance
•Of every rabble rout—
That cannot brook denial,
And scarce allows delay,
But wins from every trial
More strength for every day—
Antagonistic power!
I praise—for praise I can—
The God, the place, the hour
•That makes a man a man—
The God—from whom all greatness;
The place, Old England's shore;
The hour, an hour of lateness,
(For Time shall soon be o'er;)
The man—aye, every brother
Of Anglo-Saxon race,
Who owns a British mother
And Freedom's dwelling-place.

I feel, I feel within me
That courage self-possessed,
The force, that yet shall win me
The brightest and the best—
The stalwarth English daring
That steadily steps on,
Unswerving and unsparing,
Until the world is won—
The boldness and the quiet
That calmly go ahead,
•In spite of wrath and riot,
In spite of quick and dead—
Hot Energy to spur me,
Keen Enterprise to guide,
And Conscience to upstir me,
And Duty by my side,
And Hope before me singing
Assurance of success,
And rapid Action springing
At once to nothing less,

• And all the mighty movings
That wrestle in my breast,
The longings and the lovings,
The spirit's glad unrest,
•That scorns excuse to tender,
Or Fortune's favor ask,
And never will surrender,
Whatever be the task.

I cannot wait for chances,
• For luck I will not look;
In faith my spirit glances
At Providence, God's book;
• And there discerning truly
That right is might at length,
I dare go forward duly
In quietness and strength,
Unflinching and unfearing,
The flatterer of none,
And in good courage wearing
The honors I have won!
Let circumstance oppose me
I beat it to my will;
And if the flood o'erflows me,
I dive, and stem it still;
No hindering dull material
Shall conquer or control
My energies ethereal,
My gladiator soul!
I will contrive occasion,
Not tamely bide my time;
No capture but Creation
Shall make my sport sublime
Let lower spirits linger
For hint and beck and nod,
• I always see the finger
Of an onward-urging God!

Not selfish, not hard-hearted,
Not vain, nor deaf, nor blind,
From wisdom not departed,
But in humbleness of mind,
Still shall mine independence
Stand manfully alone,
Nor dance a dull attendance
At any mortal throne,
Disciple of no teacher
Except the one in heaven,
And yielding to no creature
The reason he hath given!
O thus, while contemplation
In faith beholds above
My glorious hope, Salvation,
Eternity of Love,

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

And while a Saxon spirit
Is bubbling from my heart
To strengthen and upstir it
To play a giant's part,
No hindrance, nor misfortune,
No man's neglect, nor ill,
Shall bend me to importune
One weak indulgence still ;
But with my God to nerve me,
My soul shall overwhelm
All circumstance to serve me
In my spiritual realm !

CONSOLATION.

I know this is a fallen world,
I question not God's curse ;—
And yet what need that wilful grief
Should make the evil worse ?

Sorrow and pain's the lot of all ;
Why should it not be mine ?
Others more blest have made their moan,
Then why should I repine ?—

Down, murmuring thoughts, impatient rage !
Ye ill become the breast
Of one for whom the present toil
Is working future rest.

To linger o'er each thwarted wish,
To want what may not be,
To lose the future for the past —
Such grief were death for me !

No ; while a future yet remains,
A better and a best,
I'll comfort take in present woes,
And by them so be blest !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

"When the Tartars conquered the Chinese, they ordered them to shave their heads after the Tartar fashion ; but that many of the Chinese preferred death to a compliance with the order, lest their souls, appearing bald before their ancestors, should not be recognized or welcomed by them."

So writes Benjamin Constant in his eloquent and once famous work on Religion. Are our friends the Garbhadhanwallas under any like apprehension ? We are afraid they stand a good chance of being disowned by the manes of the makers of our Shastras on account of their treatment of poor infant woman.

WE remind our readers that Thursday next, the 26th February, 1891, has been fixed as the Census night. Every citizen is expected to make a correct return and to assist as far as possible the enumerators in their work.

THE Bengal Government has found it safe to direct that Act XVII of 1890 (the Indian Census Act) shall have force and effect in the Sonthal Pergunnahs.

THE last Criminal Sessions of 1890 concluded and the first of 1891 commenced on Wednesday, the 18th February.

AFTER touring in Chittagong and Rangamati, the Lieutenant-Governor arrives at Dacca to-morrow. Halting there two days, Sir Charles Elliott returns to Calcutta on the 26th, in time for the Governor-General's Council meeting the following day.

THE King opened a new naval dock at Rong Lan, the Chatham of Siam. The dock is 300 feet long and cost 40,000 dollars.

By a despatch dated India Office, London, the 15th January 1891, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India announces the approval of Her Majesty the Queen, Empress of India, of the appointment of Sir Charles Alfred Elliott, K.C.S.I., as Lieutenant-Governor of the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William.

THE sudden death at the banquet of Mr. Windon, Secretary to the American Treasury, is attributed to cerebral hemorrhage after an elaborate speech which was warmly applauded. It was a Chatham death.

SIR Bedivere, the Champion St. Bernard, who has not yet been beaten, has changed hands. T. H. Green, of Thorndale, Wallasey, Cheshire, has sold him to E. B. Sears, of Wyoming Kennels, Melrose, Massachusetts. The price paid is £1,300 or £300 less than a previous offer.

WE read :—

"The adventurous lady traveller Mrs. Bishop (Miss Isabella Bird) has returned to England after accomplishing a difficult and dangerous journey to carry out a bequest of her late husband, an Edinburgh gentleman, to establish a hospital in one of the remote corners of the globe. Cashmere is the place selected by Mrs. Bishop."

Cashmere is scarcely such a remote corner of the globe now. At least no "difficult and dangerous journey" is involved in reaching it, or in returning from it either.

A ROMAN Catholic heiress, Miss Kate Drexel, otherwise known as Sister Catherine, has devoted her immense fortune, of some £1,600,000, to founding a new religious order, to be known as the Sisters of the Most Holy Sacrament, for ameliorating the condition of the North American Indians and negroes. A convent and schools will soon be erected and opened at Arundel, near Washington.

THERE are in the United Kingdom, 578 Gas Companies with a gross authorized capital of £76,593,724 and a paid up capital of £59,877,537.

DURING the last severe winter in London, a feature in funerals was that the steeds were not always black. The enterprise of undertakers was taxed to the utmost, and brown steeds were taken in.

TWO of the principal actors on the London stage have applied for the benefit of the Act. Mr. Charles Coghlan—Antony to Mrs. Langtry's Cleopatra at the Princess Theatre—has filed his schedule with over £3,000 liabilities and assets nil. He keeps eight horses and has a weekly salary of £50. Mr. Rutland Barrington—another star—is a bankrupt with liabilities of over £4,000 and assets thirty shillings.

FIRES are multiplying in London. Last year, the number of calls to fires or supposed fires was 3,546. Of these, 768 were false alarms, 223 proved to be only chimney alarms, and 2,555 were calls for fires, of which 153 resulted in serious damage and 2,402 in slight damage. The report for 1890 gives an increase of 217 fires over those of the previous year and an increase of 422 over the average of the past ten years.

THE Hyderabad Record lately gave out, and our contemporary has not yet been contradicted, that

"The 'Mr. Isaacs,' the subject of the well-known work by Mr. Marion Crawford, is no other than Mr. A. M. Jacob of Simla, at present on a visit to Hyderabad and residing at Colonel Marshall's old bungalow as a guest of His Highness the Nizam, for whose inspection he brought down a number of articles and jewellery from Simla and elsewhere. Mr. Jacob leaves here very shortly for Calcutta."

FRIDAY, the 13th February, was a great day—a day of triumph for the head of the Calcutta Town Corporation—at Baraset. Fifteen years ago, when the great Chairman was a young assistant in the Civil Service, he had, as subdivisional officer of Baraset, "inaugurated" (to speak in the language of the craft) the athletic sports—that is the running and jumping exercises—with which the event of the day—the assumption of the title of Empress by the Queen—was celebrated. And now

Did he proceed in pleasure, and in pride, Beloved and loving many,.....

to assist in their revival, accompanied by chosen friends, European and native. Baraset received her former chief now become so much greater a man, with demonstrations of triumph. The jumping and climbing went merrily, without a single accident. We only wish that, while honouring the living, Baraset had remembered the dead. It was a sin to forget on the occasion the lamented Brindabun Chunder Chatterjee, to whom Baraset owes more than to any other man, since the departure from the place of Mr. Trevor and the death of Nobin Chunder Mitter and the dispersion of his family. He was the soul of improvement in every direction for the place. He raised its good name. How much depends upon individual zeal and connections may be seen in the fact that with his cruel death languished the public institutions which he had taken in hand. So with these games or Sri Panchami Mela as it is locally called. Although Mr. Lee, in the neophyte zeal of a young athlete as he then was, proposed them, it required the willing enthusiasm of a man of rare animal spirits and fun as Brindabun Chunder Chatterjee to carry out the idea, specially at a stagnant nondescript place, neither urban nor rural, which is neither the seat of any commerce or industry nor the residence of wealthy men.

THE Madras Mail writes:—

"Whether any improvement on the system of jury trial is possible, or even advisable, it is difficult to say. In criminal cases, excepting those for treason or other political offences, it would probably be an improvement for the trial to be undertaken by one or more Judges. To this there does not seem to be any valid objection, although doubtless the guilty prisoner with funds to pay a clever counsel would prefer a jury. Seeing that the question of innocence or guilt is to be decided by the evidence, and that a Judge passes years of his life in discriminating between false and true evidence, it cannot be doubted that trial by a Judge must be more likely to serve the ends of justice than the decision of laymen, whose experience of witnesses under examination must be comparatively limited, and who are not trained to weigh conflicting testimony."

Whatever the value set by Englishmen on trial by peers, the call to serve on the Jury is considered a nuisance. The Calcutta High Court has a way of making it more unpalatable. In the present Criminal Sessions, gentlemen of the Special Jury were summoned to appear at 11 on Wednesday, a set was empanelled, and the rest were allowed to go about their business with instruction to be present the next day precisely at the said hour. They returned home or dispersed to their different scenes of business—only to be brought back from all parts of the town and city. For, an hour after, a fresh call was made on them to attend Court after the hour of lunch. We may say this call was not in the usual way by written notice or advertisement, but a messenger was sent round to inform the gentlemen—who had leave from the Clerk of the Crown—to be present—by order of some Baboo in the Sheriff's office. We don't know whether such a call was legal or whether absence would have been visited with fine by the Judge. Without raising such a question, however, the gentlemen attended. What was the business for them, do you suppose? A set from among them was empanelled, and the set and the rest were told to leave the Court, the services of the set not being required till 11 the next day and those of the others not till they should receive notice again.

THERE has been a scare in Singapore. The good people on the Island were seriously "exercised" over a legal opinion to the effect that, all marriages entered into since 1881, under the Bishop's license, are null and void, inasmuch as the Bishop had no power to issue such licenses. Their exasperation may be imagined when there was a proposition to prosecute the chaplain of the Cathedral for solemnising marriages knowing or having reason to believe them invalid.

SIR Charles Hawkes Todd Crosthwaite, K.C.S.I., has gone home on sick leave. During his absence, Colonel Robert Charles Boileau Pemberton, R.E., acts as Ordinary Member of the Council of the Governor-General of India, in charge of the Public Works Department. The appointment is made by the Governor-General in Council under the provisions of 24 and 25 Vict., Cap. 67, section 27.

SIR Charles Crosthwaite going home, last week, went straight from terminus to terminus, from Calcutta to Bombay, taking the short cut of the Bengal-Nagpore Railway, accompanied by the Agent and Chief Engineer, Mr. Wynne. From Assausol, he reached Nagpore in 28 hours. The time will be abridged when everything is ready and shipshape and the line opened to the public.

BOMBAY wants another palace for its Governor—on Malabar Hill, a sumptuous residence, with ample saloons and sufficient accommodation for staff and band and staying visitors, globe-trotters and others.

MESSRS. NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

ON the 18th instant, a Pathan corporal ran amuck at Fort Siedman, Upper Burma, shooting dead Major Nixon, commanding the 33rd Burma Regiment, in his own house, while dressing for parade, and two sepoy, and wounding Lieutenant Jamieson so seriously that he died in a few hours. One sepoy besides was wounded in the attempt to arrest the man.

THE weather has been so severe on the Kwaja Amran in Beluchistan as to stop the progress of the Khojak Tunnel.

FOR the same reason, the operations on the Black Mountains will not be begun so soon as it was arranged.

THE Maharaja of Cashmere and his brother Sirdar Ram Singh Bahadar applied to be allowed to serve on the Black Mountain Expedition with the Durbar troops. The Government of India have conveyed their thanks for the offer but declined it, explaining that the expedition is going to be on a small scale and the numbers and the personnel of the force have been already settled. Some disappointment has naturally been felt at the Durbar and the Palace in consequence.

ON the 1st January, Mr. Ross, Political Officer in the Chin Hills, started an expedition from Haka for Thetta. The force consisted of 140 fighting men and 7 officers under the command of Captain Carnegie. The enemy led them a pretty dance until they were led into a pretty hole. Their way lay through a dense bush of grass, but the snake did not molest them till they were before Thetta. Then shots came flying through the jungle, from unseen sharpshooters, killing and wounding several Goorkhas. Instead of retreating, this only determined the British to carry the village. That was just what the astute savages expected and wished. Accordingly, our brave fellows rushed—to their fate. For the village was only a blind; it was at the mercy of a strong stockade. So our people were exposed to a merciless fire, in which Lieutenant James fell. The event was that Mr. Ross was glad to get out of the Thetta business with offering them a pardon for their past offences and obtaining the promise of a truce out of respect for the Paramount Power. It was a miserable bungle. And the Chief Commissioner contents himself with a mild censure, of his protégé.

THE Lushai Frontier is far from quiet. The tribes of the Southern Lushai country are still in active hostility, and they seem to have outmanœuvred our officers sent to bring them to our feet. The savages have certainly given them very near a defeat. The Political Officer Mr. Murray, having divided his force into two parties, they took advantage of the circumstance, acting no doubt upon assured information, to fall upon both simultaneously. Mr. Ross himself was at the head of 50 rifles near Jacopa's village, when he was suddenly attacked. Separated from his other party, he found himself in a difficult situation, which taxed all his resources to bring him safe out of. Nor did he succeed without losing 3 men. The other party seem to have been in a worse predicament. They just escaped being entirely cut off. After a desperate engagement, in which they lost as many as ten men, they repulsed the enemy. Such is our impression from the meagre telegraphic news supplied. We await with anxiety the detailed account. We hope the Government will lay all the particulars before the public of what looks like a rather serious disaster, which is likely to have a most demoralising effect on the whole Lushai Land.

THE Ceylon Civil Servant Mr. Moor, who was summoned for using criminal force and wrongful confinement of a witness, after having humbly denied jurisdiction, at length pleaded guilty. And a fellow Servant and fellow Police Magistrate disposed of the matter by ordering a fine of Rs. 10 on the two counts.

THEY are going to commit the same mistake in the Island that they committed on the Continent. The Government purpose to appoint six cadets to the Civil Service, and the Ceylon Observer is grieved that preference is being given to the uneducated sons of wealth over University men born in poverty. That is both unjust and inexpedient. Could no other way be resolved upon for discrediting native fitness? How the Statutory Service was reduced to a byword and reproach by the persistent favoritism of Lieutenant-Governors like Sir Ashley Eden and Secretaries like Mr. Peacock! The Colombo paper suggests to Sir Arthur Havelock, the Governor, to invite applications before making the selection.

WE have received the following from Behar from Gya, under date the 18th February :—

The Tikari Will case came to an end on the 16th instant. Mr. Brett, the District Judge of Gya, in a very able and elaborate judgment, held the Will to be a forged document. The decision has given entire satisfaction to the public. Forgery is not uncommon in the Province. Before this, three other forged documents relating to big estates were successfully palmed off on the courts of justice. But the present case, though very carefully got up, could not stand the logical test to which it was put by a Judge of Mr. Brett's experience. It was really a very difficult task for a Judge to glean the real facts out of the huge mass of apparently unimpeachable evidence placed before him. Indeed, there was a train of witnesses, whose rich costume alone, let alone their incomes and positions in life, lent such an air of veracity to their statements that the veriest sceptic could have been taken in. How can one disbelieve a gentleman who has such a quantity of gold on his person or another who drives to court in a brougham and whose jacket was unquestionably made by Harman? What though the public had no doubt in their mind that the Will was a forgery; the evidence brought to bear upon it was so masterly concocted that the Judge, who has to confine himself within the four corners of the records, was likely to be misled. However, Mr. Brett very carefully analysed the evidence and found it to be what it was worth. The evidence of some high personages of Calcutta looked at first sight rather menacing against the cause of justice, but, in spite of its proverbial blindness, it saw through the misleading guise.

WE are all sure that we are a wonderful people, the true Aryans, and so forth, and our youngsters are up to anything, from the formation of a cabinet to the command of the Channel fleet. Strangely however, we do not show aptitude for commercial organization. With the honorable exception of Bombay, the country has scarcely taken any advantage of the legal facilities for combination in mercantile and trading operations. For us, the Limited Liability Act is practically a dead letter. A few abortive firms comprise our whole efforts in this direction. A dozen years back, a Banking Corporation was started in Bengal, under the most promising auspices and with a flourish of trumpets. But it was soon brought to an inglorious and disgraceful end. Madras does not seem to be a more congenial soil for such undertakings. Her Hindu Union Bank Limited, we see, has been drawn into liquidation.

IN the British Museum, they have stumbled upon a complete text of treatise on the constitution of Athens, attributed to Aristotle. What a prodigy of both thinking and working power was that pedagogue! Deep and wide in observation, encyclopædic in knowledge, able in analysis, he was indefatigable in recording. The founder of Science, he laid down the laws of thought, he investigated the principles of social order, he discussed the doctrine of morals, and he generalised the rules of literature. And now it would appear that, not content with enlightening mankind by his general work on Politics, he condescended to inform the minds of his fellow-citizens on the principles and particulars of his country's economy of government. We hope this exhumed work is worthy of its author's fame, and that the "find" will be more important than such late discoveries of literary leavings usually prove. How disappointing was Milton's long lost treatise on Christianity which turned up sixty-eight years ago!

FOR some years, there has been in Europe a proposition to alter the mode of salutation. Thus the custom of raising the hat in recognition was complained of as inconvenient. Nevertheless, the custom remained. No one would incur the risk of getting a bad name for rudeness. Everybody would be a good boy. The courage to defy Mrs. Grundy was extremely rare. At length, the pressure of Nature has paved the path of reform. Hitherto men have patiently endured the horrors of repeated colds and catarrhs rather than be scorned as savages for keeping their heads covered. But the late severity of the weather in Europe has nerveed them for the reproach. Indeed, it was out of the question to uncover the head for even a moment at a time when the thermometer was many degrees below freezing point—when it was difficult to make the body comfortably warm. For the bald in especial, it must have been a positive torture during the late season to follow the European practice of taking up the hat. Accordingly, many left their hats undisturbed on their heads.

WE are glad to find that the Gorakhpur Chronicle has taken our notice of it in the spirit in which it was meant. Says it :—

"Profiting by the friendly, though scathing, remarks of our veteran contemporary of the Reis and Rayyet, we have resolved to improve the general get-up of our paper as far as it lies in our power. But, at the same time, we hope, our worthy contemporary will not take it in an unfriendly spirit, if we make bold to say a few words by way of justification,—not, of course, from a sense of injured pride smarting under the lashes of his unfavourable criticism or in a controversial frame of mind, but as an explanation of what he is pleased to consider our drawbacks."

Then it gravely proceeds to controvert our position, that "with improved communication with the outside world, there is less need for a local newspaper." That position was drawn by our contemporary's inadequate ground for its journalistic venture, as set forth in the prospectus. We demurred to the suggestion that improved communication by itself caused a need for local journalism. And this is no answer, to wit—

"For improved communication means progress, and it does not follow that when a certain degree of progress is reached we are to stop further efforts in that direction, as our worthy contemporary seems to imply."

Let us not be mystified. Improved communication may mean progress but it does not mean leisure and culture—it does not mean even the initial three R's. After all, we only meant to remind the Gorakhpurians that in their solitude, they had not shown enough respect for the public, by rushing out with an argument for their appearance which was not conclusive and which they could have easily improved and made clinching. But let us not quarrel over this trifle. We understand each other, and we for our part respect our new brother of the quill. God forbid that we should wish them or anybody to stop in the path of progress.

Yes, let "exclusion!" be our contemporary's motto, if it will. We have no objection, though we half suspect it is not quite Christian.

G. A. SALA writes with sardonic bitterness in his "Echoes of the Week":—"You may happen to possess the latest—the nineteenth—edition of 'Haydn's Dictionary of Dates.' Please turn to the word 'Massacre.' Under that attractive heading you will find two closely printed columns, full of the sanguinary records of man's inhumanity to man. When you have glanced at the dates of the slaughters at Amboyna, Scyllabogue, Glencoe, Meerut, Delhi, Cawnpore, and so forth, just write on the margin of the page "Christmas, 1890. Porcupine Creek." Be very particular to mention Christmas. A right merry and seasonable telegram to the New York Herald announces that in the fighting between the malcontent Indians and the United States cavalry at the creek aforesaid, 10 American troopers were

"I believe in Thee, my God, I believe in Thee!" This cry of enthusiasm and faith had its echo in the five most beautiful acts of his life, and dated from Ferney—his pleadings for Calas, for Lally, for Sirven, for the chevalier La Barre, and his demand for the enfranchisement of the serfs of Jura. May we add that at Ferney Voltaire became a king? Ferney was his Versailles. Princes, nobles, artists, travellers and thinkers flocked there as to a capital of the civilized world. Voltaire received there the education from the throne, and I find in him, on his triumphal return to Paris, something of what I may call the spirit of Ferney, when, lifting his hands on the grandson of Franklin, he blessed him in the name of God and liberty:—"For God and Liberty."

His last home was Pantheon. Such as I know him I can not believe that he remained inactive there. He had still something to learn. On the day when they gave him Marat for his neighbour, he fell into a great rage and said, "The despotism of the low is more odious than the despotism of the high." He would have cursed and execrated '93 despite all his sympathies for '89.

The influence of localities on the formation of this genius so multiplex, so quick, so indefatigable, appears to me a curious fact to be singled out. God guard me to see in it the finger of Providence and to attribute to him the education of Voltaire. The student left much to desire. I have essayed to say what his diverse abodes taught him. I have shewn only his good side. He had his dark side. He had his pettiness, his hatreds, his foibles. Will it be believed that, after having so eloquently and so sincerely proclaimed his belief in God, the very moment he rose himself after that act of adoration, he added in wiping off the dust from his knees: "Yes, I believe in Thee! But as for thy Son and his Mother it is another affair." The black-guard and the great man were always united in him. He knew how to admire and to be enthusiastic. He was indignant against injustice and battled for humanity; yet he was wanting in the most wholesome and conservative sentiment of the human soul—the sentiment of respect. What man Voltaire would have been had he known to respect others as well as himself!

THE AGE OF CONSENT. TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—I am sorry you think I have made no impression on Dr. Bhattacharjee's position. But if I have made none, it is not because his position is unassailable nor because the argumentative weapons directed against it are powerless, but because they were not well aimed.

I have read the Dr.'s leader in your last issue with some care and find that, though as a speculation on the possible rationale of the Hindoo law of marriage it may be of considerable value, yet as a discussion of the subject of the age of consent it is almost wholly beside the point. It may or may not be that the considerations suggested by the Dr. are just what led the Rishis to legislate as they did, but I presume it is not given to us poor mortals of the Hindoo persuasion* to pry into the reasons that actuated them and

* The dissertation in our last issue on the method of legislation of the ancient Rishis may have no immediate bearing on the Age of Consent Bill. But the disquisition throws just the sort of light on our holy Codes of law which can lead to their being better appreciated than they are at present. So long as the authority of our sages was not questioned, it was not desirable to explain their policy, and so it happens that no Hindu jurist ever attempted to give any satisfactory explanation of the apparent inconsistencies and absurdities in our Shastres. Like the followers of a great statesman, they maintained the fictions intact and carefully avoided the giving of even any hint that might expose to the gaze of the vulgar the real ground-work of our Shastres. To make ourselves clear, let us refer to the following essential postulates of our jurisprudence:—

(1) That the Vedas are too vast to be mastered by any ordinary mortal.

(2) That for every text of the Smritis and for every approved custom, there is a corresponding text in the Vedas.

Every Hindu lawyer knows what important results have been achieved by means of these fictions. But what would have been the consequence if any of our jurists declared in express terms that these postulates were mere fictions and that the study of the Vedas was discouraged, not because they were really too vast, but because they sanctioned or countenanced practices which the later lawgivers sought to abolish. As a matter of fact, there is perhaps no authority whatever in the Vedas for most of the ordinances of the Smritis. But the commentators whose opinion we follow could not admit the fact without nullifying themselves.

The state of things is now altogether different. The Rishis are now in a manner on their trial. It would not do to say now that they were infallible. We are now in a position in which we must either interpret their legislation in the light of them. If it is not permissible in interpreting a modern legislative enactment to refer to its declared object and reasons, is it not still less so, in fact positively dangerous, in interpreting the legislation of our Rishis to refer to what we only imagine to be its object and reasons. I think it is the improper expenditure of ingenuity on the part of commentators to pry into reasons that is largely answerable for the hopeless conflict of commentator-made laws.*

But whatever may have been the object the Rishis had in view when they declared the possession of a son so supremely meritorious from a spiritual point of view, I think it is pretty clear that if such object was simply to hold out a premium to marriage in what the Dr. calls regular form, the original object was gradually completely lost sight of, or how is it that so much stress has been laid on the spiritual importance of a son that a fictitious son by adoption has been declared to be equally efficacious, spiritually speaking, with a genuine aurasa son? If the spiritual merits of the possession of a son were inculcated only as a device indirectly to encourage people to marry and become good citizens, what could be the reason of the Rishis not only encouraging but almost insisting on adoption† on failure of male issue?‡

Then again, what could be the object, on the Dr.'s theory, of the Rishis laying stress on male issue instead of on any issue? If their object was simply to encourage marriage (and ordinarily monogamy, as the Dr. appears to intend to suggest,) it appears to me that it could have been accomplished rather better by the attribution of spiritual merits to the possession of any offspring born of holy wedlock and infinitely better by the ascription of such to the most approved form of Shastrical marriage and conjugal chastity.†

It therefore appears to me probable that the object of the Rishis in attributing such supreme spiritual merits to having a son was something other than that suggested by the Dr. If you permit, I may try to speculate on the matter in a future letter.

Now, as regards the immediate subject of our discussion.

The Dr. appears to treat the argument, that because a son is necessary for spiritual purposes, therefore every Hindoo must take the earliest opportunity to beget a son, as something exceedingly absurd and quite unfit for being seriously advanced.§ And what is his reason? Because Manu enjoins that men shall not ordinarily marry before they are twenty-four. But what does Manu's injunction shew after all? Why, just this—that marriage, its consummation and its outcome in the shape of children must, in spite of their spiritual importance, be harmonious with the requirements of physiology. Now, the Dr. himself has asserted, in the course of his arguments, that it is an article of faith with us that the Rishis are omniscient. Have not these very Rishis who have, by laying down that a man shall not ordinarily marry before he is twenty-four, shewn so much respect for the laws of physiology, also laid down that a girl ought to be married between eight and ten, that after ten she becomes constructively rajawali even though she may not be actually so, that a father, by deferring the marriage of his daughter beyond ten, incurs a very odious sin, that on no account shall the marriage of a girl be deferred beyond her twelfth year, and that marriage is to be consummated ordinarily on the first occurrence of a certain event in the girl? What is the effect of all these injunctions read together? Do they prove, as the Dr. contends, that the Rishis intended that marriage should not be consummated with wives under twelve? I think, they prove nothing of the kind. On the contrary, they appear to me to prove just the reverse of it. If the same Rishis, who have taken care to prescribe that men shall not ordinarily marry under twenty-four, prescribe that marriage should be consummated ordinarily on the first occurrence of a certain event in the wife, and when it also appears from their utterances that the first occurrence of that certain event is almost sure as soon as the girl has passed her tenth year justify their legislation or admit the pretensions of the go-ahead reformers who claim to supersede them. We ought therefore to hail with delight any attempt like that of Dr. Jogendra Nath Bhattacharjee to show that the apparent incongruities and conflicts are capable of being satisfactorily explained.—ED. R. & R.

* If our esteemed correspondent will accept our assurance on the subject, we may tell him that Hindu commentators never pry into reasons.—ED. R. & R.

† A very full and clear explanation of this is given in our last issue.—ED. R. & R.

‡ In order to make marital union irrevocable, the sages laid down that immediately after marriage the connection of a female with her father's family ceased altogether. The result was that daughters could not perpetuate lineage, and the son who perpetuated the lineage was therefore declared to be the source of greater spiritual bliss. It is however not to be supposed that the sages say nothing about the advantages of having a daughter or a daughter's son, from a religious point of view. In fact, there is one text which says that one daughter is equal to ten sons. For other texts on the subject, we may refer our correspondent to the Udvahatwa of Raghunandan, pp. 244-45 and the Dayabhaga, Chap. XI. Sec. II.—ED. R. & R.

§ We should like to know what our correspondent has to say with regard to V.s. 159-161 of Manu's Code, Chap. V. As at present advised, it seems to us that the authority of these texts makes Dr. Bhattacharjee's position altogether unassailable.—ED. R. & R.

and that it is inevitable before she passes twelve, it is not quite clear that it was never intended that consummation of marriage is to be deferred till the wife is past twelve. Then, again, if the Rishis really intended any such thing, or even in the slightest degree discountenanced consummation of marriage with wives under twelve, could not they have expressed themselves in appropriate words? Would they in that case have left their intention entirely to be inferred by ingenious commentators and that too not by legitimate reasoning but by treating the exceptional provisions laid down for extreme cases as the rule itself? Then, again, the mere fact of the Rishis proceeding to lay down cases in which the deferring of consummation shall be permissible shews that they intended that marriage should be consummated at the very earliest opportunity unless there was any of the bars recognized to prevent it.

By earliest opportunity I mean, of course, the earliest period sanctioned by the Shasters.

The Dr. has cited a maxim from the Mitakshara in support of his position. He says he rests on the ground afforded by the maxim, but, perhaps finding the ground giving way under him as soon as he put his foot on it, he takes care to say that he does not rest on that ground alone, and it is well. The abhorrence contemplated by the maxim is not abhorrence by unsympathetic mitaksharas.

If the Dr. says the Rishis are out of date, it would be quite another thing.

I note that you have gone over to the enemy's camp and supported the bill, but have you taken steps at your demonstration to see that the objectionable features of the Bill are removed?

A HINDU.

DR. SAMBHU C. MOOKERJEE.

&c., &c., &c.

MY DEAR SIR,--I really do not understand why you should like to know my views about the burning question of the day and my reasons for not attending meetings held in different parts of the town. I don't know what good my opinion would do, but yielding to your request I would very briefly say that, though I am satisfied in my own mind that the present bill to raise the limit of age in Section 375 of the Indian Penal Code will do no practical good so far as married girls are concerned, it will be a harmless measure, and as it has been introduced with the humane and noble object of giving protection to immature girls and of putting down abominable and atrocious practices, which undoubtedly exist, I can not join in any movement which seeks to oppose the principle of the measure, and which also imputes to the Government a desire to interfere with the religious beliefs of the people of this country. Speaking for myself, I should be glad to support any legislation on the bold lines suggested in that fearless note recently issued by your own distinguished countryman Mr. Manomohan Ghose, than whom no man is more competent to speak so authoritatively on such a question. But I fear the Government is precluded by the utterances of H. E. the Viceroy from entertaining such a large and, to my mind, a really much needed measure of reform, viz., to fix a marriageable age of 12 years by civil enactment. That being so, I have no alternative left to me but to accord my humble support to the present bill. Any agitation or wild outcry which seeks to perpetuate, either directly or indirectly, the custom of child marriage, must lower us in the eyes of the civilized world, and can not have my sympathy.

You further ask me to express my opinion "on the attitude assumed by Mr. Hume in this connection." As this is a purely personal question, I do not think I ought to take upon myself to say anything in regard thereto, more especially when I remember the fact that in previous years I had given great offence to our old and esteemed patriot, by not being able to fall in with many of his views, but on this occasion I feel bound to say that Mr. Hume was justified in trying to rescue the Congress at large from the undeserved imputation that all its members as a body were supporters of infant marriage and the wicked and revolting practices which the present bill seeks to put down. Had he not done so, the Congress would have seriously suffered in the estimation of the British public, both here and in England.

Yours very faithfully,
R. D. MEHTA.

SIR,--Babu Nobo Gopal Mitter in his editorial garb has come down upon some of the members of the Sovabazar Raj family, for having attended the meeting in support of the Age of Consent Bill, at No. 12 Wellington Square. He thinks that, because some of them were not direct lineal descendants of the Sovabazar Raj family, therefore the meeting must be held to be insignificant or, in other words, no one seems to have any right to speak or act unless he be descended from the main line of the Sovabazar Rajas.

The logic of the Babu is just what it should be. He thinks that by using the words branches, leaves, and leaflets, he would throw such of the members of the Sovabazar Rajbati who attended the meeting into insignificance. But may I ask the upholder of premenstrual commerce, for whom does the trunk exist? Is it not for the branches, leaves and leaflets, without which there is no use of the trunk itself except for the purpose of fuel? The trunk draws the sap from the soil to nourish itself for its branches, leaves, and leaflets. The branches, leaves, and leaflets that bask under the same sun draw nourishment through the trunk, and do so because they can demand it as a matter of right, but what right has a parasite to intervene and draw a portion of the nourishment and thus deprive both the trunk itself, its branches, leaves, and leaflets, which otherwise would have gone to strengthen them all the more? Now, the meeting at Wellington Square is nothing, because it was manned by some of the leaflets of the Rajbati. There were, however, many trunks of many other Hindu and Mahomedan families. But what about the Sovabazar meeting which was mainly peopled by parasites of the trunkling of the Sovabazar Rajbati? Is that meeting to be held a great success because it was against the Government measure and therefore all who attended the meeting were all great men? and the Wellington Square meeting nothing, because the gentlemen who attended it were none of them schoolboys and no invitation was sent to the 2nd class boys of the Aryan school?

Since writing the above, I find that Kumar Girindra Krishna Deb was one of those who were present at the meeting, and if a Sovabazar trunk was wanted he is the highest trunk of the Raj family. In fact, he is the direct lineal descendant of the eldest branch of Maharaja Nabakrishna Bahadur, the founder of the Sovabazar Raj family.

FIFTH CRIMINAL SESSIONS, 1890,—

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1891.

(Before the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Pigot.)

THE JAIN DEFAMATION CASE.

THE JUDGE'S CHARGE TO THE JURY.

His lordship commenced his charge to the jury this morning. He said they had now entered on the last stage, he was happy to say for their sakes, in this most laborious and most protracted case. His first duty, a most agreeable one, was to tender to them his acknowledgments for the patience, punctuality, and conscientious discharge of their duty they had manifested, especially as, during the course of this most laborious enquiry, more than one of the jury had been suffering from more or less serious indisposition, which had in no way prevented their punctual attendance. His lordship thought a special acknowledgment ought to be tendered to the gentlemen to whom he referred. They had heard the arguments addressed to them on both sides, and had the advantage during the whole of last week of hearing the address of learned counsel who summed up for the prosecution. These statements on the part of the defence and the prosecution were made ex parte. The jury had a different function to discharge, they and his lordship had to consider together and to look at the justice of the case alone. The duty of the jury was to determine, and his lordship's duty to aid them in determining, what was the justice of the case on the evidence before them. The jury had heard him say more than once in the trial that it was his wish, and it would be his effort, to leave to them all that the law allowed him to leave. He hoped to be able to leave everything to them that would be consistent with his duty as a Judge who desired most heartily that the institution which they represented should flourish and continue to flourish in this country. They would remember, therefore, in what would be a lengthy examination of at least portions of the evidence, that what he would say to them, apart from any express direction on points of law, was, according to the constitution and habit of the British law, suggested for the aiding of their better judgment, and was not laid down as a matter of authority. Upon their unanimous judgment must depend the decision of the case, and from their unanimous judgment there was no appeal; and upon their conscientious and unanimous judgment, his lordship had no doubt the parties interested in the case would rely and ought to rely. His lordship then proceeded, as briefly as was possible, to put before the jury the facts out of which the present case arose.

On the publication of the pamphlet the prosecution was founded. The conduct of the prosecutor was alleged by the defence to have justified the view expressed by the accused. The prosecution, on the other hand, said that the document was of such a character that its publication constituted a criminal offence under the Indian Penal Code punishable by imprisonment or fine. The prosecution was a private prosecution, and in the present case the prosecution representing the Crown brought Chatterput Sing up on a charge under the criminal law, and the jury had to decide between the Crown on the one hand and the accused on the other on this question, like any other which came under the provisions of the criminal law. But, his lordship said, he felt killed and 65 wounded; while the dragoons managed to slay 1 Indian 'braves' and 250 women and children. The telegram adds that of the entire Indian camp not more than six children remained alive. Wretched little 'papooses!' Perhaps, on the whole, it would have been better for them if they had been butchered along with the squaws their mothers."

What a Christmas they celebrated!

IN another column, we take the liberty to publish an interesting letter from our wellknown townsman Mr. R. D. Mehta. It was received by the editor in his private capacity, but as it refers to the question of the hour, and is an intelligent deliverance by a recognised public man, we have obtained his permission to offer it to the public.

WE hear the Amrita Bazar Patrika has turned into a daily. We have not seen this phenomenal development of Gobardhan journalism. We hear the first issue has a joke at us. It is very considerate of our brother not to let us see it.

THE Maharaja of Durbhanga has spoken on the Bill. As an orthodox Brahman and a great territorial Chief, his opinion is of great weight. He respects the motive of those who oppose the measure as clashing with Hindu religious sanctions and customs. The Maharaja, however, has no such fears. He is satisfied that the Bill trenches not on forbidden ground and that the Government is within its powers. The present agitation is a condemnation of the Police administration of the empire and the Maharaja contributes his share of the dread of Police oppression.

DR. Mahendra Lal Sircar has been reappointed a member of the Bengal Legislative Council.

OUR "NEW SALVATION ARMY."

THE campaigning of our new Salvationists is still in full swing. Their firing of "speeches" and "resolutions" is going on as merrily as ever, and the voice of sober reason and common sense seems to be drowned in the din and glamour. We may not doubt the sincerity of the "Generals" and the "officers" of the vocal artillery. But they are at any rate so inebriated with the exuberance of their own verbosity, that we do not entertain the least hope of obtaining from them a fair hearing or of escaping their abuse. Our position may be unshakeable. But what of that? If their cannonading makes no impression upon it, they will at least have the satisfaction of shrouding and suffocating us in a cloud of smoke and dust. That being their determination, we must observe in limine that what we are saying on the subject, is not addressed to them, but to the rank and file who are misled by their cry of "religion in danger."

From the very meaning of the word Garbhādhān, it follows that the proper time for it is the period when, regard being had to the common course of natural events, the wife may be reasonably presumed to be sufficiently mature for impregnation and for safely giving birth to a healthy child. It has been seriously argued by some of the amateur expounders of our Shasters, that the object of Garbhādhān is not to procreate a healthy child but any sort of child, good, bad or indifferent. If that is the correct view of the doctrine of our Shasters, why is it that they declare that a sickly girl should not be taken in marriage? Why is it again that the words *vishishta putrotpatti kama occur in the formula of sankalpat for Garbhādhān? Yagnyavalkya says:—

* Being desirous of having an excellent son.

Formal enunciation of determination to perform a ceremony, the enunciation forming an essential part of the ceremony.

Laksanyan Janeya Chap. I. v. 80. Garbhādhānists may interpret this text in their own way. But we take it to mean that the husband should observe the rules and restrictions for approaching the wife in order to beget a healthy son of good promise.

In determining the proper age for Garbhādhān, it ought to be borne in mind that it means impregnation, and that it is not equivalent to mere consummation. Our Shasters do not enjoin consummation for its own sake. They enjoin cohabitation only when it is likely to be followed by conception. The cases in which child wives of less than twelve years become mothers, are very exceptional, and in determining what our duties are, according to the Shasters, we are not allowed to take such exceptional cases into consideration. Jesus may have, by his miraculous power, appeased the hunger of 5000 men with 5 loaves; but an ordinary mortal of a human race cannot be justified in determining his course of action by counting upon the possibility of events which are so rare as to be regarded as phenomenal. Medical men say that cases are on record in which the catamenia have appeared even so early as the fifth year. We have ourselves heard of cases in which they have appeared in the eighth year. Are the Garbhādhānists prepared to make our holy Rishis responsible for the monstrous doctrine that the ceremony and act of impregnation are imperative in such cases also? If our "Booths" and "Tuckers" entertain such opinion, we have only to say that we cannot regard them as Hindus, or even as human beings. Their learning may be very great; but it must be somewhat similar to that of the astrologer who, on being asked by a man what he held in hand, said that it was a mill-stone. The interrogator, who, in fact held a piece of stone in his hand, was satisfied as to the learning of the seer, but could not give him credit for common sense. Nor can we give any credit for common sense to the Pundit who would maintain that Garbhādhān or impregnation could, under any circumstances, be imperative where the wife was a child of 8 or 9 years. The texts of our Shasters ought to be so interpreted as to make them consistent with reason. Vrihaspati says,

*Kebalam shisra'ndsritya na kartavya viniraya
Yuktina vidhāre tu dharmalopa prajayate.*

This text does not, as is supposed generally, lay down that reason can override texts, but it recommends the adoption of that interpretation only which is consistent with reason. Having in view this canon of interpretation and the several texts which we have relied upon, the conclusion seems to us to be irresistible that Garbhādhān can never be imperative until the wife is more than 12 years old. In the absence of any express text laying down that consummation can in any case be obligatory on a girl of 8 or 9 years, the authorities we have cited in support of our position must be held to be conclusive, as it is certainly more consistent with reason than the doctrine of the Garbhādhānists.

The injunctions of our Shasters apply only to those who have the means and the capacity to perform the acts enjoined. The great exegete Bhattapada says:—

Tidhātva gnyate Kṛta visheshena pratikriyam Yogyatām, pratishudh uttam, Vishesha padannaih.

Vide Raghunanda's Tithitwa, p. 98.

* The author of acts enjoined by the Shasters is ascertainable by taking into consideration the fitness of the party, and by prohibitory and qualifying clauses in the texts laying down the injunctions.

According to this text, the persons to whom an injunction may be applicable are ascertainable in three different ways:—

1. Competency. 2. Prohibitory clauses. 3. Qualifying words.

There are texts which require

- (1) That every one should perform the Doorga Pooja.—Vide Tithitattva, p. 41.
- (2) That after Samābartana, every member of the twice born classes should marry.
- (3) That white and untattered clothes should be worn by householders—Yagnyavalkya, Chap. I. v. 131.

These injunctions seem at first sight to be applicable to all persons without any exception. But, as a matter of fact, they apply only to those who have the necessary power, means and the material at their disposal. Where the necessary material for a ceremony is wanting on account of the wife being too young, it is the height of absurdity to hold that the husband incurs sin by not performing the ceremony. The appearance of catamenia is only the nimitta or occasion. But the husband must determine his course of action by taking into consideration also the fitness of the material he has to deal with. Garbhadhan is a naimittic act, i. e., its performance is enjoined only upon the occurrence of a certain event. But its proper performance depends upon certain physical conditions, and it cannot be obligatory when those conditions are wanting. The performance of shrad at the time of an eclipse is enjoined. But the injunction is not binding on one who has not the necessary materials.

There are among our opponents some who justify the legislation of times, catamenia, &c., now. This kind of argument is certainly not valid, but it is certainly an assumption of all those who lived in a world to which the sages were omniscient and legislated not only for the Satya Yuga in which they flourished, but even for the Age of Sin in which we live. If they meant to lay down that Garbhadhan was obligatory in all cases without any exception, they certainly made a great mistake by not laying down also that the fathers of girls incurred sin by not giving them in marriage before their fifth year.

In conclusion, we have to put one more question to our adversaries:—If Garbhadhan is imperative in all cases on the occurrence of a certain event, is it obligatory when that event occurs in a child wife of 8 or 9 years?

VOLTAIRE'S EDUCATION FROM HIS LODGINGS.

BY E. LEGOUVE.

(Translated from L'Echo de la Semaine for Reis & Rayyet.)

THE walls have ears, we say; they have something better still,—they have a mouth. They not only hear, they speak; and I hardly know a more eloquent language.

That our character and turn of mind depend partly on the countries we are born in and on places where we grow, is a doctrine most in vogue; it is a true theory, for places are often our true educators.

Voltaire offers a curious example of it. He was all what a man of letters could be—poet, historian, philosopher, savant, romancer and polemic. There is hardly any of his writings, which does not show that he was a student of his lodgings.

When very young, his father placed him in the Jesuit College—Louis-le-Grand. What did the walls of that pious college inspire him with? He tells it himself in a charming letter: "It is to them that I owe the purest and the most profound passion of my life,—the passion which supported me everywhere, which consoled me everywhere—the passion for belles-lettres and poesy." Here is a sentiment of gratitude for his masters, which remains as one of his true titles of honour.

After the college of the Jesuits, the Bastille. The walls of that formidable prison left some indelible impressions on his mind. There he was educated at the expense of the State, and God knows if he had profited by that education. Immured there at two different times to undergo punishment once for some verses which were not his, and the second time for an injury which he did not inflict, he read there for some long months, written in letters of fire on those sombre marbles, all the iniquities of a régime in which the liberty of a man was at the mercy of the caprice of a minister or of a nobleman.

After the Bastille, London. He remained there for three years. Shall I say three years of exile? No; three years of intellectual and moral expansion. It is the heroic age of the life of Voltaire. What he acquired in those three years is incalculable. Like some powerful plants of the tropics, he shot forth in all his senses—he grew, flowered and fructified. He found there some admirable initiators—Clarke, the disciple of Newton, for the sciences; Locke, for philosophy; Pope, for the philosophical poetry; Shakespeare, for the dramatic art; the Parliamentary orators for politics. He had arrived at London with the hatred of despotism, he left it with the love of liberty.

After London, Cirey,—after exile, solitude. Solitude completed the work of exile. It took him five years of retreat and solitude to put into light what he had amassed in the three years of proscription. It is from Cirey that he dated his Elements of the Philosophy of Newton, his Discourses on Man, his History of the Age of Louis XIV., his Essays on manners, his tragedies Alzire, Mahomet, Merope. Finally, it is from Cirey that he rose for the first and the last time to the height of lyric genius. It is from Cirey that he composed that admirable epistle to Uranus, mixing together in a magnificent language the poetry and the religious sentiments, he made a dedication to Newton a hymn to the Creator and a prelude to the Meditations of the ancients.

For once his education seemed achieved; but the mysterious power which seems to be charged with the cares of localities, sent him once more to another school and under another master. What was that school? A palace. Who was that master? A king. After Cirey, Berlin. The Bastille had shown him the captivity of bolts and railings, Ferrei Servitus; Berlin, the gilded servitude of a palace. I have often reflected on what had passed in the mind of Voltaire within the four walls of the cabinet and the dining hall of Frederic, and in his Chambre-de-Travail at Potsdam. What bitter lesson of irony, of disenchantment! What new view of men and things! At first he was received by his royal host as a master by his disciple, as a sovereign by his flatterers, as a friend by his friend. But as time went on, he saw succeed to these excesses of enthusiasm, the sarcasm, the raillery, the mockery ("Voltaire mocked by some one!" until at last there were outrageous doubts and persecutions. He longed to escape from this place as one longs to escape from a prison. He left it only to recommence during five years a life of erratic ubiquity, wandering from court to court, from town to town, till he finally settled at Ferne as a place of refuge.

What contrast! What change of decoration! What new instruction! Here it was that, for the first time, he was in face of a spectacle of which he had only a glimpse before—here he was in face of nature! Nature in her double aspect—nature such as God made her and such as man made her, nature grand, terrible, savage and nature beneficent, nourishing, fertile—the Alps and the plains of the country of the Gex. He received a violent repercussion from them. His spirit rose, his heart expanded, his thoughts widened. Instead of often hearing Jean-Jacques Rousseau extol the king of the sun, he one day at 5 o'clock in the morning went to the top of a mountain and at the first dawn of day he fell on his knees and cried out:

must refer for a moment before he proceeded to a point he had already mentioned. At the commencement of the Sessions, which began so long ago as the 8th December, he expressed his opinion, for reasons which he would not now repeat, that this was a case for which the machinery of the Sessions Court was most probably not intended. He formed his opinion from a perusal of the depositions in the lengthy proceedings which had taken place before the Magistrate, and he was bound to say that the progress of the case did not lead him to form a different opinion. The prosecution, as the jury would observe, was not brought for redress by recovery of a right denied or taken away. It was not brought to recover damages for wrong done to the prosecutor. If his case was well founded, as it might well be, he might have recovered damages in a civil action; or the defendant, Chutterput, might have made good his case, on which, as learned counsel for the defence had pointed out, the plaintiff in a civil case, if unsuccessful, would be obliged to pay costs. This case was distinguished from such a suit by the freedom from that liability, but also by the fact that nothing in any way beneficial to himself, save the gratification of such feelings as might be gratified in this case by the accused's conviction, could possibly accrue to the complainant. The prosecution was not brought to test or determine any disputed question, for the jury could determine no disputed question. The only question with which they were concerned was whether or not, in their judgment, an offence, either real or technical, under the defamation sections of the Code, had been committed; and that was all. The prosecution was brought to punish opponents in the caste, who, if any offence had been committed by them, had not committed it out of any ill-will to the prosecutor, so far as the evidence goes, or so far as any suggestion in the case ever appeared until a few short minutes during one of the days of the reply by the learned counsel for the prosecution, in which was suggested something not before the Court as having that effect, which might perhaps have existed in the minds of the present defendant toward Indur Chanda Nhatta. This suggestion of the learned counsel on behalf of his client, his lordship considered, having regard to what he had said now, the jury might dismiss from their consideration. But there were one or two passages in the evidence which, he must say, showed that it would have been better had this suggestion not been made. No ill-will on the part of the twelve gentlemen originally prosecuted with Chutterput Sing towards the prosecutor had been suggested in the evidence. He put it to the jury, therefore, and he thought they would agree with him, that if Chutterput Sing and the other persons whose prosecution stood over had committed an offence against the Indian Penal Code, they had committed it by being guilty of an excess of language on a matter (the question of excess was for the jury) on which undoubtedly he would advise them as a jury the defendants had a right to comment. The resolutions, as to which much was said, might, or might not, be valid; the proceeding did not attempt to get them set aside. The view of the prosecutor's conduct expressed in other parts of the pamphlet might, or might not, be mistaken from the accused's point of view. The proceeding could not determine whether or not it was mistaken. The jury had the power of deciding whether a verdict of guilty might or might not be pronounced against Chutterput Sing. They could decide whether or not the minister of the law to whom the pronouncing of the sentence is committed, shall or shall not have the right to inflict on him the punishment of imprisonment. They could place it in the power of the minister of the law, by inflicting that imprisonment to send him to jail where unless special arrangements were made for the prisoner, he must lose his caste. They could by their verdict gratify the desire on the part of the prosecutor to be avenged for what the defendants had done. But they could not help him to regain his caste. The Penal Code included within the provisions with regard to defamation, imputations which harmed the character of a person with respect to his caste. The indictment necessarily spread the net very wide. The jury had heard what the learned Standing Counsel had said, though he did not mention the name of the writer, who said that if the defamation sections were carried to the utmost, most of the population of this country would make their presence in court.—It was Mr. Mayne, a very distinguished writer on Indian law.—Necessarily the law must be jealous of the reputation of the Queen's subjects, and it was necessary that the provisions relating to defamation would be searching and thorough to meet the necessary cases. But it was not every case to which the stringent provisions of the Indian Penal Code could be made to apply, and ought to be invoked. His Lordship openly echoed in this matter the opinion of so respectable an authority as Sir Charles Turner, late Chief Justice of Madras in the case reported in Indian Law Reports, Madras Series, vol. VI., and it was his Lordship's duty to submit that, on the face of the whole evidence, and reading the documents embodied in the case, taking a broad commonsense view of such a matter, the jury would agree that the view then expressed was apposite to the defendant's conduct in the case. There was no doubt that in the pamphlet, there were expressions which might properly be considered to come within the section of the Indian Penal Code as to defamation. It was extremely difficult to express any opinion unfavourable to the conduct of a person with respect to caste, without using language which, unless justified, or explained away, might be said to come within the terms of this section, and the learned Presidency Magistrate, before whom the prosecution of twelve persons came on, after hearing the case for the prosecution for a considerable length of time, came to the conclusion that a prima facie case was made out, and came also to the conclusion (which perhaps the jury would not share) that it would be more satisfactory to have the case come before a jury. He accordingly committed the case for trial before the Sessions Court, and when committed the Court had no alternative, but to try it. The jury had heard the sections of the Indian Penal Code applicable to the matter referred to, and the exceptions which constituted the different clauses of the evidence of justification for language that was defamatory. The case being brought into court, and the prosecutor being left free to pursue it, the defendant's position was, as stated by learned counsel, that he must either submit himself, or make out his case under the exceptions; and in order to do that, it was essential that he had to meet the case charging him with the publication. He was entitled to put the prosecution to the proof of the act charged against him. It was essential for him to show that the exceptions, or some of them, applied. This necessarily involved the enquiry on which they had so long been engaged. So that, tedious and most distressing as it had been, it was absolutely impossible, with the law as it now stood, to avoid an enquiry into this question, of whether the observances and practices according to the Jain community had been violated, or whether there was fair ground for believing they had been violated by the prosecutor; and it followed that it was absolutely essential to go into the questions as to what had been done at the meetings of the caste, and the rules of discipline appertaining to that point. So long as the law required to be enclosed within its provisions, questions of this nature, the determination of which could not be arrived at without a vast amount of testimony, enquiry into them must be made unless the party charged with an offence were to be deprived of his right of defence. It was true as learned counsel for the defence had said that there was no measure of proportion whatever between the length of the trial, and the prodigious cost incurred on the one hand, and any possible result of the trial whatever on the other hand. It was only to be expected, however, that the accused, seeing he had no alternative, and backed up by the majority of the community, should strain every nerve in a matter in which their religion was to be impeached. He mentioned this not merely because it was right that it should be known, that as the law stood this was bound to be a protracted matter. There might be some cases in which the alleged defamation in respect to caste matters should properly, and in regard to public interest, come before a jury. But there were certainly some which in his lordship's judgment should not. And it was a matter worth consideration whether this Court of Sessions ought not to have the power of sending back to the magistrate a case part-heard by him, and which in its judgment had better be completed by him. His lordship said he thought also it might be well worth considering whether the power of entering a nolle prosequi, in cases in which the court might consider that the interest of public justice did not need enquiry before a jury, ought not to be vested in this court. His lordship then went on to say that the assertion, that the length of the case was out of all proportion to its importance was by no means so true as was at first supposed, as some of the questions raised in consequence of the matter having come before the court were of great public importance, and it was of additional importance to one of the most ancient, wealthy and widely diffused communities in India. It was for the jury to consider whether or not the question they were sitting there to decide, and the conclusion they would come to, were not of such a nature as to shake to its very centre that wealthy and respectable community. Another matter connected with the case was of great importance, and that was that a jury consisting of two exceptions, his lordship believed, of Christians, was called upon to determine on matters of extreme interest and vital importance to a community extremely ancient, with which, until they had sat on this jury, they had no knowledge of, had not occupied their attention at all. He was sure, however, that they would discharge this most solemn duty of deciding as jurymen what were the rights of their fellow subjects without prejudice. His lordship proceeded to detail at some length the manners and customs of the Jains, their antiquity as a community, their immense wealth, and facility for adapting themselves to commerce, and gave it as his experience of them as a body that, with a remarkable capacity for commercial pursuits, they combined an equally remarkable degree of probity and uprightness in these pursuits. There were, of course, a few exceptions; but in a community so large and widely diffused, this was not to be wondered at. He mentioned this specially because in the course of his charge to the jury he would have to pass some strictures on the evidence of certain of the witnesses of that community as evincing to some extent a disregard for that strict attention to truth which ought to characterise the evidence of a witness. With regard to the charge, his lordship said that the words "having gone to England" on the charge sheet were meant to convey that a specific offence against the caste rules had been committed. This was abundantly proved, notwithstanding learned counsel's contention to the contrary by a host of witnesses, and above all by the telegram despatched to Aden by Boodh Sing. His lordship also referred to the mode in which the evidence concerning the voyage to England should be treated. With regard to this matter, two important questions arose, namely, the question of the action taken by Nahatta on board; and another question, auxiliary to that, namely, the opinion the jury had formed of his truthfulness as a witness. His lordship proceeded to read the evidence of the complainant and other witnesses connected with this portion of the case, and commented at some length on it—and the various incidents in the case arising therefrom. Upon this the jury would have to consider whether there had been a violation of the caste rules on the voyage to England. His lordship had not concluded his charge to the jury when the Court rose for the day, at 5 P.M.

THE ALLAHABAD UNIVERSITY. CONVOCATION DAY.—THE CHANCELLOR'S SPEECH. (Concluded from p. 82.)

I pass now to the other two propositions, which concern, I have said, the mechanism of the University as apart from its scheme of instruction. With regard to the first, I shall not detain you. Whatever may be the wishes of some of us in point of fact we have no option but to make the University an examining and not a teaching body, modelled somewhat on the lines of the University of London, though differing from it in some essential respects. The material difficulties and objections in the way of establishing a teaching University are overwhelming; and although it may be in our wishes that hereafter a University of the type more familiar to us in our own country, should be established in India, there can be no question of the impossibility of achieving this for many years to come. The first Chancellor, Sir Alfred Lyall, explained this carefully in his opening address in 1887, adding:—"I do not say, however, that no attempt should be made to lay the first stone of a gradual change in the design. On the contrary, I have already proposed to strengthen gradually the Muir College, which is now the local habitation and meeting place of the University." If these words foreshadowed, by the way, a desire to transform hereafter the Muir College into the University, and to make of the University, in this new guise, a teaching as well as an examining body, I regret that I cannot identify myself with them. I apprehend, on the contrary, that much mischief may ensue to the University, as we have it now constituted, if an idea gained ground that any one College aspired ultimately to usurp its functions, or to claim for itself on that account a preponderance and an increasing weight. If the time should come when the University is made a teaching as well as an examining institution I trust that in its final development it will compose its teaching staff and its governing body impartially from all, and not from one only, or mainly, of its affiliated institutions; and I should above all things deprecate the growth of a belief that in some peculiar way the Muir College, more than other colleges, was identified with the University; or had been selected more especially to furnish that University hereafter with the members necessary to enable it to exercise more varied functions. However, for the present, and probably for long years, the University must remain a purely examining body. No doubt we lose meanwhile the great intellectual advantages which students gain who live in a centre of instruction under the immediate shadow of a University, gathering round it the staff of the several Colleges. The cold abstraction of an examining University—a University "pinnacled dim in the intense inane,"—casts no such genial influence over its graduates as emanate from the Alma Mater of our English type. So far as a remedy can be found for this, it can be found only in the influence exercised by the University over its distant affiliated institutions. This influence lies in its Rules and Regulations; in the attributes with which the Faculties, the Syndicate and the Senate are severally vested; and in the power of conferring degrees of examination for which presupposes a course of study which it has prescribed. But in order that this influence may be welcomed by the Colleges, they themselves must be fully represented in the University. In order that the connection between the University and its affiliated institutions may be as close as possible, and that the students may feel that the University is something more than a mere name, and may regard it, however remote in point of place, as closely identified in spirit with the Colleges in which they are gathered; as being of all, though above all; as endowed with sensible attributes, though invisible; as even in some sort, of a human aspect subsisting, it is necessary that the number of Fellows on the University rolls who belong to the affiliated institutions, and especially to the institutions which cannot speak with the direct support of the Government, should be numerous. As the influence of the University over students cannot be direct, there is the more reason for endeavouring to strengthen the means by which alone such influence as it may achieve can be exercised. If it is desired that there should grow up a tradition, which though it cannot hope to inspire like a lively presence should as far as possible resemble it, it is in the Colleges affiliated to the University that we must look for it. Again, that the University may be truly Provincial, all Provincial educational institutions affiliated to it must in an equal degree feel that they have real and vital interest in its counsels. It would be fatal to the University if any one College claimed or obtained pre-eminence, or if any one body of men or order of ideas possessed themselves of the governing body. This is even more necessary on the Syndicate than on the Senate. The scheme of this University contemplates the ordinary administration of University matters by the authority delegated through the Senate to the Syndicate. It seeks, so far as may be, if I rightly divine its purpose, to remove questions with which the University has to deal from the arena of passion or the oblique vision of self-interest. Discussion, at least in the initial phases, of these questions is confined to those whose training and profession qualify them specially to deal with questions of education, or to men who have raised themselves to eminence in public administration, and whose experience and sagacity may be relied upon to save them from rash or unconsidered views. But the Syndicate being a small body, there is the more necessity that there should be found within its ranks equal representation of all classes interested in the University. This necessity has not escaped the attention of those who have occupied themselves with the matter; but, whether in view of the need of giving our examining University not a semblance only but a reality of life, by identifying with it the interests of all institutions which are concerned: of eliminating as far as may be, elements of weakness from its councils; and of endowing them with all the strength from outside sources which a representative character will assure them,—it appears to me a matter which requires a clear enunciation of opinion such as on his occasion I desire to give to it. But if the Colleges are to exert the influence due to them in the Senate, Syndicate or Faculties, it is as necessary as we have seen it to be for their efficiency in teaching that their Professors should be men of the highest culture and capacity. That is their business; it is vital to their success; and they will doubtless be careful to see to it.

I have thus brought to a close my review of what I understand should be the aims which a University sets before itself, the methods which we have adopted to carry out those aims, and the precautions which in the future we are bound to observe. I have attempted to illustrate the application in these Provinces of the four propositions which I indicated at starting; and to show, while ours must remain an examining University, what should be its relation to its affiliated Colleges; what its own aim and ideal; what its attitude in regard to the classical language of India, and the contending courses of Western instruction; what the degree of instruction which it should regard as indispensable to admission to the course of education prescribed by it; and what its relations to the special methods of training which are necessary for professional life. It may be objected to me that I have dealt with generalities, and that nothing which I have said is calculated to give direct assistance to the solution of questions which may be dividing the councils of the University. To this I may be permitted to reply that the business of the Chancellor, especially on an occasion like this, is not to enter into discussion of the technical application of general propositions, but to endeavour, so far as may be, to facilitate the disposal of such questions, when they may arise, by an impartial exposition of the principles by which all proposals concerning University education should be decided. Again, it may be urged that much of what I have said as to the uses and functions of a University is inapplicable to India: that I have aimed too high; and that I have set before myself and before you an ideal which is unattainable by us, and therefore unsuited to our consideration: a counsel of perfection, which has no practical relation to our Provincial needs and circumstances. On this objection, should it be urged, I must join issue. If we are to attain to any good, we must keep before us the supreme type of excellence we must hold high, above all questions of country, or of local difficulties, the conception of what a University should be. We are not permitted, in truth, to modify that conception. We may fall far short of it in practice. We may aspire, but be incapable of attaining. But though we fail, we cannot dare to bring down to the level of our achievement the ideal of our aim; or alter one jot our conceptions of the character and the attributes of the source of light, because it may seem too far above us, and outside the range of our attainment.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Travellers and Emigrants.—Those who cross the seas change the climate, but they do not change the constitution. The altered conditions of life, the exigencies of travel and other causes render the traveller and emigrant peculiarly liable to diseases and accidents when far from efficient medical aid. With these associated remedies at hand they may be said to have a physician always at their call, and they may be certain that situations will be constantly arising in which they will require a ready resource in time of need. The directions for use which accompany each box and pot of Holloway's Pills and Ointment are written in plain and simple language, and are applicable in all cases.

PERSONS suffering from Leprosy, Asthma, Consumption, Diabetes, Piles, Leucorrhœa, Dysentery, Rheumatism, Paralysis, Intermit- tent Fever, Jaundice, Liver, Spleen, Mercurial Eruptions and Cholera and almost all the incur- able diseases which have been given up by doctors and kairajs as hopeless, can be radi- cally and rapidly cured by me within 40 days. Certificates of radical cures are constantly re- ceived. Medicines can be sent to the mofussil on receipt of particulars of the disease. JEYES' SANITARY COMPOUNDS

In the various shapes of Liquid, Powder, Soap and Ointment are invaluable in the Indian climate.

They are perfectly harmless, non-poisonous, and non-irritant.

They have proved efficacious in skin diseases. They cure wounds and ulcers. Even Lepers have found them valuable.

To the rich and the poor, the healthy and the sick, they are alike welcome.

They destroy the virus or contagion of small-pox, measles, typhus and typhoid fevers.

They cleanse your homes and clothes and purify the air. They keep your body clean, teeth strong and skin pure. Your bed free from bug, your drains inodorous, and closets free from bad smells.

They may be used with safety and with happy results in the sick-room, kitchen, and every other part of a house.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

AN INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF MICROBES AT BERLIN.

Microscopical midgets
Were getting the fidgets,
On hearing the horrible news,
That the microbes were slaughtered—
Were starved and were quartered,
'T was surely a cause for the blues.

Smallest plants and wee bugs
Are not dull, snail-like slugs,
But form a unicity rare ;
They commune with each other
(Each kingdom, a brother)
When both have a terrible scare.

So an edict went forth
East and West, South and North,
For the Microbes in Congress to meet
In the place, where a sage
Who is now all the rage,
Thinks such elfins—each one—a dead beat.

A great polyglot crowd
Of wee Lilliputs proud,
Assembled in solemn conclave,
And those speaking Pthisis
With warm exegesis,
Besought all their friends to be brave.

Then one spoke in Lupus,
With tones base and croupous,
And said he was "not a bit blue,
I'm not yet like Othello—
And will fight a 'duello,
With Koch or some one of his crew."

A tenor, in Typhoid,
With gestures quite cycloid,
A tiny Professor,—then said
"On mankind I'll still sup,
I won't give his flesh up,
And of starving I'm not yet afraid."

A speech in harsh Cancer,
By a wise geomancer,
Foretold of a bright coming time,
When no more on the earth
Would there be human birth,
As the microbes were just in their prime.

And with man quite extinct,
It was clearly distinct
The Germs would then evolute gay,
Be lords of creation—
The great innovation,
At which Time was now making a play.

In Cholera lingo,
One said that, "By jingo
Men eat their choice game with suave grace,
We'll feed on their flesh-pots,
These devilish despots,
Until we have eaten their race."

In co-operation
These dwarfs of each nation
In solemn alliance agreed,
"Fierce aggression, severe,
More and more every year
Till the earth of mankind was quite freed."

They adjourned for a dance
In high glee and joyance,
And whirligiged round like young nymphs :
In Koch's parlor so gay
They danced a whole day
And laughed at his new-fangled lymphs.

Then they wound up the fête
With a feast quite ornate,
Consuming wise doctors, a score,
And drank their own health,
In the lymphs, got by stealth,
And wished they had kegs and kegs more.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

CENSUS was taken on the night of Thursday the 26th February. It passed off quietly.

THERE will be an exhibition of local arts and manufactures at Mirzapore, and it will be opened by Sir Auckland Colvin.

MR. Quinton has ceased to be an Additional member of the Governor-General's Council for making Laws and Regulations. Mr. J. Woodburn, Chief Secretary to the N.-W. P. Government, replaces him.

THE Raja of Manda has made an additional contribution of Rs. 5,000 to the Allahabad Branch of the Countess of Dufferin.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

THE head-quarters of the defence works have been transferred from Pindi to Attock.

THE Delhi horse and cattle fair will be held on the 16th to the 23rd March. There will be prizes to the value of Rs. 1,600.

A RAILWAY from Hyderabad to Damerkote has been decided upon. It will be of the standard gauge, and completed in a few months.

MR. W. H. Rattigan has been reappointed Vice-Chancellor of the Punjab University. A thoroughly good and wise appointment. The cause of culture could not be entrusted to better hands. Mr. Rattigan's services to the University have been simply invaluable.

A LONDON washerwoman received back from a customer a necktie, which she had sent him with the hebdomadal "clean clothes," with words written upon it, "You filthy woman, do you call this washed? I don't!" The woman conceived herself insulted and applied to the West London Police Court for justice. The Magistrate Mr. Plowden, however, thought there was no remedy, for no constituted authority "could prevent a man from writing rubbish on his own necktie." Is it for this immunity, that we see rubbish and filth all round at the present hour on rags of sorts, if not on neckties?

THE East, the leading native journal of East Bengal, which has kept its head in the present agitation, after exposing the false pretences of the agitators, warns the genuine Hindus and the orthodox among our countrymen against being used as tools in the hands of designing men, who are only serving their own personal ends.

HERE is a call to the Graduates of the Calcutta University to prove themselves worthy of the Degrees they hold of it:—

"Calcutta, 25th February 1891.

DEAR FELLOW-GRADUATES,

An unfortunate attempt has been made to identify the Graduates with the present agitation in connection with the Age of Consent Bill, and to shew that as a body they are opposed to the proposed measure. It is necessary in the interests of high education, for the reputation for culture and advancement of this enlightened Province, for the fair fame of the Graduates themselves, that this attempt should not be allowed to be successful. Bengal has, within the last few weeks, presented a spectacle of which we cannot be proud, and of which the opponents of our progress and general advancement have not failed to take note. It is now for the educated classes to come forward and unhesitatingly to declare that, subject to such safeguards as may be found necessary, they have nothing but earnest sympathy and support for a measure which seeks to protect from physical suffering endured in silent patience those who have the highest claim on our consideration, kindness, and tender regard, viz., the immature child-wives of the country—for a measure which seeks to protect from growing degeneracy the unborn generations of the land. It is in this view that we send to you the accompanying representation for signature and return, as soon as possible, to R. N. Ray, M.A., 77, Wellesley Street, Calcutta.

Yours faithfully,

KRISHNA KAMAL BHATTACHARJEE, B.A., B.L.

RASH BEHARY GHOSH, M.A., D.L.

A. M. BOSE, M.A."

The Calcutta University men have been disgraced by the rowdy meeting held in their name by a parcel of non-descript agitators, at one of the native theatres.

It is a significant fact that the Brahmos petitioned Government to be classed as Hindus, while the Chandals repudiated their designation in favour of Namasudra, and the Jolhas begged to be called Karigars. Their several prayers were granted. None of these different classes evidently thinks with Juliet, What's in a name? We are now and for ever all Hindus only—the new Smartha, Ganesh Garbhapadhyaya and his Jatindia—classification of castes—notwithstanding.

A NEW crown, set with precious stones and valued at Rs. 40,000, was presented to the idol in Parthasarthy Coil, Triplicane. It is the gift of Balajee, Rangum Chetty Garu and others. The image was with the crown carried through the streets in procession. Brahmins were fed and alms distributed.

MR. Bradlaugh was interred at Woking Cemetery on February 3. There were present eight members of Parliament—Messrs. John Morley, Labouchere, Hunter, Burt, John O'Connor, Fenwick, Picton, and Mr. George Jacob Holyoake. Mr. John Coleman, the actor, the Marquis of Queensbury and Mrs. Besant also attended. There was no service of any kind, the coffin being simply carried to the grave and lowered.

IN aid of his "Darkest England" scheme, "General" Booth—the wellknown head of the Salvation Army—has received £64,000 in cash and £38,000 in promises. A receiving house has been opened at King's Cross for ex-prisoners. During a meeting to celebrate the event, Mr. Fleming, a subscriber of £2,000, began a speech, but did not finish it. He was highly excited, and exhibited great nervousness, and suddenly fell dead on the platform. No such accident marked the Gobardhan carnival of Wednesday on the Calcutta race course. Our fellows who sought notoriety on the maidan, averse as they are to phlebotomy, were too careful of the main chance to exhibit an enthusiasm of inhumanity.

A SUBORDINATE Judge, Manavalayya, at Coconada, was prosecuted for bribery. He was charged with receiving Rs. 25,000 from one Pyda Venkhantha, a plaintiff in a suit in his court. He admitted receipt of the sum and pleaded guilty. The District Magistrate sentenced the accused to 3 months' solitary confinement, 15 months' simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,000, in default 4 months' rigorous imprisonment.

A HOOGHLY correspondent, under date the 25th February, writes to a morning contemporary:—

"We have had several administration suits here of an amusing nature. One partook of the character of the famous Tichborne case, inasmuch as the alleged widow of the deceased put in an appearance in Court, and claimed the estate after the lapse of no less than half-a-century, asserting that since her husband's death she had been living at Benares as a votary in some temple. A number of witnesses were examined in and out of Court, and ultimately it turned out that the claimant was a pretender, and had not a shadow of right to the property claimed. No doubt she was set up for the purpose of defeating the claims of a rival party. Another administration case is exciting a local sensation. The parties belong to the family of the Srimanis of Baidyabatty, who amassed much wealth during the last century by carrying on a flourishing trade in Lower Bengal in brassware, linseed, and other articles. The widow asks to be the administrator of the estate on behalf of her minor son, and is opposed by her deceased husband's brother on the ground that the son in question is a fictitious and not a real one. The petitioner says that the son is a posthumous child, and therefore none the less a real one. A host of female witnesses are to be examined to disprove the genuineness of the child, and disclose the fact that the petitioner was not eniente at all at the time of her husband's death."

RAMKUMARI, an illegitimate, and Dukhi, a legitimate, Chetri were married as Hindoos. After a time, the wife became a Mussalmani and took to husband a Mahomedan, one Guzaffer. Ramkumari was thereupon prosecuted for bigamy, convicted under Sec. 494 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced by the Additional Sessions Judge of the 24-Pergunnahs to one month's rigorous imprisonment. There was a reference to the High Court, and Messrs. Justices Macpherson and Bannerjee confirmed both the conviction and the sentence. The Sessions Judge had held that the accused's marriage with Dukhi was a valid Hindoo marriage, that it was not dissolved by her conversion to Mahomedanism, and that her subsequent marriage to Guzaffer was in consequence void. It was contended in the High Court that the conviction by the lower Court was wrong on the grounds—first, because the first marriage under the Hindoo law was invalid on account of the illegitimacy of the bride and the consequent difference of caste between the pair; secondly, because the former marriage became dissolved under the Hindoo law in consequence of the conversion of the one; and, thirdly, because the second marriage was not void by the Mahomedan law which is the law governing the parties to it, by reason of its taking place in the life time of the woman's former husband. The High Court Judges thus answered the contentions:—

"We do not think there is any force in the first contention, regard being had to the facts of this case. In our opinion illegitimacy is no absolute disqualification for marriage, and where one of both parties to a marriage is illegitimate, the correct view seems to us to be to regard the marriage as valid if they are in point of fact recognised by their castemen (as the parties in this case are in effect found to have been) as belonging to the same caste. In this view of the case it is unnecessary for us to say more upon this point. In support of the second contention, viz., that the marriage of the petitioner with her first husband becomes dissolved under the Hindoo law by her conversion to Mahomedanism, we are referred to the case of Rahmed Bibee vs. Rakhiya Bibee (1, Norton's Leading Cases on Hindoo Law, page 12). That case no doubt supports the petitioner's view, but we are unable to accept it as correct. It was argued that the Hindoo law would regard the apostate wife as beyond its pale, and as a person that is civilly dead. That may be so as regards his civil rights, but we find no authority in Hindoo law for the position, that a degraded person or an apostate is absolved from all civil obligations incurred before degradation or apostasy. So far as the matrimonial bond is concerned, such a view would, we think, be contrary to the spirit of the Hindoo law which regards that bond as absolutely indissoluble (See Mann, Vs. 156-158, IX, 46). This view is in accordance with the case of the Government of Bombay vs. Ganga, (I.L.R., 4 Bombay, 330) and also with those of the Administrator-General of Madras vs. Ananda Shari (I.L.R. 9, Madras, 467) and in re Millard (I.L.R., 10, Madras, 218). It remains now to consider the third contention for the petitioner which raises an important question not altogether free from difficulty. The conviction of the petitioner under section 494 of the Indian Penal Code, can stand only if her second marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the life of her former husband. Now the validity or otherwise of this second marriage, the parties to which are both Mahomedans, must be tested with reference to the Mahomedan law, and as that law does not allow a plurality of husbands, the second marriage would be void or valid according as the first one was or was not subsisting at the time. It was contended for the petitioner that her marriage with her Hindoo husband became dissolved under the Mahomedan law, by her conversion to the Mahomedan religion, and in support of this contention we have been referred to the Hidaya, Book II, chapter V. (Grady's edition of Hamilton's translation, pages 64 and 65) and Baillie's Digest of Mahomedan Law (2nd edition, pages 180 to 181). According to these authorities, when the wife becomes a convert to the Mussulman faith and the husband is an unbeliever, the magistrate is to call upon him to embrace Islam, and if he does so, the woman continues his wife, but if he refuses the magistrate must separate them; and if the wife embraces the Mahomedan faith in a foreign country and the husband is an unbeliever, separation takes place on the expiration of three terms of the wife's courses. These rules may be said to favour conversion to Islam, but the former meets the obvious requirements of justice by allowing an equal freedom of conversion to both parties and giving due notice to the non-converted husband, and is somewhat similar to the provision laid down in Act XXI of 1866 in the case of native converts to Christianity, while the latter rule is justified in the Hidaya upon the express ground of necessity as requiring the other party to embrace the faith as impracticable in a foreign country. The second marriage in this case has taken place without any notice to the former husband. If therefore it could be held that British India was a foreign country within the meaning and intention of the foregoing rules, it would be necessary to take further evidence to ascertain whether the second marriage took place before or after the expiration of three terms of the wife's courses, as the evidence on the record is not sufficient to clear up this point. But we cannot hold that British India is a foreign country within the meaning and intention of the above ruling, so that a Hindoo marriage would here become dissolved by the conversion of the wife to Islam on the expiration of a certain interval without any notice to the husband. There does not exist in the case of persons residing in British India that necessity upon which alone is based the alteration of the two rules referred to above, by which the prior marriage of a convert to Islam is said to become dissolved without any order of a court or notice to the other side. In British India, to use the words of Lord Justice James in Skinner vs. Orde, 14 Moo. I. A., 309. "All or almost all the great religious communities of the world exist side by side under the impartial rule of the British Government, while Brahmans, Buddhists, Christians, Mahomedans, Parsees, and Sikhs are one nation, enjoying equal political rights, and having perfect equality before the tribunals; they co-exist as separate and very distinct communities, having distinct laws affecting every relation of life." The petitioner did not give any notice to her former husband, nor did she seek the intervention of the Courts of Justice as she might have done by instituting a suit after notice to the husband for a declaratory decree that under the Mahomedan law, which was her personal law since her conversion, her former marriage was dissolved, and that she was competent to marry again. That being so, we do not think that the rule of Mahomedan law which declares a convert to Mahomedanism in a foreign country absolved from any prior matrimonial tie upon the expiration of a certain time without notice to his or her spouse can have application here. A sacred and solemn relation like marriage cannot, we think, be regarded as terminated simply by the change of faith of either spouse without notice to the other or the intervention of a court of justice. The questions that arise in this case are, as we have already opined, not free from doubt and difficulty, but after giving our best attention to them the conclusion we arrive at is that the first marriage of the petitioner was not dissolved by reason of her change of faith according to the Hindoo law or the Mahomedan law, and that her second marriage was in consequence void."

ON the 16th, at 8 in the evening, an earthquake lasting six or eight seconds, accompanied by a rumbling noise as of a heavy railway train, was felt at Bangalore—the first after ten years.

HURKISONDAS NAROTAMDAS of Bombay has offered a lac of rupees for a lunatic asylum for females.

THE Governor opened the Madras Fine Arts Exhibition. He attributed the decadence of Indian arts partly to the present demand for cheaper articles from other parts of the world and partly to the absence of encouragement by the Rajas.

IN replying to an address of welcome from the Eurasian Association, Lord Harris advised that community not to rely on Government for service, unless they qualified themselves for competition with other races.

RAJA Uday Partab Singh, of Bhinga, has succeeded Nawab Mahomed Ali Khan in the Viceroy's Council as an Additional Member. He was present in Council yesterday. We hope he will support the Scoble Bill for the amendment of the Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code with an argument worthy of the author of the tranchant and brilliant pamphlets and articles against the Congress and the Radical propaganda.

ALL the Russian Societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals will meet in Congress at St. Petersburg, to discuss the best means of carrying animals on the railway, and of slaughtering them; the best way to prevent the destruction of useful animals; the improvement of the veterinary service; the prevention of the destruction of migratory birds as they cross the Caucasus, and of deer and other animals by means of poison, &c.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Secretary of State has still no peace after directing the appointment of a Factory Commission. The report of the Commission and the legislation which the Government of India mean to adopt are too moderate to satisfy the English manufacturers, and the Ministry is threatened with a fresh campaign. The Under-Secretary of State is being harrassed in the House of Commons, and the Secretary of State was asked to meet a deputation. Lord Cross has, however, been firm, and has refused to receive a deputation.

THE Cabooler fighters in the streets of Burrabazar of November last, have been tried. They were accorded the privilege of Special Jury. The Suleimans had the precedence, for they were tried first, although the Jury to try the Kherootees had been previously empanelled. By direction of the Judge, the Jury found eight of the thirteen Suleimans brought up, not guilty on the three counts of causing grievous hurt, being members of an unlawful assembly, and rioting. The majority of the Jury found the remaining five guilty of the minor offence only. Mr. Justice O'Kinealy deferred passing sentence till he had heard the case against the Kherootees. The Kherootees (seventeen in number) were further charged with committing murder by causing one death. But they were all discharged either by the direction of the Judge or on the verdict of the Jury. The five convicted Suleimans next received their sentence. Addressing them, the Judge said:—

"The jury have convicted you of an offence for which you are liable to three years' rigorous imprisonment. From enquiries I have made, I understand your people are not frequently brought before our courts in this country. Except in certain isolated cases, you as a body behave very well. I, therefore, do not think it necessary to inflict a very severe punishment on you, though, of course, I am bound to punish you so far as will prevent your people from taking the law into their own hands in future. The sentence of this court is that you be rigorously imprisoned for four months."

The accused in either case were the principal witnesses in the trials, and they all deposed in the same strain, throwing all the blame on the opposite party and testifying to their own meekness. The difference in the result of the two trials is evidently due to the difference in temper of the two sets of juries.

THE lengthy proceedings in the Jain Defamation Case in the High Court itself had ceased to attract public attention. The Court and the Jury had however to sit out the termination. After an elaborate address lasting three days, Mr. Justice Pigot left the case to the Jury with the following concluding remarks:—

"Gentlemen, I don't think I need trouble you at any greater length and I will now merely leave the matter in your hands, closing my charge with my thanks to you all for the courteous hearing that you have given me, and with the expression of my conviction that certainly, whatever your verdict may be, it will be an honest one, and of my hope that it will be one which will not encourage the sort of proceeding which has now occupied the attention of the Court for the last six weeks. In my opinion, whether there be an acquittal, or a conviction, or a difference, the business which has occupied the attention of the Court for the last six weeks has been a mere carnival of wanton, foolish, mischievous, and pettifogging litigation."

The Jury returned a unanimous verdict of not guilty against Chutterput Sing. At the instance of the Judge, the Advocate General entered a nolle prosequi against the other prisoners, and they too were acquitted and discharged. The Judge himself has labelled the litigation with words that will live when the perpetrators are gone, and we do not feel called upon at present to do more than simply report that the whole thing cost the neat little sum of £40,000 to £50,000. And this in a poor country like India!

THE cost of maintenance of the Fire-Brigade in Calcutta and the Suburbs, has hitherto been borne almost entirely by the jute interest, the general public making no contribution. This has been the arrangement all along, and, indeed, it was expressly on these terms that the Brigade was established. The Chamber of Commerce, however, have since been dissatisfied with this arrangement and complained to Government of the injustice of burdening one interest alone with the charge of maintaining an institution whose benefits are enjoyed by the public in general. The Government of Bengal are impressed favorably by the Chamber's contention, and they commended it for the consideration of the Municipal Commissioners of Calcutta, Howrah, and the suburban Municipalities. These bodies are by no means disposed to undertake an addition to their already too many financial responsibilities. The Howrah Municipality, however, admit that the jute-pressing industry and owners of warehouses are now too heavily taxed for the maintenance of the Brigade, whereas docks, distilleries, cotton warehouses, roperies, timber yards, coal yards, and dealers in inflammable articles contribute nothing, and they suggest an alteration of the Act so as to embrace these industries. The Calcutta Corporation object to make any contribution, while Mr. Lambert, Commissioner of Police, dissents from the Corporation's view, and recommends that a moiety of the cost should fall upon the several municipalities concerned, being apportioned among them in fair proportions. In view of the great variety and conflict of interests involved in the question, the Lieutenant-Governor has appointed a Committee under the presidency of Sir Henry Harrison, and composed of representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, the Calcutta Municipality and the Port Commissioners, with Mr. Lee, and Mr. Lambert as ex-officio members, for drawing up for the approval of Government a fair and conciliatory scheme of apportionment of taxation for the maintenance of the Brigade.

THE presentation of the Select Committee's report on the Age of Consent Bill was due in Council yesterday. But the Local Government not having sent in their opinions on the Bill, Sir Andrew Scoble took time till next Friday to present the report. The opposition is welcome to attribute the credit of the delay to its open-airing of Wednesday.

WHEN Vambéry visited Samarkand, there was a strong little Hindu community there of men pursuing trade, unmolested and even thriving, as bankers and money-lenders. At this moment, there is but one Hindu household of two brothers and a servant. How this has been brought about, we shall let a recent traveller to the City of Timour tell:—

"I came across an old Hindoo who had been here, as he told me, for forty years. He said, in former days there used to be numbers of Hindoos here, but the Russians had driven them all out except himself, his brother, and their servant. It appears that most of the Hindoos formerly living here were money-lenders at very high rates of interest and that the Russians, finding that they had a demoralising effect upon the inhabitants of the country, without further discussion, cancelled all the debts that these latter had contracted, and expelled the Hindoos from the place. The old man groaned and sighed dreadfully over his losses, and said the Russians were not like the English: such zoolum would never have been allowed in India."

Certainly not. There is no better school for the cultivation of loyalty to British Rule than personal experience of the amenities of indigenous Oriental administration. A residence in Native States for ever so short a time, is sufficient to dispel the illusions of sentimental patriotism, and lead to appreciation of the stern justice and humdrum colourless liberality of the British system.

THE East congratulates Syed Mahmood Khan Bahadur, Deputy Magistrate of Patna, "on his elevation to such an honourable office" as that of second Inspector-General of Registration in Bengal. In expressing its gladness at the appointment, our contemporary informs the public that Syed Mahmood is the great grandson of the well-known Mir Ashruff Ali of Dacca. When the amiable and accomplished Bishop Heber visited East Bengal, Dacca was still a Nawabate. The great ecclesiastic of course visited the Nawab. Mir Ashruff Ali was the only other native at whose house he called. He has left an interesting account of his impressions.

"THROUGH the blessing of the Almighty, the Rajasthan Mirror is born on this sixth day of January, 1891." Such was the opening announcement of a new weekly hailing from Ajmere. There were not wanting evident signs of difficult delivery in this birth. Otherwise, it was a respectable looking, if modest, infant. But it was not fated to live. In a few weeks, it died—from failure of circulation or for want of nourishment, we suppose.

ABOUT a year ago, a great sensation was caused in the Native Press by the publication of an account of an interview which a well-known Bengali pleader, in his capacity of representative of an Association, had with Mr. Henvey, then Agent to the Governor-General for Central India. That account, supplied by the pleader, put the political wholly in the wrong. It attributed to Mr. Henvey the most extraordinary and persistent rudeness to a leading citizen—conduct altogether unbecoming a gentleman and an official. No official notice, we believe, was taken of the matter. Mr. Henvey's administration did not enhance his reputation. Without the brilliancy of his predecessor, he was not altogether free from the vices of his craft. Unable to control his subordinates, he kept the Rajas out of their legitimate dues for the lands and materials granted by them for the construction of the Railway. He was snubbed by Government for his pains, and he was fain to retire with the usual certificate of his eminent services to the state. At last, in the Rajasthan Mirror, comes the explanation of his demeanour and language towards the Baboo. That explanation is that Mr. Henvey was deaf. Like a deaf man, he concealed his weakness and each time that the Baboo mumbled his apology, the great Agent Bahadur was more and more vexed, and actually thought himself defied and insulted. That is an ingenious suggestion, but is it true? Anyhow, that is a contribution to be remembered to the credit of our poor little short-lived brother of Rajputana. Who will after that doubt the value of local journalism? Here is another argument in favour of the Gorakhpur Chronicle.

THE Miranzai Expedition is at an end. The Malik Makmuddin of the Rabiya Khel, who was the prime source of all the late British troubles in the Kohat frontier, having surrendered to the Political Officer accompanying the Field Force received orders for breaking up on the 24th of this month. A part only—the 29th Punjab Infantry—remains till the roads are made and posts built.

THE Ameer is himself again, and attending to business as ever.

LAST week, there was a raid on the Kiwlin post from the Shan State of Wuntho. The engagement was rather stiff, in which the enemy lost eight men and the British garrison four men. It is in contemplation, in consequence, to occupy and disarm Wuntho, and some others possibly into the bargain.

THE prospects of the opium revenue may well cause some anxiety. The present condition of the market was not unanticipated. For, in making the Budget estimate, the revenue from the drug was taken at a modest figure. But there is no hope of this modesty being realised. Just now, the market is dull to a degree. Exports have mostly ceased, the price having gone down very much in China. According to present forecast, there will be a loss of near half a million sterling below the Budget estimate of the year in Opium revenue. From this has to be deducted, of course, a saving of some ten lacs in outlay on the drug.

THE Indian Daily News notices that, while the Hindu papers in town like Hope and the Indian Nation, which have plunged head and ears in the Gobardhan mire, are full of the Scoble Bill, the Behar Herald & Indian Chronicle, hailing from Bankipore, "has not a word in all its 25 columns on the burning question that is agitating Calcutta."

SOME of our contemporaries on the other side of the question are really to be pitied, they have worked themselves into such a state of excitement. The man of Hope and the "manner" of the Indian Nation are so miserable over the Bill, that they cannot wait for their weekly appearance to express themselves on it. This was an old symptom with Mr. Roy of Hope, and there would be little cause for wonder if the present agitation aggravated it. Mr. Ghose of the other concern is altogether a new patient, and his case is of a very acute type. Chafing under some remarks of the Indian Daily News, he resolved to knock some sense into the brains of the stolid Briton. Instead of fighting from his own works and at his own time, he rushed out to meet the enemy in the latter's stronghold. He fought at a manifest disadvantage, but fought valiantly. He returned wounded and bleeding at several points, but still unbroken in wind—a sadder but by no means a wiser man. Again he issued forth on the war path and penetrated the enemy's columns—again to meet with, if possible, a worse fate. In vain our countryman argued, analysing and "analogsing." The dull Briton would not see it. Failing to appreciate the epistolary compliment to which he was treated, he almost treated it as a nuisance. He certainly made a determined effort to abate it. Not content with shooting footnotes at his correspondent, he now opened his broadsides on him.

THE mountain has not been in labour in vain. It has produced its mouse. And a monster mouse it is—a prodigious brute, stone-blind as a mole and obstinate and noisy as a pig.

HERE is a translation of the manifesto of the great Calcutta Opposition of which we hear so much:—

"On the Maidan—Monster meeting at the Race Course—(14th Falgoun), 25th February, Wednesday, at 4 P.M.

Unforeseen, Unprecedented, Unspeakable Congregation of over One Lakh of Men.

Protest, Protest! Don't want the Bill, Don't want the Bill!

Brethren! Great Danger! Ruin is at hand. Government is going to interfere with the religion of the Hindus and Mahomedans through mistake. Religion is being lost. Mothers', sisters' and wives' respect are at stake. Hindu families are on the verge of ruin. We, therefore, assembling in millions to-day on the Maidan, will cry up and explain to Government:—

Our Religion is being lost. Save us!—Save us!

This monster meeting will be held on the great race course on the Maidan. The proper business of the meeting will begin at 5 o'clock, Wednesday afternoon, though masses will begin to accumulate from 2 o'clock. Six speakers will speak in Bengali, Hindi, and in English. Pandit Sasadhar Tarkachuramani, Paribrajak Srikrishna Prosonno, Bhudar Chuttopadhyaya, Pandit Rajkumar Nayaratra, and others will speak out their minds in ringing tones. Rajas, zemindars, vakils, doctors, shopkeepers one and all will meet. Every business is likely to be closed for the day. The Viceroy himself with his Minister will be invited to witness the distress of their subjects. Perhaps the town will be empty of men on Wednesday afternoon. Everyone will join the monster meeting at the Maidan. None has ever witnessed such an unprecedented and unexpected spectacle. The site will be illuminated with electric light in the evening."

It was this impudent call, continually dinned into the ears of the inhabitants, by trumpeters in show-waggons, for days, and by messengers on foot, going from door to door, that the populace assembled, on Wednesday, in the race grounds before Fort William. The speaking there was of a piece.

It is the Bangabasi raj—in Calcutta. That weekly rag for the rabble thus relates an incident of the open-air demonstration: "There was some trouble with a vakil. He spoke indiscreetly—saying perhaps what he did not mean. He was immediately attacked by the surrounding people. He loudly cried out 'Dohai Bangabasi' 'Dohai Bangabasi,' (appealing to the all-puissant name for his safety). The editor of the Hindi Bangabasi, Amrita Lal Chuckerbutty, on hearing this cry, ran to the spot, and repeating the words 'I am of the Bangabasi. Fear not!' entered the crowd. The people coming to see the vakil taken under protection by the Bangabasi men, cleared away. With the help of Baboo Amrita, the vakil Baboo saved himself that day."—Joy, Bangabashi! Bangabashiki Joy!

HERE'S another description of a prominent figure in the crowd in a queer situation:—

"In one place we saw the old, experienced pleader of the High Court, Rai Annadaprasad Banerjee Bahadoor, his face overflowing with joy. Addressing the friends in the neighbourhood, he said 'I shall never see this happy day again. I cannot remain silent on such a day.' While saying so, the hair of his body stood up, he began to shiver, his eyes were full of tears. Then mad with delight, forgetful of all, forgetful of self, in that crowd he began, at the top of his voice, to give vent to his heart."

how it is not stated. And this is the end of Government Pleaders and Roy Bahadoors! Mad and forgetful of everything—religion included—they all were.

ON Monday, at 5-15 P.M., the Viceroy will open the Lady Dufferin Victoria Hospital which will abut on the new Central Road now being constructed, North of Presidency College and Hare School, and at the same time unveil the bust of the Marchioness of Dufferin and Ava. In the evening, Lord Lansdowne starts for Chakardarpore on the Bengal-Nagpore Railway. The next day he opens the line, returning to Calcutta on Wednesday, the 4th March.

WE publish elsewhere the memorial prepared by the Calcutta Committee appointed at the meeting of the 15th February at 12, Wellington Square in support of the Age of Consent Bill. An advertisement in another column invites signatures. Excepting those who still really believe that the raising of the age of consent of girls from 10 to 12 will interfere with a religious practice which they observe—if such there be—all Hindus, Mussulmans, Jains, who are for protecting the immature girlhood of the land, are free to join in a memorial which has been expressly prepared by a mixed body of both sects, for general adoption by all classes. The document is not controversial and keeps clear of all objection, except that of the obstinate Garbhádhánists.

THE DEMONSTRATION—OF IGNORANCE.

IN the present temper of people in Calcutta, it is impossible for us to speak on the Bill, which has been the occasion of a spurious agitation, without being misunderstood and our motives attacked. But, nevertheless, we must say that no opposition could be more unfortunate than that raging at the present moment. It reveals the unreality of our boasted advancement. It lowers us in the estimation of the world. The opposition is simply a reproach to our religion, our education, nay, our very common sense and decency. Not that there might not be legitimate grounds of opposition to the Bill. Legislation is by no means a desirable instrument of social reform. The evil against which this legislation is directed, is disappearing by degrees and might be left to a natural death. Such arguments may be honourably adduced against the measure. But the cry of "Religion in danger" is mere moonshine. The Garbhádhánists have taken up a position, in which they can expect no support from other parts of India, nor even from nearer provinces like Behar and Orissa. Against a pan-Indian enactment, they are opposing, at best, a provincial custom. But this custom, whatever its religious force even in the province of Bengal, is falling into desuetude as it deserves to fall. It rests on the authority of Raghunandan—an authority which is crumbling day by day. The modern school of Bengal have already made a departure from Raghunandan in notable respects. We will give one example. A few years before, no Bengal Pandit would venture to grant permission for the performance of the funeral ceremonies of a felo de se, simply because there was no sanction for it in Raghunandan, although the older jurists had provided for it on condition of certain preliminary expiatory ceremonies being gone through. So great was the respect for Raghunandan's authority in Bengal, that the more ancient provisions remained as a dead letter, so that, until of late, even Rajahs and wealthy zemindars failed to induce the Pandits of Bengal to sanction the performance of the funeral rites of a relative who had killed himself. This was no small humiliation to the survivors—no small social infamy—all the more painful from the high social position of the family in which such an event occurred. But what is the case now? Raghunandan's authority has been discarded in favor of old law, and hardly any felo de se goes now without receiving his last funeral rites. We commend the moral of this to the more candid among the Garbhádhanists and their adherents. But the agitators wanted a good cry, and nothing better could serve their turn than a religious cry with which to work upon the passions of a people so sensitive on religion. Nothing, however, could be more unjust than their imputations upon the Government after the Viceroy's elaborate explanation of the position of the Government with respect to questions of religion. His speech on the introduction of the Bill was one long argument with the influential Reform Party in England, showing how the Government of India were precluded, by their pledge of religious neutrality as well as by inherent or practical difficulties involved in the problems, from undertaking any one of the reforms which had been so earnestly pressed upon their acceptance. No thoroughgoing orthodox Hindu or Mahomedan but would be delighted with the Viceroy's clear and straightforward adherence to the policy of religious non-interference. If nevertheless his Government undertook the present measure, it was from a belief, "as at present advised," that it involved no interference with religion. After this, to fall foul of such a tolerant Government, in the passionate way the agitators are doing, is simply marvellous.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Rheumatism and Gout.—These purifying and soothing remedies deserve the earnest attention of all persons liable to gout, sciatica, or other painful affections of the muscles, nerves, or joints. The Ointment should be applied after the affected parts have been patiently fomented with warm water, when the ointment should be diligently rubbed upon the adjacent skin, unless the friction causes pain. Holloway's Pills should be simultaneously taken to diminish pain, reduce inflammation, and purify the blood. This treatment abates the violence, and lessens the frequency of gout, rheumatism, and all spasmodic diseases which spring from hereditary predisposition, or from any accidental weakness of constitution. The Ointment checks the local malady, while the Pills restore vital power.

The Garbhádhanists are exulting over their late demonstration on the maidan. It was numerically a great gathering, the number being variously estimated, but the significance of numbers, such as it is, is minimised by the questionable devices by which the crowd's were drawn. Admitting, however, the fullest success that may be claimed for the mass meeting, the greater is the pity of it. The demonstration is not one of which we may be proud. It shows that there are some ingenious and desperate men among us who are ready to go to any lengths. It certainly shows in no enviable light the character of our so-called leading men, whoever they may be, that lent themselves to such a thing. Let them rave who like about the prodigy of brute numbers wheedled by false pretences. As a respectable movement the meeting was an abortion. A meeting meant to impress the Government called by no recognised individual or Association, indeed upon an anonymous summons—from which the more prominent citizens kept away—which was addressed by no recognised public man! The number itself would indeed have been impressive, but how was it swelled? The town was for days disturbed by noisy trumpets calling the people to the maidan, to save their religion and the honor of their mothers and sisters and daughters from the attack of a reckless gang of legislators, by representing before the Governor-General—who would be there—the enormity of the Bill. And the people—that is such part of them as could swallow the bait—responded to the call—all honour to them for their respect for their religion and their regard for the honour of their women! We ourselves went through a busy part of the city to the maidan, and had a fine opportunity of observing how the bulk of the gathering was made up of schoolboys and the ignorant classes who were drawn to see the Viceroy and share the Tamasha that was sure to be provided for His Excellency. There were not more than half a dozen Mussalmans and not a single Ooriya. There were many Marwaris who went in their gala dresses, lustily maunching betel leaf, as to a Ram Leela. Of men who know the object of the demonstration—of men who understand the modus operandi of legislation—of men who had seen the Bill, there was scarcely a trace. In such a great crowd, there were doubtless many serious minded men who were led to the grounds from conviction. But what is the value of that conviction? The only reality about the demonstration was a feeling of terror that had possessed the popular mind that the law would be an engine of tyranny, attacking the peace and privacy of the native household. We have talked with even respectable and educated men, and they are also possessed by an abnormal fear. That such a feeling has been generated in the public mind is undeniable, and it is this feeling which drew the more respectable portion of the gathering. This feeling owes its origin to a settled distrust of Government, which it has been the business of some agitators to spread among our people. It is, however, an idle fear. The law will be seldom called into requisition, and its importance lies chiefly in its educative influence. The popular suspicion of the Government is quite groundless and undeserved. The Government mean well for them, and it is peculiarly hard they should receive opposition when they deserved grateful support and cordial sympathy.

RECENT THERAPEUTIC DEVELOPMENTS.

WHEN the triumph of Dr. Koch's discovery of a certain cure for consumption was at its height, and the whole civilized world rang with his praises, Reis & Rayyet almost alone refused to swell the chorus of applause before the promised results were achieved. We were old enough to remember several oracles flourish and decay, and our reading had furnished countless instances of exploded certainties in medicine. What wonder that that cure would be anything better than a nine days' wonder? It was at least prudent to wait. We did not wait long before rumours of an adverse character invaded our ears. Another startling scientific discovery has attacked and discredited the Koch discovery. The new prophet is Dr. Liebmann. It appears that Koch's treatment, whether it can cure consumption or not, aggravates it. Dr. Liebmann announces in a Berlin medical journal that inoculation with Koch's lymph generates in the blood tubercle bacilli. Such bacilli do not otherwise occur in the blood of consumptives. But two or three injections of Koch's lymph fluid is sufficient to cause these living germs in the blood.

We now find that Koch's discovery did not altogether escape criticism at home. In the first place, its originality was, if not roundly questioned, detracted from, considerably. The discovery was fully expected in the precise direction in which it has occurred. Then the great pathologist Virchow found fresh tubercles developing in different parts of the bodies of dead consumptives who had undergone the lymph treatment. The power, for good or evil, of the lymph is admitted. According to the great pathologist, it creates such a disturbance in the tissues, that they throw out the bacilli into the blood to circulate in all parts of the body and produce new tubercles. It is reassuring to learn that these nasty living punctuating pests are not so formidable after all. They do not take root in every soil, and they are usually eliminated with ease. Thus, anthrax introduced into a rabbit's circulation do not stay more than some minutes. If they are usually found in numbers in the spleen, that is because that dull organ is a sort of sieve or a sponge which receives all the impurities of the circulation. Luckily, the spleen is provided with cells—phagocytes—which elbow out the bacilli, not without a hard struggle. It seems established that the phagocytes of the rabbits always get the better of the anthrax bacilli. The latter secrete a poison which threatens paralysis to the former, but the phagocytes are roused to energy and overpower and crush the enemy and eat them up. By analogy, the phagocytes in man ought to be equally efficient against each and sundry of the bacilli kind. The experiments held do not discourage such a hope. But it is feared that enfeebled constitutions might not survive the war between the minute belligerents. In justice to the great discoverer, it must be remembered that Koch himself does not claim for his lymph the virtue of curing advanced cases. Herein at any rate, the experiments confirm him. We only hope all this ado may result in giving mankind a true remedy against tubercular consumption.

The French faculty too are busy. For some years, two medical men of Nantes have been conjointly conducting their enquires, and they have hit upon an original treatment. It is infusion of the blood of goats. Dr. Bertin and Dr. Picq, the investigators in question, have at length emerged from provincial obscurity into the light of the metropolis. They lately gave a demonstration of their method before the doctors of Paris. They proceed on the fact that certain animals are exempt from certain diseases. Thus, rats are above the reach of diphtheria, and rabbits beyond the attack of tetanus. So goats are under no liability to tubercular disease. Not only are these diseases unknown respectively among these classes of animals, but all attempts to give them these diseases have failed. They would not take the taint. There surely must be some property in the blood to resist the encroachments of the particular ailment. Acting upon this hint, these doctors concluded that, if the blood of goats could be introduced into the human organism suffering from tuberculosis, the disease would be eliminated. Accordingly, they experimented by transfusion of the blood of goats, and appear to have met with success so far as to embolden them to come forward before the Parisian faculty.

THE AGE OF CONSENT.

WITH NOTES BY DR. J. N. BHATTACHARJEE.

SIR,—I propose to be very brief this time.

I am not at all inclined to grudge the Rishis the assistance of Counsel at their present trial. But I find it impossible to shut my eyes to the fact that, if the Rishis are on trial, the country is threatened with a most mischievously inquisitorial piece of criminal legislation, on the strength of a foregone conclusion of its guilt, without so much as giving it the benefit of a trial. It is a libel (1) on the country to assume that the evil which the legislature seeks to put down exists at all.

Your first note to my last letter raises a very difficult question, (2) namely, what are the sources to which a Hindu in general and a Bengali Hindu in particular is to look for his law? I await your answer.

With all deference to you, I beg to be permitted to demur to your proposition that Hindu commentators never pry into reasons. I agree with you so far that they seldom avow the fact, but the interpretations they put on religious texts are tinged all the same by what they consider to be the reasons for the rules embodied in them. We have seen that, in his Jyotish Tatwa, (3) Raghunandan lays down that the lowest age at which a girl is capable of bearing healthy children, is 16, and again in his Smriti he makes out that marriage is to be consummated on the first occurrence of a certain event in the girl, which admittedly may take place when the girl is no older than 11. But does he say anything in his Smriti to discountenance such early consummation? If not, why? I think, there can be but one answer. He must have thought—I do not say that the early Rishis thought—that the object of Garbhudhan was not to beget healthy children but any children. If he thought so, his opinion must have been induced by some such considerations as I suggested under the third issue in my first letter. The opinions of other commentators may—indeed, must—have been similarly influenced by what they conceived to be the reasons for the particular rules interpreted by them.

I note that you have, by one of your notes to my last letter, conceded that the desirability of the perpetuation of lineage is one of the reasons that prompted the declaration by the Rishis of a son being the source of greater spiritual bliss than a daughter. But why is perpetuation of lineage held to be fruitful of spiritual bliss? Is perpetuation of lineage a thing to be desired for its own sake? Is a desire to perpetuate one's self by leaving behind him children the outcome of a natural craving of the human heart? Speaking from actual experience, I venture to assert that it is not (4). I know of many persons who view the prospect of being blessed (as it is thought by some) with children with actual horror. Why then this stress on the importance of perpetuation of lineage, (5) specially male lineage? When the early Rishis legislated, we were but a handful of men surrounded by an overpowering host of unfriendly aliens, the auras. Property, person and life were utterly insecure. Every family therefore required a protector capable of successfully fighting the auras, if necessary. Every family also required a bread-winner, and bread had to be won then by hard manual labour, by "delving and spinning" probably. Society (of course, Arya society) required any number of fighting men (6) capable of wearing arms and success-

(1) So the cat is out of the bag at last!

If the Age of Consent Bill, now on the legislative anvil, is a libel on our countrymen, the doctrine of the Garbhudhanists is much more so—it is a libel both on them and the Rishis whom they profess to follow. They do not deny the existence of the evil which the legislature seeks to put down by the Bill. On the contrary, they admit all the allegations of fact relied upon by their opponents, but claim the privilege of being exempted from punishment by throwing the entire blame on the ancient Sages, who are accepted by us as our guides. We cannot possibly help those who are determined to be convicted on their own admission. But as our Lawgivers cannot be expected to come back again to this world in order to explain their doctrines, we, as their humble followers, consider it our sacred duty to show that they were not devoid of humanity and common sense like the Garbhudhan agitators, and that, as a matter of fact, they never enjoined or sanctioned the act of impregnation on child-wives of eight or nine years. —ED. R. & R.

(2) It is an extensive question, and we do not think that we have anything to say on the subject which is not known to our correspondent. —ED. R. & R.

(3) The text of Bhujā Bala Bhūma cited by Raghunandan in his Jyotish Tatwa, is taken by him in a very different sense from that attributed to it by our correspondent. The context shows that the founder of the Bengal school meant to treat it as a pratiprasāha or a rule for meeting exceptional cases. The plain meaning of the text may support the view that impregnation is not proper before the wife has attained her sixteenth year. But Raghunandan takes it in a different sense, and there is no such conflict in his Digests as our correspondent has attempted to explain by his theory.

(4) Our belief is that there is such a natural craving, and our Rishis stimulated that craving in order (1) to induce men to marry in regular form (2) to make them live as peaceful and industrious citizens (3) to safeguard the proper care of children (4) to make illegitimacy as rare as possible (5) to render it possible for the priestly class to marry and beget children without losing their sanctity.

(5) Because it was the only handle by which our legislators could work upon the sentiments of their followers. —ED. R. & R.

(6) This is rather an argument in favor of the position that sickly children were not wanted. —ED. R. & R.

fully protecting it from oppression by its enemies, the asuras, who were numerically considerably superior to it and who were by no means slack in coming down upon it as frequently as they could possibly manage. In such circumstances, every man who contributed a male member to society contributed to its efficiency and vitality, and thus earned its gratitude and reward in the shape of spiritual bliss.

Just another word about the spiritual merits of having a son. It is not simply for the sake of one's own spiritual benefit that a son is important. Every man owes his pitṛloka (7) a son, and so long as he does not present them with one, his debt is not discharged. (Manu, ch. IX, v. 106). A man may, indeed, ascend to heaven by avoiding sensuality and without leaving any issue in his family under v. 160, Manu, ch. V., but he must be put down as a selfish man who, while he compasses his own ascension to heaven, fails to pay the just debt he owes his pitṛloka of the (shall I say?) sum of a son.

Verses 159 to 161 of Manu, ch. V., to which I have been referred, talk of the duties of the widow to the memory of her departed lord and not of the duties of the wife to her husband. That fact alone appears to me to take away a great deal from the force of the argument based on them. The Verses, read with those on the reciprocal duties of husband and wife during coverture, appear to be intended to apply to such unfortunate widows alone as have not borne children, not owing to any remissness on the part of themselves or their husbands during coverture, but owing to unavoidable circumstances, such as the barrenness of themselves or their husbands, the supervention of their widowhood before they were capable of bearing children, and such like. One, who has not had opportunity given him or her of discharging a given duty, cannot be held guilty of omission to do that duty. But the case of one who, having had opportunity, neglects to avail himself of it, stands on an altogether different footing.

Then again, though a childless widow in the circumstances contemplated by Vyavasthas 159 to 161 may demand admittance to heaven under those provisions of Manu, what is the poor girl, who departs this world, during coverture, after having arrived at the child-bearing age (8) and yet without having any issue, to say to the cruel inexorable gate-keepers of heaven when they refuse to open the portals at her bidding? I do not find any provision in Manu that will let her into heaven. In fact, woman stands on a very different footing from man and for good reasons too.

Then again, the language of Verse 159 shews that it is a statement of a fact, while that of the following shews that it is only an inference based on the fact adverted to in the foregoing Vyavastha. One thing is clear from the difference in the wording of the two Vyavasthas. It is—that, though many thousands of Brahmans had before the time of Manu ascended to heaven by dint of their abstinence from sensuality, no individual of the womankind had up to then done so. I am, however, quite willing to take Manu's word for it that a childless woman too will ascend to heaven by devoting herself to pious austerities during widowhood. But if she

(7) The Rishis did all they could to stimulate the craving for an Aurasa son. In order to make assurance doubly sure, they declared that such a son was a source of spiritual bliss in several different ways. With regard to the texts in which it is declared that the father, grandfather, brother and mother of marriageable girls suffered endless torments in hell by not giving them in marriage at the proper time, the only rational explanation seems to us to be that the object of the Rishis was to enforce the marriage of girls at a very early age. The most orthodox follower of our Shasters will not, we fear, be prepared to maintain that our Lawgivers started with any a priori belief about the spiritual necessity of the early marriage of girls. It seems to us much more reasonable to suppose that they were swayed by more practical considerations, namely,

(1) The necessity of abolishing the Gandharvya form of marriage, by which innocent maidens ran the risk of being ruined for ever.

(2) The making of Kanina and Sahodraja sons as rare as possible. The Rishis nowhere say that these were the considerations which led them to enjoin the early marriage of girls. They have only laid down that great sin is incurred by allowing a girl to remain unmarried after her attaining puberty. Similarly, they have expatiated on the spiritual advantages of having a son. But the considerations which influenced them in their legislation were obviously very different. One has only to read their Codes carefully, in order to be able to make out under what circumstances they legislated, and how they achieved the objects which they had in view.

(8) The question is, What is the child-bearing age? It cannot be the fault of a girl-wife if she die at the age of twelve, without leaving any progeny.

chooses to practise pious austerities during coverture, (9) she does so at her own risk and must take the consequences, I presume.

I am going to clinch the foregoing argument (over which I confess to having laughed at myself, though I am convinced that it is a good enough argument in all conscience,) with an apt quotation from Manu. Vide Vyavastha 4, ch. IX., which lays down that a husband, who, during his wife's ritu, does not have intercourse with her is blameworthy. Now, there is no corresponding provision in all Manu that a wife, by denying herself to her husband during her ritu, becomes blameworthy (10). This state of things clearly indicates that intercourse during ritu and, therefore, begetting children are necessary more for the sake of the wife than for that of the husband, for he is free to take another wife if he likes.

I can fortify my position still further by another quotation from Manu. Vide Vs. 147 to 149, ch. V., which lay down that a woman can never and shall never be permitted to get on without a protector. When old, she is directed to be under the guardianship of her son. (11)

Let alone guardianship, what is she to do for a living?

I referred in my first letter to the necessity to women of offspring in order to qualify them for inheritance. I wish just to elaborate the argument a little and shew how far-reaching may be the consequence of failure to consummate marriage with and impregnate a young wife at the very earliest opportunity. To take an instance. A girl is married to a rich man's son. She is likewise the only child of a rich father. She menstruates at the age of 11. Her husband cannot consummate marriage with her by reason of the proposed law. He dies before the girl is quite 12. His father dies soon after. The girl's father too dies. The husband's father's property, let us suppose, passes to the husband's brothers, and the girl's father's to a distant uncle of the girl. What will be the result? You will have to strain the law a great deal before you can fix on the girl's husband's brothers the legal obligation even to give the poor girl bare maintenance. (12) Do you not then cause a very serious hardship to the girl by depriving her of the chance she otherwise had of inheriting a princely (?) fortune, the opportunity she might have of benefiting humanity with it and the consolation she could have derived from the possession of a son? A HINDU.

(9) We have nowhere said that a married woman can attain heaven by practising the austerities which are prescribed for widows only. Whatever our views may be as to the rationale of the doctrine, we cannot but admit that a son is necessary, according to our Shasters, for spiritual purposes. But the rule is not so very hard and fast as "A Hindu" seems to imagine. Our opinion is that the begetting of a child is not obligatory, where it is impossible or very likely to be attended with danger. And, in order to prove this, we cited verses 159-61, of Manu's Code, chap. V, and also some passages from the Mitakshera. We never meant to say that the begetting of a child was not desirable where there was no apprehension of any untoward result.

(10) There is no such express text in Manu's Code. But there is a text of Gautama, and the rule may be inferred also from those texts in Manu wherein it is laid down that it is the duty of the wife to comply with the wishes of her husband in all matters. It is also to be observed that, according to the view which our jurists take, the husband alone is the author of the act of Garbhadhan or impregnation, the wife being only the subject or passive element in the act. The shastric rule on the subject applies to the husband who is the possible author of the act, and not to the wife whose duty is only to be obedient to her husband.

(11) "A Hindu" here seems to suppose that there is no provision in our codes for the guardianship of childless widows. If that is his idea, we have only to refer him to the following texts which he will find cited in the Dayabhaga.

Mrite bhṛtaryaputrayah pati paksha prabhu smritah
Viniyogartharakhshashu bhurane cha sha Isvara
Parikshine patikule nirmanusye nisraye
Tatsapindeshu chasatsku piti paksha prabhu smritah.

From these texts it appears that "on the death of the husband his relatives are the guardians of his childless widow. They are the persons who have the right of managing her property and are also bound to maintain her. If there be none belonging to her husband's family to take care of her, her father's relatives are entitled to be her guardians. The reasoning of "A Hindu" would justify remarriage and even Niyoga.

(12) The Mitakshera doctrine of survivorship operates very harshly on all daughters, and the Dayabhaga law is similarly harsh to widowed and sonless daughters and daughters-in-law. But there is no reason whatever to suppose that these considerations led the ancient Rishis to lay down that the earliest opportunity should be taken by all females to have themselves impregnated.

THE MEMORIAL PREPARED BY THE CALCUTTA COMMITTEE IN SUPPORT OF THE AGE OF CONSENT BILL.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY-CHARLES-KEITH, PETTY-FITZ-MAURICE, MARQUIS OF LANSDOWNE, G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., G.C.M.G.,
Viceroy and Governor-General of India, &c.

The Memorial of the Undersigned, mostly Hindoos and Mahomedans, of Calcutta and the Provinces of Bengal and Behar,

SHEWETH---

That Your Memorialists, native Indian subjects of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress, occupying different positions and pursuing several professions and callings, as landlords, priests, lawyers, medical men, architects, engineers, merchants, traders, manufacturers, public and private servants and otherwise, but all respectable members of their respective communities, whether Hindoo or Mahomedan, Jain or Parsee, beg leave, in the general weal, to approach Your Excellency with the loyal offering of their humble but hearty gratification at the proposal of Your Government now before Your Excellency's Council for making Laws and Regulations, for raising what is technically called the Age of Consent.

The Government of India has always been distinguished for its broad statesmanship. Placed by Divine Providence at the head of a great Empire, composed of many kingdoms and of a vast population of many and various elements, ethnic, religious, historic and social, it has, while strictly maintaining the balance between the different races and creeds and communities, indulged them all in the fullest enjoyment of their respective Personal Law and social usages, Beliefs and Prescriptions. In the humble judgment of Your Memorialists, that humane indifferentism is the source of the success of Government.

It is the British uprightness of purpose that is the bottom of British Power. In that uprightness, the British recognised the right of the people to live as they listed. And the people could not but appreciate the blessing of being unmolested. Thus the masterly inactivity of the rulers quietly gained on the hearts of the people. It was not so much by doing as by abstaining that a proud sensitive race could be reassured. It was moderation that subdued them. The Government lived, because it let live.

Your Memorialists cannot but remember how other European nations, who preceded the British and acquired political power in India, compromised their chances of Empire by abusing their opportunities. They overdid their part. Not content with governing, they would change the manners of their subjects and even save their souls--with the result we all know.

Not so the British. They commenced and have continued in cordial toleration. At the beginning, they proclaimed the policy of Religious Neutrality, and under many vicissitudes, in spite of every pressure, they have persevered in it. This is by no means so easy. Considering how the entire life of the East is guided by the Creeds and Scriptures of its various races, the foreign law-maker is continually in danger of unwittingly giving offence, while earnest-minded rulers are tempted to brush away all petty punctilios and all absurd loves and horrors that may stand in the path of useful reform or necessary rectification. It has taxed the patience of the Indian Government to the utmost to leave the people in the complete enjoyment of all their varied doctrines and laws and usages. British statesmen have calmly, with imperturbable indifference, seen improvement after improvement stopped, and project after project abandoned, rather than outrage the people in their notions. In letting live, they have had to let ill alone.

There are exceptions to all rules, and there have been in this: But not a single one, it may boldly be affirmed, in malice. There have been, as must now be admitted, unavoidable exceptions. Whatever their fathers may have said, Your Memorialists in general, at this time of day, are free to admit that it is scarcely possible, in the nature of things, that any civilized state can be conducted, with profit to all concerned, on the fixed determination to maintain intact, to the letter, all and every possible doctrine of books composed many centuries ago, taken on the narrowest interpretation. There is always, therefore, a mental reservation understood, and it is only when the demands of absolute decency or of protection to life have been urgent, that the Government has seemed to depart from the pledge. Thus was the burning--for their good--of widows with the bodies of their husbands--possibly of many poor ladies with one corpse--abolished. Thus was the throwing of children into the sea in the name of religion, prohibited. Thus was female infanticide in the name of Hindu chivalry, stopped. Thus was the laying siege of households by Brahman duns, suppressed. Thus were fiery ordeals, which may still be found in Native States, shunted out of British India. Thus were the horrid practices of the religious order of Agorees, whipped out of the haunts of men. Thus has the swinging aloft in the air of poor fellows with wounded and tortured backs in the name of religious heroism, been done away with. Not even the cheap show of mercenary wretches piercing their own bodies and very tongues with knives and forks, is permitted to shock the sensibilities of British subjects. Yet it was not a little difficult to uproot these shameful evils. There was an outcry in the name of orthodoxy when each of these abuses was attacked. Where is the orthodoxy that would revive them? Where is the Hindu that does not bless the British Government for rooting them out?

All the same, the Government of India has, in a rational spirit but with fullest loyalty, always kept its pledge. Your Memorialists can not honestly affirm that it has, at this late hour, when principles of fairness and toleration have become the common possession of mankind, and when respect for popular prejudices is the order everywhere, departed from it.

The Project of Law now before your Excellency's Honourable Council, is but a necessary amendment of existing legislation approved by the experience of thirty years, while the amendment is of so slight and obvious a kind and involves so small a concession to satisfy a grave reproach, that one cannot help being amazed at the prodigious controversy that has been excited.

That agitation, for numbers at least, if not for argument, specially in some Bengal Districts, may well make Government pause. Apart as the European and native communities live in India, the Government labours under a disadvantage, and, in the absence of accurate information, Your Excellency and Your Honourable European colleagues and advisers may easily mistake the character and exaggerate the importance of the outside opposition.

The candour itself of Government may lead to such a conclusion. The very constitution of the legislature--the absence in it of any popular element to speak of--may, while aggravating the painful sense of responsibility of the legislators, dispose the instinct of fair play of British character to give the opposition more than due significance. Your Memorialists are only concerned that a good measure may not be sacrificed to a misimpression.

Your Memorialists are anxious to assure Your Excellency that, although a great many people, specially in the metropolitan Districts of Bengal, have been alarmed by an alternative or a cumulative cry of Religion and the Honour of woman in danger, the majority of the inhabitants of the Empire are not all uneasy, are at least indifferent, while there are not a few, men and women, who like themselves are deliberately in favour of legislation to protect the dumb infant girlhood of the land from brutality and violence of the worst type.

In presuming to appear before Your Excellency with this expression of their humble sentiments on the question of the hour, Your Memorialists are willing to allow that the Bill may admit of improvement. They or many of them think that, without sacrificing the main object, something may be done to safeguard the liberties and peace of the subjects, if only to remove a not unnatural suspicion of the executive agents of administration. In that view only, they would beg to throw at the feet of the Throne the following suggestions, to wit--

- (1) That no Magistrate shall take cognisance of any case under the proposed law, where the alleged offender is the husband of the girl, except under cl. (a) Sec. 191, C.P.C., and that no such complaint shall be entertained unless the complainant deposes to relevant facts from personal knowledge.
- (2) That in such cases Magistrates shall not be competent to direct an investigation either by the Police or by any other person under section 202, C.P.C.
- (3) That in such cases, where the age of the girl is above 10 and below 12 years, the maximum punishment should not be the same as in the ordinary offence of rape.

Lastly, Your Memorialists would respectfully suggest to Your Excellency's Government that it might be authoritatively made known to the entire magistracy of the Empire, that in no instance should the new law be set in motion unless a strong prima facie case has been made out.

It does not become your Memorialists even to seem to impose any duty on the exalted Representative of Majesty itself, but, in view of the peculiarity of the subject and the peculiarity of the situation, they venture to think that all reasonable fears would be removed and most nervous suspicions appeased, if, following upon the assurance given in your great speech in Council--a speech of the highest as well as most generous statesmanship--Your Excellency gave suitable warning to the Local Governments and undertook yourself to watch the operation of the new Law.

THE JAIN DEFAMATION CASE.

THE JUDGE'S CHARGE TO THE JURY.

Mr. Justice Pigot continued his summing up (this morning Feb. 17) He had (yesterday) closed what he had to say on the subject of a portion of the first charge. He had addressed himself to that subject in the first instance, because he desired, before referring to the subject-matter of the other charges, to reach some firm foothold on the facts which at that stage of the case, and under the circumstances, it was desirable to do at once. If the jury thought it would assist them in considering the case, his lordship proposed to refer shortly to the different charges now, and would proceed, after referring to the terms of the first, second, and third charges, to deal with evidence relating to what took place in London, which was chiefly concerned in the second and third charges, and which furnished a guide for their determination of the second question raised yesterday. Perhaps, it would be convenient to deal with the first three charges before continuing to refer to the evidence; but his lordship did not propose to express to the jury his view of the mode in which they ought to deal with all six charges together, until he had gone further into the evidence, because he thought it necessary in a case which had taken so long a time to have the mass of facts re-called to their memory, and the meaning of the charges as discussed placed distinctly before them. His lordship read to the jury the terms of the first charge. It was unfortunate, perhaps, that there was no system in this country like that under Lord Campbell's Act at home of pleading to such charges, but the answer to them would probably be, had there been a pleading, as follows:—"Summarising the first charge, the title of the pamphlet, relating to excommunication, &c.," It was said that the use of the expression was defamatory. That was for the jury to decide. Mr. Phillips, in his address, said that excommunication might mean being put out of caste for misconduct. That is not a meaning which his lordship would attribute to it, having regard to the contents of the pamphlet. The term excommunication had another meaning which his lordship would suggest to the jury they would not consider defamatory at all. It might be that the meaning of the pamphlet was this, as the title stated that it was only a statement of the rules passed in the caste, prohibiting persons of the Jain religion going to Europe. No doubt they attempted, desired, and succeeded to some extent in laying them down as caste rules. It might also be said that the title of the book related to the excommunication of the young men as lately raised in the caste. It would be for the jury to judge which of the meanings should be attached to it. Another consideration in regard to the meaning of the term is this, that whatever was the character of the act of the persons, whoever they were, who published the document, it was perfectly clear that they had no intention of mincing their words. That was a consideration which arose from a perusal of the document. What they wanted to say, and let people know was in their minds, they certainly did not conceal their intention in what they said regarding excommunication. If they (the jury) were of opinion that the title of the book meant that the matter referred to the excommunication of the young men from their caste, then the title was not defamatory. It was a well-known fact that the young men were to be excommunicated preliminary to the statement of opinion of the gentlemen who composed the document. Then the telegram imputing that at the hotel and on board of the steamer they had partaken of food contrary to the rules of the caste, was the next innuendo. The case for the defence was that it was true that they did go, and that they were prepared to prove it, and even if they failed from one difficulty or another to prove this, those who published the document had reasonable grounds to believe they had done so. The imputation follows that thereby he had rendered himself liable to excommunication, and that constituted a complete defence. A further innuendo followed that any member of the community who ate and drank with him would be excommunicated. The defendants say that that was perfectly true. The community had done so by the resolution of the meeting of the 10th Aughran, and had acted on it, and there was a complete unanimity of the caste on this question. Two points of fact arose out of this charge—one as to eating in the hotel in Bombay which had not yet been dealt with: the other as to eating on board the steamer which had been dealt with the previous day. Then, as to the second charge of falsely imputing that prosecutor had put up at an hotel and eaten food prohibited by the Jains, it is urged by the defence that the prosecutor had declared his intention to do so. It was perfectly immaterial whether he had said so or not, and it did not matter a straw whether he had done so. Even if the defendant was unable to bring evidence to support the allegation that the prosecutor had put up in an hotel in Bombay, under the circumstances the defendant had reasonable grounds for believing that he (prosecutor) had done so, and he had a right to criticise and condemn it for the public good—that is, the good of the caste as a whole. Then, as to the third charge of defamation by reproducing the final orders of the resolution of the punchayet in Calcutta, it was quite true that the meeting did pass that resolution, and the pamphlet correctly set out the resolution. The defamation, if any, would be in the statement that the resolution had been come to by the Sree Singh, or the whole of the Jain community in Calcutta. What was the effect of the whole transaction? Chatterput would say that the Calcutta community—except a certain following of the powerful family of Boodh Singh—indignant at the proceedings at the Moorsheadabad punchayet in which, in their view, a farce had been enacted, owing to the influence of the wealth and considerable astuteness and ingenuity of the principal members—indignant that a polluted society was sought to be forced on them as a result of family influence, would not have anything to do with them, and they were under certain difficulties because hampered by a small knot of devoted adherents of the family. After a long discussion at Ram Mohun Mullick's and at the meeting of the 10th Aughran, they passed a resolution, which had since been practically accepted, not only by the Calcutta community, but by several influential members of the Jain community upcountry, whose signatures have been attached to exhibit B., many of them quite recently, and in perfect good faith, which was not well rewarded in the observations made by the prosecution in reply. The view suggested by the resolution of the meeting of the 10th Aughran was that whether it did or did not act upon notice to the complainant, or whether it did or did not contain the opinions of the majority of the caste, it remains that whereas in the previous year the sacred feast of the Jains was not held, it was held last year. As to the question whether there was defamation in the use of the words "entire community," or that the resolution was put forward as of the whole community, it did appear from the subsequent action of the community that the resolution was decided, and afterwards accepted, by the entire community. His lordship believed that this was the case, and he instructed the jury that it was for the good of the caste that it should be published. His lordship dealt similarly with the rest of the charges, and then proceeded to read and comment upon the evidence of the witnesses who spoke to what took place in London. The question—a crucial one which arose on these points as to the acts of Indur Chand Nahatta—was, they had a mass of evidence, partly relating to the ship and partly relating to London, on which it was absolutely impossible in any way to reconcile his testimony both as to the kerosine stove, and as to the eating of cooked food at the same table with Europeans, eating beef and mutton, and as to the eating in London, and the determination of the controversy between all the witnesses on the one hand and this young man on the other was a matter for the jury. But his lordship felt that he was entitled to tell them what he thought. He was clearly of opinion that the witnesses spoke the truth in regard to most of the incidents in London, but with regard to the matter of eating eggs he felt bound to say he had been unable to come to any satisfactory opinion himself as to whether on this point there had been any definite recollection. His lordship went on to deal with the evidence relating to the return of the young men to Moorsheadabad, and the various punchayets and meetings of the boatmen with regard to their admission into caste. He put it to the jury to say if the defence had sufficiently established their case with regard to the manjees. If that was so, two questions would arise with regard to the third charge. Suppose the defence were unable to establish the accuracy of what was said in the pamphlet about the Bengalees, could the jury say that the matter contained in the charge was a defamatory statement within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code? The meaning, looked at broadly and fairly, was that, in consequence of the acts of Indur Chand Nahatta and his cousin, their ancient and proud caste was so disgraced in those regions that even the boatmen would not eat sweetmeats from them, and even the Bengalees had expressed an unfavourable opinion. Hearing that the action of the manjees was being followed by the Bengalees, had they not fair and reasonable grounds for believing that, on the information they had received, they had done so? The second point was as to what was the jury's view of the evidence as to the resolution come to by the Bengalees? Evidence on this subject was read and commented on. The third charge related to the publication of the resolution of the 10th Aughran. His lordship thought he need not trouble the jury much with regard to the evidence on that matter. It was very voluminous, and was very eagerly followed. He would leave to draw their attention to some of it, but for his own part he was disposed to doubt whether, having regard to the main features of the case, any particular question with which they need trouble themselves could arise on that point. There was no doubt that the absence of notice to the persons it was sought to incriminate might in some instances be of the utmost importance, inasmuch as it would in some instances deprive the resolution of any legal binding effect. But in the present case they had only to determine whether the publication of the document, as charged, was defamatory. It was alleged and proved by witnesses that the punchayet of a man's native place had jurisdiction in caste matters. The Calcutta punchayet had, therefore, no right to interfere. Could the jury, therefore, go so far as to say that, because the Calcutta community had no right to interfere, the assertion that they did so by the defence was criminal? Another suggestion made why this resolution was defamatory was that a complete unanimity was requisite for a resolution of a punchayet. With regard to the unanimity of this meeting, the jury would have to decide, but it seemed a bad introduction to a case to take advantage of a technical want of unanimity of this suit.

His lordship had not concluded when the Court rose for the day.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

MAN'S LOVE.

BY MISS MARY ANN BROWN.

WHEN woman's eye grows dull,
And her cheek paleth ;
When fades the beautiful,
Then man's love faileth ;
He sits not beside her chair
Clasps not her fingers,
Twines not the damp hair
That o'er her brow lingers.

He comes but a moment in,
Though her eye lightens,
Though her cheek paleth,
Feverishly brightens ;
He stays but a moment near,
When that flush fadeth,
Though true affection's tear
Her soft eyelid shadeth.

He goes from her chamber straight
Into life's jostle,
He meets at the very gate
Business and bustle,
He thinks not of her within Silently sighing,
He forgets in that noisy din
That she is dying !

And when the young heart is still,
What though he mourneth,
Soon from his sorrow chill,
Wearied he turneth.
Soon o'er her buried head
Memory's light setteth,
And the true-hearted dead
Thus man forgetteth !

WOMAN'S LOVE.

BY THE SAME.

When man is waxing frail,
And his hand is thin and weak,
And his lips are parched and pale,
And wan and white his cheek ;
Oh, then doth woman prove
Her constancy and love !

She sitteth by his chair,
And holds his feeble hand,
She watcheth ever there,
His wants to understand ;
His yet unspoken will
She hasteneth to fulfil.

She leads him, when the noon
Is bright, o'er dale or hill,
And all things, save the tune
Of the honey bees, are still,
Into the garden bowers,
To sit 'midst herbs and flowers,

And when he goes not there,
To feast on breath and bloom,
She brings the posy rare
Into his chamber room,
And 'neath his weary head
The pillow smooth doth spread.

Until the hour when death
His lamp of life doth dim,
She never wearied,
She never leaveth him ;
Still near him night and day
She meets his eye alway.

And when his trial's o'er,
And his turf is on his breast,
Deep in her bosom's core
Lie sorrows unexpressed ;
Her tears, her sighs, are weak,
Her settled grief to speak.

And though there may arise
Balm for her spirit's pain,
And though her quiet eyes
May sometimes smile again ;
Still, still, she must regret,
She never can forget !

Holloway's Pills.—Weakening weather.—The sultry summer days strain the nerves of the feeble and decrepit, and disease may eventuate unless some restorative, such as these purifying Pills, be found to correct the disordering tendency. Holloway's medicine gives potency to the nervous system, which is the source of all vital movements, and presides over every action which maintains the growth and well-being of the body. No one can overestimate the necessity of keeping the nerves well strung, or the ease with which these Pills accomplish that end. They are the most unfailing antidotes to indigestion, irregular circulation, palpitation, sick headache, and costiveness, and have therefore attained the largest sale and highest reputation.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE most interesting event of the week was the Viceroy's opening of the Bengal-Nagpore Railway. The ceremony passed off with great clat, at Chakradharpore in Singbloom, which is likely to be the head-quarters of the Company. Mr. Hoare, M. P., Chairman of the London Board, came himself all the way from home for the special purpose of acting the host on the occasion. There were three several contingents of guests from Calcutta, Nagpore, and Bombay, while Chota Nagpore was fully represented by its Chief Commissioner, Mr. Grimley, and a number of the Native Chiefs of the province in their picturesque costumes, under state umbrellas of many insignias. The Company had been at great pains to make the ceremony as imposing as possible. The station as well as a great part of the line leading to it had been festively decorated, while the arrangements for the comfort of the guests along the line either way are described as admirable. The chief attraction in the way of decorations was a long line of elephants in front of the station, in splendid caparison, and attended by Mahuts in gay dresses.

After the Viceroy had, in response to the request of Mr. Hoare, declared the Bengal-Nagpore line open, the party adjourned to the workshop shed where breakfast was served.

THE shed was amply decorated and looked for the nonce like a regular banquetting hall, there being covers laid for three hundred guests, accommodated at three separate tables. The speeches were thoroughly worthy of the importance of the occasion. The Viceroy's speech, in particular, was a most valuable deliverance on the subject of railway enterprise in this country. Lord Lansdowne has an admirable way of making his speeches on important occasions perfect models of thoroughness and careful study. The speech of Mr. Wynne, the Engineer and Agent of the Company, is an interesting history of the line, and of the numerous difficulties which he and his staff had to overcome in its construction.

WHILE emphatically maintaining the almost solemn nature of the obligation resting on the Government of India to promote the extension of railways, Lord Lansdowne is at the same quite against a policy of reckless precipitation. His full sympathy with the caution and deliberation which Government have always observed in this respect, His Lordship expressed with his usual thoroughness and frankness :—

"I expressed at the commencement of my observations a hope that my presence here would be regarded as an intimation of the interest which the Government of India takes in the expansion of the railway system of this country. I shall not be sorry if it suggests another conclusion also. It has been not unfrequently stated that the Government of India is animated by a rooted antipathy to the employment of the agency of Companies for the construction of railways, and I have heard it said that we desire to keep such construction entirely in our own hands, and that in furtherance of this policy we are always ready to find pretexts for excluding what is spoken of as 'private enterprise.' Let me take this opportunity of saying emphatically that no misconception could be greater. The work, administrative and executive, which is already thrown on the shoulders of the Government of India is of such colossal proportions that you may depend upon it that we shall be only too glad if some of it is taken off our hands by the intervention of Companies. If, as is unfortunately the case, we have not unfrequently been obliged to regard proposals laid before us in the name of private enterprise with a critical eye, it has been for the reason that they have been accompanied by conditions so disadvantageous to those whose interests are committed to our charge, that it was absolutely impossible for us to accept them. In some cases the offers made to us have involved the proposals that we should virtually assume the whole of the responsibility for any loss which the bargain might entail in the event of its proving a disastrous one; in others, we have been asked to alienate vast areas of land without any sufficient equivalent for thus parting with the national estate; in others, again, we have been pressed to concede monopolies of timber or minerals without really knowing what we were going to part with; in yet other cases we have found private enterprise seeking to construct a section of some great railway, the section selected being I need not say, the easiest and most profitable, with the certainty that Government would have eventually to undertake the completion of the more difficult and unremunerative sections. Or again we have been invited to sanction the construction of projects competitive with lines already in existence, and certain if completed to deprive these of a portion of their income. Pray do not understand me as suggesting that the promoters of Railway Companies are seeking to take an undue advantage of the Government of India. They are merely endeavouring, as all men of business should, to make the best bargain they can for their clients, and, so long as India has to suffer, as we do at present, from a fluctuating exchange, it is useless to disguise from ourselves the risk and uncertainty which attach to every Indian speculation, or to expect that those who are engaged in them will not endeavour, by direct or indirect means, to guard themselves against the losses to which the vagaries of the rupee at present render them liable. These are, however, matters which it is impossible to deal with in the course of an after-breakfast speech, and all that I need add upon this subject is that we are not only ready, but anxious, to encourage private enterprise by affording it every facility in our power, and, within reasonable limits, by assuming a fair share of the risks and responsibilities of the transaction."

Of the value of the line as a protection against famine, the Viceroy spoke with the utmost confidence :—

"I believe it is now an admitted fact that in no one year does India ever fail to produce enough food to supply the requirements of its population. The mortality occasioned by recurrent famines has been due, not to the fact that there was no food for the people, but to the fact that the food was in one place and the people in another, and that there was no means of bringing them speedily together. In the case of the districts served by the Bengal-Nagpore line, we have until now been confronted with the melancholy and humiliating spectacle of acute suffering from scarcity in one portion of those districts, and a superabundant supply of food stuffs in another portion, coupled with a deficiency of communications which rendered it impossible to supply the poverty of one area out of the affluence of the other. A complete failure of the harvest is, I believe, an unknown occurrence in the wheat-producing region of Chhattisgarh, the fertility of which is, except perhaps in the valley of the Red River, without a parallel in the world: it has been called the granary of India, and it is a granary which has this peculiarity, that it is always full even when other granaries are empty. But in bygone years the surplus produce of Chhattisgarh has been wasted or destroyed because there was no means of bringing it to market, while thousands of acres of productive land have remained uncultivated or imperfectly cultivated, simply because their yield would only have swelled an already useless and unprofitable surplus. Should it be the will of Providence that any part of Eastern India should be again visited with a failure of her staple crops, we may rest assured that this line, which will bring the great food reserves of the Central Provinces within reach of Behar and Upper Bengal, will certainly go far to mitigate the sufferings of the people, and to relieve the strain which would be placed upon the resources of the Government."

How the Railway will be an instrument of general progress to the province and its people, Lord Lansdowne spoke with touching benevolence :—

"And now, gentlemen, it remains for me to ask you to drink the toast of the morning. I give you 'Success to the Bengal-Nagpore Railway.' (Loud cheers.) May it prove a source of unmixed advantage, not only to the Company and to the Government, but to the people of this portion of India. Their interest in this great enterprise is, after all, one far transcending in importance those either of the Company or the Government. (Cheers.) I feel confident that one of the results of its completion will be that the condition and requirements of these districts, hitherto so completely isolated, will become better known and understood; that its leading men will feel that they are no longer cut off from the rest of India; that the Chiefs and land-owners will be stimulated to carry out local improvements; and that the immense natural resources of a region which has hitherto been backward from no fault of its own, will with every year that passes undergo a new measure of progress and development. (Cheers.) Their country is one which till now, to use the words of a friend of mine who is with us, has never had a history. If this is true, its history may be said to begin to-day, may it be one of steady progress and increasing contentment and well-being to all, from the Raja to the humblest rayyet who cultivates the soil."

THE Madras People's Friend notices the case of poor Bysani Rungiah Chetty :—

"He was charged with forgery but neither the Special nor the Common Jury was unanimous. In both instances the majority was for the acquittal of the prisoner. But Mr. Justice Shephard, the presiding Judge at the last Sessions, wanted a unanimous verdict and so the Chetty has to go through another fiery ordeal. It was in the power of the Judge to accept the verdict of the majority, but he did not use that power and the inconvenience and annoyance and anxiety have to be repeated."

Our contemporary disposes of the 'pretence for this judicial persecution in one pertinent sentence :—

"If the next Jury disagree, surely it will not be maintained that the accused should be tried again."

THE same paper reports the death, on the 12th February, of Augur Chand, a prominent Sowcar and the Prince among Madras Marwadis :

"Originally he was a water carrier to another of the race of Shylocks, then he became his gumastah and thence forward he lent on his own account and set up for himself."

He has left more than thirty lacs, besides extensive landed property in Madras and elsewhere.

LAWYERS are up to any contention, and the English system of judicature allows them the utmost liberty. A recent case in England illustrates this. A foreigner named Anashasins Vreones was indicted at Bristol on the charge of altering samples of corn in transmission in sealed bags to the London Corn Trade Association, the samples being Chandra Roy, of Cossipore, the Hon'ble Gurudas Banerjee, Kumar Ramesur Mallia, Baboo Bholanath Mullick, Baboo Jadu Lal Mullick, Mr. Ishan C. Bose, Mr. Suryakumar Agasti, Babu Mohendranath Bhattacharjee, Dr. Jogendra Nath Bhattacharjee, Baboo Jogendra Chunder Ghose, Rai Budridas Mohim Bahadoor, Nawab Syed Badshah Nawab, Moulvi Abdul Jubbar, Moulvi Abdoor Rowoof, Baboos Jogesh Chunder Dutt and Hem Chunder Mallik, and many others too numerous to recall. Several gentlemen—Mr. R. D. Mehta for one—were unavoidably absent from illness. The great visitors were unmistakably pleased at the entertainment. Some of them had their first acquaintance with the phonograph at this Conversatione. The institution, for the annual entertainment of the Literary Mahomedans has become so, maintains its popularity, due in no small measure to the popularity of the Secretary, Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadoor.

THE Call to the Unperverted University men has not gone for nothing. The joint remonstrance of Professor Bhattacharjee, Dr. Ghose and Mr. Bose has already borne fruit. The Graduates are awaking to a sense of their disgrace from the wild palaver against the Consent Bill held in their name by a few irresponsible men with the slightest tincture of the University element.

THE following disclaimer to the opposition to the Bill to raise the age of consent from 10 to 12 years, is in course of circulation among the Graduates of the Calcutta University for signature. The way in which some of the distinguished Graduates have plunged into the mire has rendered such a disavowal necessary. We hope the Graduates as a body will prove superior to the uncivilization and brutality of the hour, and preserve the University against the savagery of the Garbhadhanists:—

"We the undersigned Graduates of the Calcutta University beg most respectfully to assure His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General in Council of our hearty sympathy with the objects of the Bill now before His Excellency's Council to raise, to however small an extent, the limit of age up to which the persons of Indian girls are to be protected. We regard with abhorrence the practice which the proposed law seeks to put down."

Already in Calcutta, 66 graduates have signed that statement, and others are daily coming forward. The principal centres of civilization in the country are following suit. Bhagulpore was first in the field with the signatures of 9 of the best men in that town. Lucknow has sent 24 names, Dacca has well maintained her credit with 43 signatures. Faridpur and Mymensing each sends 8 names. Khulna is 13 strong. Purnea sends 5. At the bottom of the list stands Suri in Beerbhun with only 3 sound graduates: In all as many as 179 graduates have come forward to support the Bill. In the course of the week, we expect to hear from others.

UNDER the chairmanship of the Vice-Chairman—the Chairman vacating his seat for the purpose—the Municipal Commissioners instructed the Budget Committee to include in the next Budget Rs. 6,000 as House allowance to the Chairman Mr. Lee. It was not a full meeting, and, such as it was, all the Commissioners present did not vote. There was, besides, opposition to granting the enhancement so early in a new career. At any rate, the vote was not understood as final, the Chairman-for-the-nonce assuring the meeting that it was a preliminary sanction that was asked for and that the matter would come up again for final decision of the Board. After the vote, Mr. Lee returned to the room and, again taking his place at the head of the meeting, thanked the Commissioners. Another step still remained to enable the Chairman to draw the Rs. 500. The law has reserved a check on the generosity of the Commissioners to their Chief. The Local Government might disallow the grant. So Mr. Lee hastened to apply for confirmation by the Local Government. But Sir Charles Elliott was in no hurry. He has withheld his sanction. The Lieutenant-Governor has just shown that he can be munificent with his own money. But he is not the man to allow a pice of the public money to be wasted. He was not satisfied that the Commissioners were unanimous, or that a great majority of them had voted. He further thought, if the increase were to be granted, the Rs. 500 ought to be gained in five years, by annual increments of Rs. 100. This reminds us of the action of a former Lieutenant-Governor on a similar occasion. The vote on the allowance to Sir Henry Harrison was almost unanimous. Nevertheless, it was not sanctioned by the Local Government without comment or qualification. Sir Ashley Eden wondered why the Commissioners had granted it at all. He would not override such a consensus of the Commissioners, but he suggested the capitalization of the sum for a Lord Mayoral residence. At the same time, the Lieutenant-Governor reminded the Chairman that the increase must not be taken as an addition to the pay, hinting thereby that it was to be a sumptuary allowance to be expended in entertainments and in maintaining the dignity of the office. The question of the erection of a house for the Chairman was shelved, and Sir Henry drew the allowance every month and instituted the Garden Party on the Queen's Birth Day.

WHILE the Viceroy was about his engagement in connection with the Bengal-Nagpore Railway, Her Excellency the Marchioness of Dufferin performed in Calcutta a ceremony which must have been more congenial and pleasing to her than was the more august occasion of inaugurating an important line of communication to her consort. We need scarcely say, that ceremony was the opening of the Lady Dufferin Victoria Hospital and unveiling the bust of the benevolent founder of that institution. The proceedings commenced with the reading of the Committee's report by Mr. Cotton, the Honorary Secretary. The report is an interesting record of the progress which has been made since the first starting of the Hospital in a hired house to the completion of the new building upon the New Central Road, upon about half an acre of land and at a total cost, including the cost of the acquisition of land, of one lac and seven thousand rupees. This expenditure has been met by liberal donations from several quarters, but there are a few things yet wanting to complete the equipment of the Hospital. The more urgent of these were a Children's Ward, separate and private Zenana Wards and a dispensary and quarters for a Resident Surgeon, estimated in all to cost Rs. 35,000. Sir Charles Elliott announced lately that towards raising this sum an English gentleman was willing to subscribe Rs. 15,000, provided the remainder were forthcoming by the time the Hospital would be ready for the opening ceremony. It has since transpired that the generous donor is Sir Charles himself, and it is gratifying to learn that his announcement has already had a stimulating effect in the way he desired, if not as yet to the fullest extent. Two handsome subscriptions of Rs. 5,000 each have been received from the Maharajah of Bettiah, and Maharaja Sir Jotendra Mohun Tagore, while contributions have been obtained from the Jubilee Fund and otherwise which will enable the requisite supplementary works being taken in hand at once. The report being read, Sir Charles Elliott, in an excellent speech, invited Her Excellency to proceed to the ceremony. Sir Charles announced the receipt of further donations and expressed his great satisfaction at the response which has been given to his call and which has gone far to wipe away the reproach of backwardness which had been levelled at Bengal at the last annual meeting of the Fund. He also testified to the zealous and self-sacrificing services rendered to the cause by Mr. Cotton, Mr. Guyther, and last, and by no means, the least, by Her Excellency herself. The Hospital was then declared open. A vote of thanks to Her Excellency for presiding on the occasion was moved by the Maharaja of Bettiah and seconded by Prince Jehan Kadr. The assembly then adjourned to the main building for the ceremony of unveiling Sir E. Boehm's bust of Lady Dufferin. This ceremony to which she was invited by the Hon. Mr. Mackay, as Chairman of the Memorial Committee, who paid a graceful compliment to the illustrious object of the memorial, performed, the proceedings terminated after an inspection of the buildings.

The bust was one of Boehm's last works and shows no falling off of cunning in the hand of the illustrious artist. Lady Dufferin has been taken in one of her most winning expressions, as we heard good judges declare that afternoon, it is a true work of art and Calcutta is fortunate in having such a specimen of sculpture. As far as we could judge in the imperfect light of the vestibule in which it is placed, it is an unmistakable likeness.

THE Calcutta Committee in support of the Age of Consent Bill have issued, for free distribution, a pamphlet under the title of "Reprints from Reis and Rayyet. On the Legislation of the Rishis and the Age of Consent Bill. By Jogendra Nath Bhattacharjee, M.A., D.L., author of Commentaries on Hindu Law, Vyavastha Kalpadrum." The cost of printing has been generously borne by a munificent Raja of East Bengal who is a staunch supporter of the Bill.

The Committee's Memorial is ready in translation.

THE Legislature has taken a step in the right direction, and certainly not too soon, by providing, in the Criminal Procedure Amendment Act (IV of 1891) just passed, that, in any case instituted by complaint or upon information given to a police officer or to a magistrate, it shall be competent to the trying magistrate to direct the accused to pay the accused compensation up to Rupees fifty, if the accusation appears to be frivolous or vexatious. Cannot something in the same direction be done in regard to civil actions? If a person frivolously or vexatiously accused of a crime requires the protection afforded him by the recent amendatory Act, a person harassed by a frivolous or vexatious civil claim being put forward against him, requires similar protection still more imperatively, for he is almost without any remedy. Even without the amendatory Act, a person frivolously or vexatiously accused of a crime can avenge his false prosecution by setting the criminal law in motion against the accuser under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code, and also indemnify himself for the mental anxiety caused, the expenditure incurred for the defence and all loss incidentally sustained. But no such remedies are open to the unfortunate litigant harassed by a false civil claim against him. Probably, it is supposed that the authority vested in civil courts to award costs to the successful party serves the purpose for which it has been found necessary to devise so many different remedies for the protection of persons falsely accused of crimes. But it is notorious that the costs that the civil courts can award (for they have to award them according to a hard and fast scale laid down by the law) are sometimes infinitely short of the actual costs. For example, the pleader's fee awardable under the law in a case in which the claim is one rupee is four-fifths of an anna, but would any pleader ever accept a bribe for such infinitesimal remuneration? Almost any case may be carried up to the first appellate court in appeal, and sometimes the most rotten case is. The necessity then arises to the successful party of engaging rather expensive legal gentlemen to support the decree in his favour. Let us suppose he wins in the appeal too. But the hearing of the appeal may be postponed several times, and the parties have to dance attendance each time to see to their case and probably also to fee their lawyers as often. And dancing attendance means more than mere trouble. It may sometimes mean very serious loss to the labourer- or cultivator-litigant. The result is that the successful party, if poor, may have to come out of the struggle worst and completely financially ruined. It is a well-known practice with the unscrupulous rich, well up in the law and in its abuse, to ruin their poor opponents by litigation of this sort. "They defeat the enemy by being defeated themselves," as they say. Does it not behove the Legislature to afford some sort of protection to litigants harassed in this fashion?

Similarly, a defendant too in a civil action may harass a plaintiff by putting frivolous or vexatious obstacles in the way of his obtaining justice. There ought, therefore, to be some punitive provision against him too.

Cannot the object desired be secured by some provision in the civil law enabling courts to direct compensation up to a certain sum, to be paid by the harasser to the harassed?

MR. Palit (junior), son of the wellknown Mr. T. N. Palit, has not escaped with the fine of Rs. 500, which the District Magistrate inflicted upon him for his misconduct in the Court of Babu Khagendranath Mitter, Deputy Magistrate of Monghyr, the unfortunate details of which have already been reported in these columns. The case came on for consideration before a Full Bench of the High Court, upon a rule issued against him to show cause why he should not be struck off the rolls of Advocates. Fortunately, he placed himself in the hands of Mr. Bonnerjee and, under his advice, tendered an apology. But the apology came too late, and was besides not personally made. The Chief Justice, in delivering judgment, said:—

"Mr. Palit is a gentleman who has the education and reputation of a Barrister, and as a Barrister goes to practise before his countrymen in this country; and it is right that it should be known, in our opinion and in the opinion of every one, it is the duty of a person in that position not only to protect his client, not only to expect protection himself from the Court, but it is one of his first duties to protect the Court itself, and that duty is increased by the fact that the tribunal is one which does not rank as one of the highest in the country. When a person in the position of Mr. Palit, with the education of Mr. Palit, and his advantages goes down to practise before a Deputy Magistrate, it is his duty to show people there how the business of a Court of Justice ought to be conducted, and by the respect which he shows to the Magistrate before whom he is practising, to induce people to show the respect which is due to any properly constituted tribunal. In these Mr. Palit has on this occasion signally failed. He has conducted himself in such a way as to show that, whatever his acquirements may be, he has not that respect which any gentleman ought to have for a tribunal before which he practises, or the respect which any gentleman ought to have for himself. Now added to this is the fact that Mr. Palit has practically, down to this day, refused to apologise for what he has done. It is true that to-day he has placed himself in the hands of his counsel, Mr. Bonnerjee, and has allowed himself to be so far influenced by the wisdom and good taste of Mr. Bonnerjee, as to consent that that gentleman shall apologise for him. But he has never made personal apology in this matter. The apology which he has made at the last moment through his counsel, however eminent he may be, and however gracefully and fully that apology may have been worded, from his mouth, is not an apology which we can accept as being satisfactory for the offence in his case. Lastly, we think that the least punishment which it is possible for us to pass upon Mr. Palit as marking our sense of the gravity of the offence in this case, is that of suspension for six months from practising in this Court."

The other party to the disagreeable wrangle, the pleader of the Monghyr Court, Babu Prosumno Coomar Mookerjee, on whom a similar rule had also issued, was, in consideration of the more satisfactory nature of his apology which was made by himself and repeated on several occasions and of his previous good conduct, let off with a less severe punishment, viz., suspension for one month.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, March 7, 1891.

THE RECKLESSNESS OF OPPOSITION.

As a weighty political fact, the demonstration on the maidan was a fiasco. That is a small matter. The more important question is, Whether it ought to have been. No reasonable man can doubt that, if it could not be held on better terms, it should not have been held at all. It was a bad business altogether, for all concerned. We are not permitted to take consolation in the reflection—What is done is done—would it were worthier! For we cannot say it is done and forgotten. The thing sticks to us. It would have been all right but for the modus operandi of the getting up of it. It is the methods of the movers that have compromised the people. We are afraid we may be reminded of them when we might least expect it.

We confess we regard with grave anxiety the tactics of the agitation against the Age of Consent Bill. They have already filled the European community with violent disgust. And not unreasonably. They were tricks rather than tactics. The promoters were as defiant of the Government as they could well be. The very placards were an incitement to the worst passions of the mob. The language employed for working upon the people was seditious. The Government were accused of attacking religion. Attacking religion forsooth! After more than a century's abstention from interference with religion, all on a sudden to have a fit of intolerant zeal and break all our temples, demolish our gods, and destroy the Shasters! Now such tactics betray a complete incapacity for political movements in the leaders of the agitation. Nor would they have any chance of being employed, except under a lenient Government like the British. Or it may be, the Government have too great a contempt for the people of Bengal to care for their menace. So they can afford to give them a large rope to hang themselves with.

Speaking in all seriousness, the incidents of the last few days are simply lamentable. The paroxysm of passion to which the citizens of Calcutta lashed themselves, seems to us almost like a dream. The occasion is scarcely commensurate. Here is a small alteration of an already existing provision of a law ungrudgingly borne for thirty years—an alteration proposed, upon advice and careful consideration, in the sincere belief, on the part of Government, that it involved no interference with the religion of the people, while it was, on the other hand, manifestly called for in the interests of humanity and the true welfare of the people. And upon this to work yourselves up to a towering passion, because the Government did not take your advice beforehand, to attempt to terrorize the Government into dropping the proposal, to offer open affront to the Viceroy himself—what is all this? Are these devices at all proper—are they safe? Had the leaders of the maidan demonstration any reckoning of consequences that might ensue—had they any organization for preventing popular émeutes? Not that the authorities themselves were without anxiety or forethought, whatever might be the lightness of heart with which our Jacques Bonhommes might be playing at popular demonstrations. The maidan was more than usually guarded, and there was an air of alertness about the police which struck us as significant.

Happily, the crowd dispersed as they came with no more apery of similar demonstrations in Europe than a few bolder spirits setting a howl of "Don't want the Bill" around the Government House.

And these are the men who are so clamorous for political privileges—who would have a St. Stephen's Chapel in Calcutta, if they could! They never wait to deserve before they desire. Political privileges mean capacity for their exercise, and the proof of capacity and intelligence they have just given is simply disastrous to the cause of the country. Their conduct discredits us all—brings suspicion upon all our professions. The credit of a century is forfeited, and the eyes of Government have been opened to the dangers of popular institutions in this country.

THE CHAMPION GARBHADHANIST AND HIS CHELAS.

THE Garbhadhanist Pandit has fired a second pamphlet, in which he has attempted to controvert some of our arguments, and a weekly contemporary, which has distinguished itself by its neophyte zeal, has challenged us either to repel the attack or to admit defeat. The discussion has already become so nauseating that we would fain retire from the field altogether, and leave our friends to enjoy their triumph like Titu Mir of old. But the holy Rishis whom we revere and follow have been sadly libelled, and we consider it our sacred duty to continue the fighting, even at the risk of having the choice Billingsgate of our opponents poured upon us in still greater abundance.

With the limited amount of space which we have at our disposal, we cannot, in these columns, attempt at anything like a thorough review of all the arguments and assertions in the pamphlet under notice. We will only examine the force of the more important items in the pleading and specially those that are directed against us. To begin with, the passage in Medhatithi which we cited in support of our position, has been explained away by the Garbhadhanist Pandit in a manner which can hardly be characterised as honest. We mean no offence. But we fear that, in the heat of the controversy, he has been led to sacrifice truth and fairness with a view to serve his party. We say this, not by way of returning his compliments, but in the sincere belief that the erroneous view which he has put forward is otherwise simply unaccountable. The passage which we cited from Medhatithi had reference to V. 45,* Chap. III., of Manu's Code. The first clause in the Sloka enjoins cohabitation on the occurrence of Ritu. But there are texts in the treatises on rituals which enjoin that married couples must abstain from sexual intercourse for a certain period after marriage. To avoid conflict between these and the text of Manu under comment, Medhatithi has laid down that the latter does not make cohabitation binding within the first year after marriage.

The commentator then goes on to discuss another question altogether, namely, whether the rule laid down by Manu is an obligatory injunction, i. e., a niyama, or a prohibition by implication, i. e., parisankhya. If it is the former, then cohabitation at the time of Ritu is absolutely binding. If it is the latter, then it is optional at Ritu, but is absolutely forbidden at other times. With a view to decide this question, the distinction between niyama and parisankhya is explained at some length, and, at last, the conclusion is arrived at that the rule about approaching the wife at Ritu is a niyama and not a parisankhya, the ultimate result being that cohabitation with the wife at Ritu is held to be binding.

The commentator then proceeds to consider the question whether the aforesaid rule is an arbitrary one and based upon an independent text* of the Vedas, or is deducible from other rules.

After some discussion, it is shewn that the injunction necessarily follows from the doctrine that an Aurasa son is absolutely necessary for spiritual purposes. But as one Aurasa son is quite sufficient in order to secure salvation, the commentator is obliged to lay down also that the injunction as to approaching the wife at Ritu is a niyama or an obligatory precept only to those who have not at least one son. This rule has no connection whatever with the doctrine deduced at the outset from the texts in treatises on ritual. To those who have a son already, the injunction as to approaching the wife at Ritu has admittedly no application. If Medhatithi meant to say that the rule, which forbade sexual intercourse within the first year after marriage, applied only to persons who had a son already, he could have, by saying so, explained away the texts in the treatises on ritual, instead of attempting to reconcile them with the Sloka under comment in Manu's Code. His meaning is so clear and obvious that it cannot possibly be misunderstood by any one having the least pretension to Sanskrit scholarship.

The texts which lay down that the wife must be approached at Ritu, are inapplicable to persons having male issue, not only according to Medhatithi, but according to all the authorities. From this alone, it follows that the rule is not so very hard and fast as the Garbhadhanists would have us imagine. The wording of the texts which lay down that rule, may lead to the supposition that it admits of no exception. But from the principle—as respected by Hindu jurists as by Coke—cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex, our commentators deduce the conclusion that the injunction is not applicable to persons having male issue already. The texts and rules of interpretation, which we have relied upon, similarly lead to the conclusion that the injunction is not binding where the wife is a girl of such tender years as to be presumably incapable of being safely impregnated, according to the common course of natural events. Our reasoning has been characterised as overstrained, but, overstrained or understrained, we are in the best company. We follow the best precedents. Certainly, our argument is not strained beside the process by which the commentators have arrived at the conclusion that the rule as to approaching the wife at Ritu is not binding on husbands having male issue. At any rate, we have, in the present instance, a far better occasion for all legitimate and rational latitude than the commentators had in deducing the aforesaid exception. We are confronted by a grave public mischief, and we have avoided, by legitimate course, a palpable absurdity. In the absence of any express text inconsistent with our view, our interpretation cannot be fairly taken exception to.

"Let the husband approach his wife in due season, that is at the time fit for pregnancy; let him be constantly satisfied with her alone; but except on the forbidden days of the moon, he may approach her being affectionately disposed, even out of due season."

* Our exegetes take for granted that there is a text of the Vedas for every text of the Smritis. It is also one of their recognized principles that it is not proper to postulate the existence of too many sruti texts. And for this reason they work out their conclusions from general principles whenever they can.

As to the definition of Ritu, what Pandit Sasadhar has said in his second pamphlet rather supports the view which we take. In his Bengali dissertation he had the goodness to observe that even dogs and cats understood what was meant by the word, intending apparently to place us in a lower category than even the inferior animals. In his English pamphlet, he does not repeat the compliment. Perhaps the passage has been expunged by the translator. Whatever it was, Pandit Sasadhar now agrees with us so far as to say that the word Ritu is defined by the commentators, because in the texts in which it occurs, it is not meant to be used in its ordinary acceptation, but in a peculiar sense including in it 16 days or rather nights. This may well be taken to support the conclusion which in our opinion follows from the wording of the definition. At any rate, the learned gentleman, who criticised our views in the columns of the Indian Nation, will have now found that we are not alone in taking an ordinary word in an extraordinary sense.

To return to the Pandit's latest deliverance. The thing in it that astounds us most, is the assertion that practices sanctioned by custom only can be binding.

In his answer to his own queries in the columns of the vernacular paper with which he is connected, he said :—

"I have shown in my first pamphlet that customs not at variance with the written law are obligatory. The commentator of the Dayabhaga has not recognised the legality of those customs which are at variance with the Shasters."

In his English pamphlet, the Pandit speaks in a somewhat different tone. But we may presume that what appears in his own language in his own paper represents his views more accurately, and, in that impression, we do not feel inclined to continue this discussion further. We said that ceremonies sanctioned by custom only could never be binding, and we cited the authority of Sreekrishna to prove our point. If our readers feel inclined to inquire whether our contention is well supported or not, they may refer to the following passage in his commentary on the Dayabhaga :—

*Acharyashya nityatve pramanavabat.

Dayabhaga. P. C. Tagore's Edition, p. 78.

In connection with this discussion, we have to observe in conclusion that, according to a recognised canon of our exegetes, every text that may be found in the Vedas or the Smritis is not authoritative. Those texts only can have any binding force which have been quoted and commented upon by authoritative writers. This, we think, is sufficient to dispose of some of the texts which have been relied upon by our opponents.

JOGENDRA NATH BHATTACHARJEE.

A CONTRADICTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Your contemporary of the Amrita Bazar Patrika, in its issue of the 3rd instant, publishes a memorial to the Viceroy on the "Age of Consent Bill," submitted by Hafiz Abdur Rahman, the motwalli of the mosque founded by his father the late Hafiz Jamal Uddin. The facts mentioned in the said memorial against the Bill are contrary to Mahomedan Law. The said Hafiz is not a learned man and consequently he knows little of Mahomedan Law, but being duped by others who are, like himself, ignorant, made certain statements which require flat contradiction.

First, the Koran does not lay it down "that a girl is to be married immediately after she has attained her marriageable age;" secondly, the learned Commentators never settled this marriageable age "to be the period when the first menstruation takes place."

According to Mahomedan Law, the minimum period of puberty is 9 years and the maximum 15. No particular age has been fixed for the marriage of Mahomedan girls. The cohabitation of a man with his wife entirely depends on individual constitution. The Shara permits a husband to cohabit with his wife only when she is physically fit for such intercourse and without the least fear of being hurt or harmed.

The proposed restriction of the age of 12, without infringing the Mahomedan Law of consummation of marriage, only deprives husbands of the advantages they hitherto possessed, according to the Shara, of cohabiting with their wives before the age of 12, in the event of the wives being fit for it.

A MOULVI.

* * The existing British Indian Law too is a restriction to some, if less, extent. There can be little practical objection on that score, seeing that Nature is on the side of the British. The letter is well timed, though it will scarcely stop those Hindus who are making political capital of poor Hafiz Abdur Rahman.—ED. R. & R.

DR. SIRCAR'S OPINION ON THE CONSENT BILL.

TO SIR JOHN EDGAR, K.C.I.E., C.I.E.,

Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 306 J, dated the 26th January, asking my opinion on the provisions of the Bill now before the Legislative Council of India to amend the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure 1882, and have to apologize for the delay due to continued illness in forwarding my reply.

2. My opinion on the custom of early marriage prevalent in this country is before the public since 1871, when, in reply to a circular letter of the late Babu Keshub Chunder Sen requesting opinion on the age of puberty of native girls and their minimum marriageable age, I gave my views on the subject in a rather lengthy letter to the Babu, and in an article, both of which were published in my Journal of Medicine (Calcutta Journal of Medicine for July 1871).

3. In the Letter, I said :

"Early marriage, in my humble opinion, is the greatest evil of our country. It has stood, so to say, at the very springs of the life of the nation, and prevented the normal expanse of which it is capable. And I am inclined to date the fall and degeneracy of my country from the day Angira uttered the fatal words, and those words became law, or custom which is stronger and more mischievous than law itself :—

अष्टवर्षा भवेद्गौरी नववर्षा तु रोजिष्णी ।

दशमे कन्यका प्रोक्ता अतः अष्ट रजस्रजा ॥

तस्मात् संवत्सरे प्राप्ते दशमे कन्यका पुषे ।

प्रदातव्या प्रयत्न न दोषः कालदोषतः ॥

"The girl of eight years is Gauri (i. e. of the same elevated character and purity as Gauri or Parvati, the goddess Durga) ; of nine, Rohini (one of the wives of the moon) ; of ten (a simple) virgin ; of above that age, a woman who has menstruated. Hence the learned should give their daughters in marriage whenever they attain the age of ten, and they will not be liable to the fault of not marrying their daughters in due time."

"I have no doubt in my own mind that high and luxurious living and early seeing and knowing of child-husbands and child-wives, favored by the anxiety of fond parents to see their little ones become fathers and mothers, are the chief causes of the forced puberty which we so much regret in our female no less than in our male children.

"The advocates of early marriage urge that the custom is nothing else than the expression of a stubborn necessity which has arisen from the fact of early pubescence in this country. I think, however, we are warranted, by what has been already adduced, in concluding that early marriages have been the cause of early pubescence. The primary object of marriage is no doubt the production of healthy offspring, and physiologically speaking it ought not to be consummated before the ages when the offspring is not calculated to be long-lived or healthy. The commencement of the menstrual function is no doubt an index to the commencement of puberty. But it is a grave mistake to suppose that the female, who has just begun to menstruate, is capable of giving birth to healthy children. The teeth are no doubt intended for the mastication of solid food, but it would be a grievous error to think that the child, the moment he begins to cut his teeth, will be able to live upon solid food. Our anxiety, on the contrary, should be that the delicate masticatory organs are not injured or broken by giving the child too hard food. So when we see a girl is beginning to have the monthly flow, we should not only anxiously watch its course and regularity, but should also watch the other collateral developments of womanhood to be

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE REBUKE.

Oh ! speak to me no more—no more—
Nor cast your sighs away ;
For what you think is to adore,
I feel is to betray.
Your words—your vows—in vain would hide
The truth which I divine,
If wedding me would hurt your pride,
Then wooing me hurts mine.

Oh ! ne'er commit so great a fault,
Nor wrong the vows you 've made ;
For what you say is to exalt—
I feel is to degrade !—
To make me yours, whilst life endures,
Must be at God's own shrine ;
If such a bride would hurt your pride,
Then such a love hurts mine.

DO YOU REALLY THINK HE DID?

I waited till the twilight,
And yet he did not come ;
I strayed along the brook side,
And slowly wandered home ;
• When who should come behind me,
But him I would have chid ;
He said he came to find me—
Do you really think he did ?

He said, since last we parted,
He 'd thought of naught so sweet,
As of this very moment—
The moment we should meet.
He showed me where, half shaded,
A cottage home lay hid ;
He said for me he made it—
Do you really think he did ?

He said when first he saw me
Life seemed at once divine ;
Each night he dreamt of angels,
And every face was mine ;
Sometimes a voice, in sleeping,
Would all his hopes forbid ;
And then he wakened weeping—
Do you really think he did ?

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

It is reported from Cashmere that the Wuller lake is completely frozen with snow.

ON February 16, in the House of Commons, Mr. Morley moved the following vote of censure :—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the action of the Irish Executive in connection with the recent prosecutions at Tipperary, and other proceedings, is calculated to bring the administration of the law into contempt, and violates the civil and constitutional rights of Irish citizens."

Mr. T. W. Russell thought that not only the present motion like similar ones in former years should be rejected, but it was time that the House should pass an affirmative resolution approving of the action of the Irish Executive, and accordingly moved as an amendment :—

"That the action of the Irish Executive had been rendered imperative by the existence and activity of an illegal conspiracy directed against the civil rights of a large section of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland, who have been subjected to cruel persecution and great loss in following their lawful callings, and this House rejoices in the successful vindication of the law at Tipperary and elsewhere, which has gone far to restore freedom to the individual in every part of Ireland."

Mr. Gladstone considered the amendment an attempt to stifle discussion by the House of the formidable charges brought against the Chief Secretary, and it was unprecedented. Mr. W. H. Smith observed that there was nothing unusual to meet a vote of want of confidence by an amendment. Mr. Balfour stigmatized Mr. Morley as guilty of making matters still sub judice a subject of debate. The House divided, there being 245 for Mr. Morley's motion and against, 320. The amendment being put, on the motion of Mr. T. Healey, seconded by Sir W. Harcourt, the House adjourned the debate.

THE examinations of candidates for appointment as Deputy Collectors and Sub-Deputy Collectors, will be held at the Senate House of the Calcutta University, on the 23rd, 24th and 26th March 1891.

THE Road cess for the year 1891-92, for each of the Districts of Balasore, the 24-Pergunnahs, Durbhunga, Gya, Furreedpore, and Pooree, has been fixed at the maximum of one-half anna per rupee on the annual value of land, &c.

BABOO Juggernath Khunnah having resigned the Port Commissionership of Calcutta, Mr. S. Finney has been appointed a member of the Trust in the vacant place.

SIR Alfred Croft, K.C.I.E., Director of Public Instruction, has been reappointed a member of the Bengal Legislative Council.

MR. P. Nolan goes on furlough for eight months from the 25th instant. Mr. C. E. Buckland, from the Board of Revenue, officiates as Secretary to the Government of Bengal, in the General, Revenue and Statistical Departments. Mr. C. W. Bolton, from the 24-Pergunnahs, acts as Secretary to the Board of Revenue and Mr. H. H. Risley, Deputy Commissioner, on special duty, does the duty of the Magistrate and Collector at Alipore.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

FOR personating a public servant—a municipal license inspector—and thereby realizing two sums of Rs. 4 from two shop-keepers, Kally Nath Banerji, an old offender, has been sentenced by Syed Ameer Hossein to two years' imprisonment.

THE Northern Division Magistrate has fined a milkman Rs. 25 with the alternative of one month's imprisonment, for milking a cow suffering from smallpox.

THE Presidency Magistrate, Egmore, Madras, sentenced a native cook to two months' hard labour, for removing a coral necklace with a thoyet and batoo attached from the person of a child playing in the streets.

ONATH NATH DEB sued in the Small Cause Court T. R. Scallan for Rs. 713-5-6, being the principal and interest due on a promissory note for Rs. 564-8. The defendant admitted the execution of the note and the writing of a letter acknowledging the debt, but denied liability to repay. The note was not for money received, but in lieu of rent of the house he had lived in as undertenant, under a gentleman who was originally liable for the rent but had left the house without paying it up, and on the landlord's refusing to allow the undertenant to remove from the house his goods, the undertenant had executed the promissory note as the only way open to him to take away his furniture. Under these circumstances, he considered he was not bound to redeem his pledge to the landlord. The Court—Mr. R. S. T. MacEwen—took a different view and decreed the claim of the plaintiff with costs and a pleader's certificate.

OKHOY COOMAR MANNAH stood security for a post office peon named Peer Golan Khan in a bond for Rs. 1,000. The peon misappropriated some money orders valued at Rs. 467-7, and absconded. He could not be found nor the money recovered. Under the circumstances, the Secretary of State sued the surety for the amount of the bond. Having executed the deed, Okhoy Coomar had hardly any valid reason to plead against the claim. He, however, gave the circumstances of his connection with the peon. He said he knew nothing whatever of the postman, and that he was obliged to sign the bond, because he, defendant, was at that time serving under the postman's father in a thana. He wished the court to be merciful. Mr. Upton, on behalf of Government, wanted to secure the money that was misappropriated, and agreed to a decree for Rs. 467-7 with costs on that sum, payable in monthly instalments of Rs. 4.

ON March 29, 1889, while crossing from Ostend to Dover, the Countesse de Flandre was run into by the Princess Henriette. Her boiler burst and mortally wounded Castel, servant of Prince Napoleon who was on board. Shortly before the explosion, the Prince had ordered his servant to go down to the cabin for a box containing important political documents. Castel's son has now sued the Prince in the Civil Court of the Seine for the death of the father, assessing the damages at £400. He maintains that his father died in the execution of a special service at imminent peril to himself to which he was exposed by the order of the Prince. His was not an ordinary death from accident. An unprincipally Prince to grudge this petty sum to the family of a faithful servant!

MOULVI Mahomed Khan, in execution of a decree of the Small Cause Court against a third person, attached a pair of horses which Ismail Solomon Bhamji claimed as his. Bhamji accordingly filed a claim in the Small Cause Court which was disallowed with costs. He next applied for a new trial which too was refused. He then brought a regular suit against the Moulvi in the High Court. Mr. Justice Wilson has dismissed the suit with costs, with the following closing words in his judgment:—

"In my opinion an order made upon a claim filed under Section 278 of the Civil Procedure Code is an order in the suit within the meaning of section 37 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act. The words in Section 278 to the effect that the Court is to investigate the claim with the like power, as regards the examination of the claimant or objector, and in other respects, as if they were a party to the suit, are strong to show this. It follows that by the terms of section 57 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act the order is final, subject only to the right to apply for a new trial. And there can be no doubt that the omission of Section 283 from the section of the Procedure Code applied to the Small Cause Court was intended to give effect to this view. The balance of convenience is, I think, altogether in favour of the same view. Under the rules of the Small Cause Court claims are not tried summarily—they are dealt with just as suits are, with the same remedy in case of mistake by application for a new trial; and the Court has full power to award damages to either party. A person who thinks himself aggrieved by the seizure of goods, in execution of a Small Cause Court decree, has his choice of remedies. He may bring an ordinary suit in the proper Court, or he may make a claim in the Small Cause Court. In either case his rights are fully tried out, and it would, I think, be inconvenient and contrary to sound principle to allow him to try first one remedy and then the other."

THE Howrah Municipality has the privilege of electing its Chairman. In exercise of that right, the Commissioners have elected Baboo Upendra Chandra Mitter as their head. That election, by law, is subject to the approval of the Local Government. Following past precedents and probably relying on the law, Baboo Upendra wanted to take charge of the office before confirmation. This was opposed by the retiring Chairman, the Magistrate of Howrah, Mr. Fiddian, who had been beaten in the election. He argued that the election was not complete without confirmation. The Legal Remembrancer too has confirmed the same view of the law. There is an outcry against Mr. Fiddian for obstruction. Mr. Allen too comes in for his share of the abuse. Whatever the motive of the Magistrate-Chairman, even if he acted differently when he himself was appointed Chairman, it is not fair to tax him for not doing what he now believes to be illegal. His contention does not seem unreasonable and is not opposed to the intention of the law. True, under the Bengal Municipal Act, the appointment dates from the day of election, yet, by the same law, the election may or may not be sanctioned by Government, and if not sanctioned by Government cannot take effect though there be the fact of appointment. It is therefore not unreasonable to suppose that the appointment virtually dates from the date of approval by the Lieutenant-Governor.

IN November 1890, the Hindu of Madras wrote:—"The General Store-keeper S. I. Railway. The General Store-keeper resigned his post and left for French territory. We hear stores worth about Rs. 60,000 are missing, and the Agent, it appears, has reported the matter to the Board of Directors, London." The store-keeper, Mr. George Henry Wynn Tremenhare took it as an insinuation against his character, and sued Mr. Subramanya Aiyer and Mr. M. Veeragava Chariar—the former described as the editor, printer, publisher and a part proprietor and the latter a part proprietor of the newspaper—for Rs. 60,000, valuing his reputation at the price of the stores said to be missing. The plaintiff denies the allegation of the paper, and says that the plaintiff was never dismissed from the service of the railway and still continues its storekeeper. He had been on leave for two months and that he passed through French territory on his way to and from Tranquebar where he spent his leave. The defendants admit the publication of the statement complained of, but deny that they were aware that it concerned the plaintiff, and aver that in publishing it, they acted without the slightest malice towards the plaintiff, and that in the discharge of a public duty they published the information in the bona fide belief that it was true. They further rely on the correction published subsequently in December following, namely, "Mr. Tremenhare, of S. I. R. The correspondent on whose information it was stated in our columns that this gentleman, who is the General Store-keeper of the S. I. R., had resigned his post and left for French territory, now writes that there is no truth in that statement. The correspondent reports that he was misled into an unfounded statement about the officer." The defendants make it a grievance that the plaintiff never gave notice of the suit or called for apology. On the institution of the suit, they offered an ampler apology if that was desired, and being informed that the recantation published was not sufficient, they published the following further apology:—

"Under the head of Local News we published in our issue of the 19th November last a paragraph reflecting upon the General Store-keeper of the S. I. Railway. On subsequently learning from our informant that there was no foundation for the statement contained therein we published what we believed to be a sufficient contradiction of such statements in our issue of the 22nd December last. We, however, now admit that in justice to Mr. Tremenhare the contradiction might have been fuller and that we ought to have expressed our regret in addition to our correspondent's for the publication. We are satisfied that there was no truth in the statement that any stores were missing, nor is it true that Mr. Tremenhare resigned. Our correspondent subsequently contradicted and expressed regret for his statement. We need hardly say that we fully share his regret for having published an untrue statement, for which we offer our unreserved apology to Mr. Tremenhare."

When the suit came on for settlement of issues, the defendants further offered to pay Rs. 100 by way of damages, which was not accepted. Mr. Justice Shephard then fixed one issue as to the extent of the damages.

This phenomenal railway official who never casts a longing eye on the stores in his keep, has evidently an eye on our contemporary's money-bags. But who knows, that when he comes to handle them as his own they may not turn out to be filled with copper instead of silver!

It appears that the wife of Mr. Littledale, who accompanied her husband in his adventurous journey over the Pamir mountains recently, is a Marhatta lady. She is the daughter of the wellknown Dr. Atmaram Pandurang of Bombay.

THE bridges in the world have been censused with this result, viz.,

"There are now in the world 47 bridges with spans of more than 400 feet, and 29 of these are in the United States. Of the total, 9 are cantilever bridges, 7 arch bridges, 4 stiffened suspension bridges, 19 truss bridges, 2 tubular girder bridges, and 6 draw-bridges."

It is in contemplation to have a royal Bank of Siam. We hope there is no Law at court.

NASSICK town has been connected with the Nassick railway station by tramway, to the great convenience of pilgrims.

WE read in a Madras paper that "For the first time the Maharaja of Vizianagram and the Raja of Bobbili, whose ancestors were at feud with one another, the whole of last century, exchanged visits on the 1st instant."

ACCORDING to Sell's Dictionary of the World's Press, 1891, by Henry Sell,

"There are now 2,263 papers published in the United Kingdom (of which London has 493), and 1,882 magazines of all sorts."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

SIR Charles Dilke's forced rustication is drawing to its close. Driven out of public life, by the disclosure of a scandalous private life, he bowed to the storm, biding his time. He knew his people and he could afford to wait, being neither old nor poor. The rage of the hour was bound to be followed by calmer thoughts and merciful feelings. The generalization of Macaulay that the British are subject to sexennial fits of moral upheaval demanding, and being appeased with, a victim every time, itself had its element of comfort for him. So he —bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust.

He plunged into retirement from Parliament, to emerge in the sea of letters. That geographical resort was always open to him. And he made the best of it, insinuating himself into notice by the employment of his facile pen on the most important public question of the day—Foreign Politics. In the pages of the Fortnightly Review, he poured the results of his ripe experience and judgment in essay after essay which was admired before the authorship was suspected. Thus, quietly, imperceptibly, was the dismissed public man accepted as the accomplished publicist. The national anger has been satisfied, and the remainder of his sentence may be remitted. Meanwhile, he has been showing his face near the old arena. Indeed, he evidently thinks that it is time for him to resume political life. We learn by telegraph that the Liberals of the Forest of Dean have nominated him as their candidate at the next election.

IN the House of Commons, a resolution was moved by Mr. Clark for separate legislatures for England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales. It collapsed on the House being counted.

LONDON has been visited with a heavy snowstorm on the South and East Coasts specially. The telegraph wires were broken down and traffic suspended in many places. Trains are still buried in snow between Exeter and Plymouth, as also other trains in Cornwall. The passengers have, of course, suffered terribly. That they escaped with life is the wonder. To complete the gloom, severe frosts have now set in.

THE Manchester City Council has agreed to advance two and-a-half million sterling to the Ship Canal Company.

THE note of alarm at the supposed decadence of the British Navy, which has been raised of late in the papers and in other circles, seems to have culminated at the Colonial Institute. There, in the presence of Lord Brassey and several Generals, General Edwards read a paper urging Parliament to maintain the strength of the English Navy, to enable Great Britain to take the offensive in time of war, and advocating an Imperial Convention to consider a plan of defence for the Empire.

THE telephone cable between London and Paris has been completed.

THE Viceroy leaves Calcutta on Tuesday, the 24th March, at 10 P.M. He will visit en route Allahabad, Philibit, Naini Tal, Somesur, and Ranikhet, arriving at Simla about the end of April. Lord Lansdowne will open the water-works at Allahabad and the Philibit railway at Lucknow. The Marchioness of Lansdowne started on the tour on Thursday evening. She joins her lord at Naini Tal.

AT the Supreme Legislative Council, yesterday, the Viceroy announced a sitting of the Council on Thursday next, the 19th instant, for consideration of the Age of Consent and the Factory Bills. The remaining business will be finished at a sitting on Saturday following. There being no financial legislation, the Financial Statement will not be presented in Council but only published in the Gazette.

THE Secretary of State for India, under command of Her Majesty, acknowledges, in a despatch to the Viceroy, the receipt of a telegram from Moulvi Mahamad Hussain, President, Anjuman-i-Rifa Islam at Allahabad, expressing the gratitude of Mahomedans at a meeting for stopping the Play "Mahammad." Lord Cross communicated with the Lord Chamberlain on the subject, and points out that the London Theatres never accepted it and there was no occasion for stopping the Play.

THE Governor-General in Council has directed that the rate of postage on letters sent through the Post, by any route, on and after the 1st day of April, 1891, from British India to any British Colony or possession or to any foreign country or Post Office which is or may hereafter be comprised in the Universal Postal Union, shall be two and a half annas for every half ounce or fraction of half an ounce in weight. The exceptions are that the Indian inland rate will apply to Ceylon, by land route or by Indian packet via Tuticorin; to the French and Portuguese possessions in India; to Persia, Indian offices; and to Turkey in Asia, and Guadar (Mekran Coast) Indian offices: The postage on letters to Persia (not Indian offices) will be 2 annas.

THE rates of postage on letters and other articles by post on and after the 1st day of April, 1891, between Aden and any other part of British India, in either direction, will be at the inland postage rates in force for the time being in British India.

THE Postmaster-General admitted in the House of Commons that there was ground for reducing the Australian and Indian postcard rates, but would wait for a favourable occasion for the purpose.

TWO hundred and forty-two Graduates of the Calcutta University have already expressed to the Viceroy their abhorrence of the agitation against the Age of Consent Bill. The total number is expected to run up to three hundred.

OWING to the failure of rain in Rajasthan, great distress prevails. It has become necessary already to open famine-relief works in parts of Marwar. Still we venture to hope that the scarcity is not general, and no great efforts will be needed.

Nearer home, there has been rain within the last few days, to the damage of agriculture in many districts, specially in Behar, from heavy hailstones. Yesterday, we had a good shower in town and the neighbourhood. To-day, the weather is most agreeably cool.

HERE is the official preliminary summation of the Census in Calcutta :

"Occupied houses 65,147, males 4,16,123 and females 2,34,123, total 6,50,246. These results cannot be regarded as perfectly accurate as they have not been checked. They also do not include the figures for the Port or the Canals within the Municipality. The area of the present Municipality does not correspond with that of the year 1881, and the population of certain blocks must be added to and subtracted from the figures of each year before an exact comparison can be made. But it may be said generally that the results show an increase of about seven per cent. in those wards in which comparison is at present possible."

After the arbitrary extension of the limits of the town, annexing outlying tracts, under the new Municipal Act, Calcutta was hardly worth censusing. Certainly, the Census has lost all its public interest for the generality of men. Its worth will commence ten years hence.

TARKACHUDAMANI has been dished in his own gravy by Tarkaratna. He had already been satisfactorily answered in these columns by our Smartha Shiromani, Pandit Jogendra Nath Bhattacharjee, who has for some years been recognised as a Hindu jurist of high authority. The finishing stroke has been delivered by the most learned Pandit of the time. Pandit Shashadhar has left not a leg to stand upon. Not only is his error proved, but his pretensions to learning exposed. For all save sworn agitators, the religious objection to the Bill is exploded.

Pandit Ramnath Tarkaratna, of Santipore, author of Vasudeva Bijya, (a fine Sanskrit epic in 18 cantos, in its second edition), and attached to the Asiatic Society, Bengal, has risen to the height of the occasion and recorded an opinion on the question of the hour, in thorough demolition of the prevailing Gobordhan cry. From an examination of the Shasters, he has arrived at the conclusion that (1) according to Baudhāyana, the husband commits no sin by not performing the garbhadhan ceremony within three years of the period now claimed for it and (2) that the proper age for impregnation is above twelve years. In addition to Baudhāyana, the Pandit quotes from Madhavacharya to shew that omission of any religious act during an illness, under royal or state command, or terror of robbers is no sin. The Tarkaratna quotes chapter and verse to arrive at the correct interpretation of the word ritu which is not to be taken in its ordinary sense but at a certain stage which is defined which should precede conception. The Pandit quotes from the Rig Veda downwards to disprove the religious contention of the Opposition to the Bill. Incidentally, he points out that the writer in a certain issue of the Bangabasi manufactures texts to prove his own point.

We publish elsewhere an abstract of the Tarkaratna's opinion with excellent notes by Professor Nilmoney Nyalankar, M.A., B.L., of the Presidency College.

The scruples of the candid ought now to cease.

IN the advertisement column, will be found the publications of the Calcutta Committee in support of the Age of Consent Bill.

MR. R. FISCHER, Barrister-at-law, convicted under the Christian Marriage Act, has not succeeded in his appeal against the order of the Acting Sessions Judge of Madura, for imprisoning till the rising of the Court and fine of Rs. 1,000, for marrying a couple without authority.

MR. Rudra, Barrister-at-law, has made a name for himself wherever he has been. He can never advocate a cause without coming in hot water with the Judges. At Mysore, he had to apologise to the Judges. Now we find his name struck off the rolls of advocates by a full Bench of the Nizam's city High Court, for passing, while pleading in one of the Residency Courts, some severe strictures on the manner in which justice was dispensed in the Nizam's courts of law.

His impatience of injustice may account for Mr. Rudra's temper, but he must learn to say unpleasant things in a pleasant way.

THE Revd. Mr. Thomas Evans characterizes the opposition of the Bengalis to the Age of Consent Bill as "the death knell of their political aspirations."

IN the Madras Legislative Council, the Hon'ble Mr. Bhashyan Iyengar has introduced what is called the Hindu Gains of Learning Bill. It is intended to secure to a person and his heirs the fruits of his learning, skill and industry, to the exclusion of the other members of an undivided family. The Madura Mail asks "Will Bengal oppose a bill framed on these lines and introduced into the Viceregal Legislative Council, so as to be applicable to all India?"

MR. Lockhart's great picture of the Queen's Jubilee, upon which he had been working for the last three years, has at length been finished. It contains about 270 portraits of celebrated personages, including many Indian Rajas, and has been reproduced in Photo-gravure in order to secure perfect accuracy in the portraits.

HERE is a true cure for snake bite :—

"Dhundu Gunajee, a gardener, employed at the bungalow of the late Sir Mungaldas Nathooobhoy, at Walkeshwar, Bombay, was on Thursday night bitten by a snake while he was working at some trees. His cries brought his relatives on the spot, and they at once set about applying native medicines to the wound. They caused about a dozen fowls to suck the poison from the wound, all of which died on account of the poison imbibed by them. The man rallied in about an hour and is now doing well."

This might be a good remedy if attainable. The fowls are not Bombay ducks, we hope. They are veritable geese.

WE read :—

"A curious case is being heard in a German Law Court. The aggrieved party is a married man. His complaint is that while he was playing a game of cards, the accused, a rosy-cheeked young woman, suddenly slipped her arm round his neck, and kissed him. The man at first made light of the injury, but the matter coming to the notice of his wife he has sued the girl for damages."

Poor fellow ! He must be subject to strong "Home Rule," indeed, to perpetrate such baseness—to persecute, with all a pettifogger's arts and zeal, the gracious Peri. He is luckier at any rate than the poor Assistant Harbour Master nearer home who, surprising his wife in the act of kissing and being kissed, by a stranger, and remonstrating, was told to mind his own business—which seemed to be to provide board and lodging and all comforts for his wife, then and thereafter for her life, and conveniences for her intercourse with her lovers. He of course showed the stranger the door, but the fellow snapped his fingers at him. There never was such an illustration of the Bengali saying about the thief in one's own house. He was driven to seek the assistance of the Police, but in trying, with the help of an inspector, to oust the intruder, he was expelled his own, not before he had received a sound drubbing, the dutiful wife adding insult to injury by hiding his Christian carcass with shoes ! Well might the poor German take example from the fate of the Briton, and try quickly to set himself right with his Christian better and possibly stronger half.

HERE is a group of men known to the world who never led a woman to the altar :—

"Leibnitz, the philosopher, theologian, mathematician, physician, lawyer, historian and philologist in one ; Spinoza, the aggressive thinker ; Descartes, the metaphysician ; Sir Isaac Newton of the gravitation law fame ; Swedenborg, the mystic spiritualistic philosopher ; Emanuel Kant, the veritable hermit and eminent founder of German philosophy ; Voltaire, the cynical atheist ; Horace Walpole, the witty lively letter-writer ; Gibbon, the heterodox historian ; Charles XII of Sweden, the warrior king ; Sir Francis Drake, the adventurous sailor ; Beethoven, the artist ; Richelieu, the cardinal and statesman."

The idea seems to have been to notice the celibacy of only first class men. If so, it is a slur upon the Catholic Church to take one example from it. As for the rest, what claim has Horace Walpole to be on the list ? If the Earl of Orford, why not Cowper, who was a Poet of merit besides a charming letter-writer. And why brand Voltaire as a "cynical atheist ?" Cynic he may have been, but surely no atheist.

ABDUL HUQ alias Sirdar Diler-ul-Mulk sued, in the Bombay High Court, Captain Charles Norman, his late Private Secretary, Messrs. William Watson & Co., Agents of the Captain, and Messrs. Roughton and Byrne, solicitors and solicitors to the Nizam of Hyderabad. The plaintiff prayed that the defendant, Captain Charles Norman, be decreed to deliver up to him a packet referred to in a letter of the 10th October, 1890, and other documents which he may have obtained by means of his employment as private secretary to the plaintiff, and may be restrained from communicating to the defendants, Messrs. Roughton and Byrne, or any other persons, any of the information acquired by him by means of his employment; that in the meantime the defendants, Messrs. William Watson and Co. and Michael T. Carroll, be restrained by injunction from handing to the defendants, Messrs. Roughton and Byrne, the packet entrusted to them by the defendant, Captain Charles Norman; and that Messrs. Roughton and Byrne may be restrained from receiving the packet in question, &c.

Mr. Lang and Mr. Inverarity, instructed by Messrs. Crawford, Burder, Buckland and Bayley, appeared for the plaintiff. The Hon'ble Mr. Latham and Mr. Kirkpatrick, instructed by Messrs. Craigie, Lynch and Owen, representing Messrs. Roughton and Byrne, while Mr. Basil Scott, instructed by Messrs. Conroy and Brown, appeared for Messrs. William Watson and Co., there being no appearance for the defendant Captain Charles Norman.

The suit is based principally on two letters of the Captain to the plaintiff. They are:—

"SS Etolia, off Suez, 19th September, 1890.

My dear Sirdar,—If you wish me to continue to work on your behalf, you had better place £2,500 at my credit with Messrs. William Watson and Co., 28, Appollo Street, Bombay, and desire them to communicate the fact by telegram to me. Should I not hear that this has been done by the 10th October, I shall consider myself at liberty to follow my own course towards the Nizam's solicitors. You have treated me as you have treated everyone else, from Mr. Hawes downwards, who has helped you, with infamous meanness; and unless I receive the £2,500, by the 10th proximo, I shall know what steps to pursue with regard to your case. If you wish me to come out to India again, you must lodge an additional £500 with Watson, and pay me £100 on the 1st of every month as long as the case lasts. You know quite well that without my help you cannot win your case, and that I can put Messrs. Freshfields in possession of facts which will upset you altogether. If I don't hear by telegram, I shall call on Mr. Freshfield and Mr. Labouchere on the 17th October with letters, dates, facts and figures."

"Suez, 10th October, 1890.

My dear Sirdar,—I have received as yet no intimation that you have paid the £2,500 into Messrs. William Watson and Co., of 28, Appollo Street, Bombay. I have therefore written to them that, if within twenty-four hours of their sending this letter to you, they have not received that sum from you, they are to forward to Messrs. Roughton and Byrne a letter which I have this day forwarded to their care. If within twenty-four hours you pay them the said sum of £2,500, then the parcel addressed to Messrs. Roughton is to be handed to you in return for the cash. I have sent them a receipt binding myself on its receipt, not to divulge anything I know of your affairs; and in return they are to take a document from you that you will breathe to no one at any time that you have handed me this money. Should you do so my promise of secrecy is at an end. I think, if you have not already been sensible enough to pay this money to Watson, that you had better do so at once to avoid the loss of your many lakhs; for of course, you know, if the truth is told, you cannot win your case."

The Captain, according to the plaint, left the service of the plaintiff on the 1st September 1890. It appears also that defendant Norman was arrested at Suez on criminal charges, at the instance of Messrs. Aideshir Bhicajee and Co. and Messrs. Herjeemull and Co., both of Bombay. The plaint continues to state to the effect that:—

"On the 21st October 1890, about 7 P.M., the plaintiff saw the defendant Michael Thomas Carroll, who was then manager in Bombay of Messrs. William Watson and Co.'s firm; and he informed the plaintiff that he would carry out the instructions contained in the letters. The plaintiff believed that in order to obtain possession of the packet referred to, that firm were endeavouring to settle the criminal charges brought against the defendant Norman, and had in fact offered to the prosecutors large sums of money in satisfaction of the claims. The packet referred to in the letters contained, the plaintiff believed, certain information relating to the disputes with His Highness the Nizam, which had been obtained by the defendant Norman in his employment by the plaintiff, and he believed that, unless restrained, the defendants Messrs. Watson and Co. and the defendant Carroll would hand over the packet to Messrs. Roughton and Byrne."

The defence taken by Messrs. William Watson and Co. and Mr. Carroll, was that, as agents of the defendant Norman, they had no alternative but to carry out his instructions and that, under an order of the Court, they had handed over to the Prothonotary the letter addressed by the defendant Norman to Messrs. Roughton and Byrne, and as they had no interest in the suit and simply acted under instructions, they claimed exemption from the suit. Messrs. Watson and Company were subsequently allowed by agreement to retire from the suit on payment of their own costs.

Messrs. Roughton and Byrne deny endeavouring to settle the criminal charge against Norman in any way whatever, and generally repudiate their connection with the Nizam except through their Mr. Roughton who alone attended to the business of His Highness.

"They knew nothing of the packet, and had received no instructions from any person regarding it, nor had they written or done anything connected with it, save that after the institution of this suit, they had written letters to the plaintiff's solicitors, denying all knowledge of the packet. They had no desire or intention of receiving the packet from the defendant Norman, and had no objection whatever to the injunction restraining them from receiving the packet, but they considered that under the circumstance the injunction was wholly unnecessary; and that as they had been unnecessarily made parties to the suit, their costs ought to be paid by the plaintiff."

Mr. George Woodford Roughton was examined as a witness. He objected to a letter being read in Court, as it was addressed to him in his capacity of Solicitor to the Nizam's Government, and claimed privilege. There was a discussion, and the Court took time to consider the question.

STRANGE are the ways of men. No doubt, there are many who are resisting the attempt at legislation from a fear lest their occupation might end. At the same time, there are others who are sufferers from the evil custom, rampant in the metropolitan districts of Bengal, of all India—who yet are not ashamed to join the unmeaning cry against the Bill. Some of them, however, are evidently more sinned against than sinning. Such is an illustrious lady of Bengal, who herself is a cruel victim of garbhadhan practice—of the insane Bengali haste to marry and beget. Were it not for it, she would not in her age be without the consolation of an heir of her body to succeed to the vast estate left by her deceased husband. Pathetic, indeed, is the story of the loss of her only daughter from the consequences of the early consummation of marriage and of premature maternity, and yet she is reported to have telegraphed her opposition to a Bill which she, of all people, ought to be foremost in supporting. There are, thank God, ladies of another stamp. A respectable lady of Calcutta and the unfortunate grandmother of two girls both killed by early maternity, is not only in thorough sympathy with the Bill herself, but she is reported to be pouring out her own spirit into the sterner sex of her household, where these betray signs of giving way to the influence of the agitators. "Go," the bereaved grand old lady tells them, "and tell Government for legalizing an even higher age, or there is no safety for our daughters."

THE INCOME-TAX.

EVIDENTLY the Income-tax bids fair to be a permanent burden. Or, why is it retained, after the removal of the especial emergency which it was imposed to meet, and in spite of the protest of the Chamber of Commerce, and, indeed, of a consensus of non-official opinion condemning its unsuitable, inquisitorial and oppressive character? If Government had the will to repeal it, they could easily find the way. There is no doubt that the revenue under all the principal heads is expanding with a steadiness as gratifying as fiscal officers could wish. Turning to the reports of Divisional Commissioners, one is struck by the testimony they afford of the constant development of all the sources of the Provincial revenue. There is increase under Land Revenue, Stamps, Customs, Registration and Railways. Under Excise, there is, indeed, a temporary falling-off here and there, but, taking the country as a whole, the excise reforms have not affected the revenue, and the decrease in one or two provinces is but temporary. We may therefore safely say that there is year after year such marked improvement in the revenue from most of the principal sources, that if Government really cared to withdraw the Income-Tax, they might do so without any difficulty. But this is not to be.

All the ingenuity of Government is employed in justifying its retention. It is explained how they cannot wisely abandon any existing resource—how neither an undeniable surplus nor the fertility of the revenue affords justification for such abandonment. Nor is much ingenuity, perhaps, called for in the case. There is always some element of real uncertainty in the financial problem which is easily made much of, and, for the rest, the estimates of receipts and expenditure are, with a little manipulation, capable of supporting any foregone conclusion.

After the recent correspondence between the Government of India and the Chamber of Commerce, all hope for the repeal or even the revision of the Income-tax has been rudely dispelled from the heart of the people. Yet, curiously enough, it returns, like hope against hope, with the recurrence of every Budget, if only to receive a fresh repulse. For some time past, ominous foreshadowings of the coming disappointment have been flying before our vision. Announcements, evidently by way of feelers,—since, however, unfortunately confirmed by the Government themselves—were published that there was no repeal of taxation to be looked for in the ensuing Budget. Sometimes, inspired writings appeared in quasi-official organs, deprecating the popular demands for economy or abandonment of existing taxes. Under the head of "Financial Shadows," appeared recently in the Pioneer, an able and plausibly argued leader, the object of which is to show that, as things are, Government cannot but jealously maintain the existing resources intact. With much of what is said in support of this view, one cannot but agree. The necessity of a large and annually recurrent expenditure for the military defences of the Empire, is undeniable. The fluctuations of the exchange in view of the action of the United States, and the steady decline of the opium revenue from China's betaking to the cultivation of the poppy, are also serious difficulties to be reckoned with. But if these are good and valid reasons for a policy of financial caution, are there no equally good and valid reasons for conforming to the terms on which Government were popularly understood to have imposed the Income-tax? Will nothing be ever done to give a relief to the taxpayer which we believe to be much needed?

But the truth is, Government do not share this belief. The official advisers of Government are of opinion that the unpopularity of the Income-tax has disappeared and the country has learnt to be reconciled to it. But this is not true. It is a constant source of irritation to the people of all classes, while the petty oppression committed under colour of the law by the assessing agency, in compelling the poorer classes of tradesmen, who never earn the taxable minimum of income, to pay, is something frightful. But this fact, it is apparently not in officials to bring before Government, and, as for unofficial testimony, it has little chance of acceptance before official testimony.

Our contemporary of the Indian Daily News writes justly on this subject, and we are so thoroughly pleased with what he has said that we quote his remarks in extenso :—

"The Pioneer has an article on the decline of the opium revenue, in which we are told 'the moral is that existing sources of revenue, whether from direct or indirect taxation, must be carefully guarded in view of the contingency that the revenue derived from the opium monopoly may eventually vanish altogether. Economy in administration is a term glibly used by those who would reform the Government of India off the face of the earth, but with heavy interest charges to be met in sterling from a depreciated silver currency, and with one main channel of revenue slowly but surely closing up, retrenchment in expenditure cannot alone meet the case.' We wonder is this meant as a demi-semi-official intimation that no remission of taxation, either under the salt tax or the income-tax, is to be looked for in the coming Budget. If so, we are tempted to ask whether the financial genius of the Indian Government can find no other and no less objectionable means of raising revenue than to tax a necessary of life to such an extent as to constitute a serious hardship to millions of its subjects, and deprive large numbers of them of an article which is essential to the preservation of health, or to enforce another tax which is, and must be from the conditions of the country, grossly unjust in its incidence and a source of vexatious oppression. It is the duty of a Government where representative institutions do not exist, to give attention to such public opinion as is able to find expression; and if the Government of India are unable to hit upon a medium of taxation which would yield a large revenue without either raising any necessary of life to prohibitive prices for a large section of the population, or introducing vexatious, inquisitorial, and oppressive procedure, public opinion will readily indicate one. Public opinion in India would greatly prefer a revival of the import duties to a continuance in its present form, not to speak of extension, of the unpopular income-tax, or to a high salt-tax. Public opinion in England would no doubt be disposed to take a different view; but in all the circumstances, is it not the duty of the Government of India to raise the point, and endeavour to establish the principle that in the fiscal relations between England and India those entrusted with the administration on the spot have a greater claim to say what imposts are best suited to the country than has been allowed them in the past? There would be no just reason for opposing a revival of the cotton import duties on the selfish ground of home manufacturing interests if a countervailing duty were imposed on the out-turn of Indian mills."

Our contemporary has given expression to the real public opinion in this country on the subject. If that opinion could prevail with anything like the power with which English public opinion swept away the import duties, the Income-tax would not be maintained so long.

THE GARBHADHAN VYAVASTA.*

[A Condensed Version of the Opinion in Bengali of Pandit Ramnath Tarkaratna, of Santipore, author of Vasudeva Vijaya, with notes by Professor Nilmoney Mookerjee Nyalankar, M.A., B.L., Presidency College, Calcutta.]

Question I.—Does the husband incur any sin in not approaching his wife at the first menstruation, and is there any mode of expiation to be gone through?

Question II.—What is the proper time for conception (Garbhādhāna)?

Answer to Question I.—

Parāsara enjoins in general terms :—

"He who does not approach his wife who has taken her ablution after menstruation, is guilty of fœticide, and there is no doubt about it."

Whilst Vaudhāyana lays down :—

"He who approaches not his wife during her menses for three years, shall undoubtedly incur a guilt like that of fœticide."

Now the conflict between the two Rishis is more apparent than real. It can be obviated by the wellknown rule of interpretation which says that a general injunction can not prohibit a particular one. Hence, it is evident that the rule of Parāsara applies only to those who do not have intercourse with their wives at any time during the first three years from the first menstruation.

Moreover, Vyāsa specifies other exceptions to the rule of Parāsara. He says :—

"One who is diseased, confined, and staying away from home, and also one on the prohibited days, shall be exonerated from the sin of fœticide if he does not approach his wife during her menses. By avoiding a woman, aged, barren, and of no character, one whose children do not live, one who is not in her menses, one who has no signs of pubescence and one who has many children, the husband is free from fear (of sin)."

In the work called Grihya-Sangraha, the different stages of maidenhood are thus defined :—

"(1) One who has not menstruated is (called) Gaurī, (2) one who

* Opinion on the Garbhādhān Ceremony according to Hinay Shastras, Delivered to Government. By Pandit Ramnath Tarkaratna, of Santipore, author of Vasudeva Vijaya (an epic in Sanskrit) a Pandit attached to the Asiatic Society of Bengal, &c. Published by the Calcutta Committee in support of the Age of Consent Bill.

has menstruated is Rohini, (3) one who has no signs of pubescence is Kanyā, (4) and (lastly) one who has not her breasts developed is Nagnika.*

The writer of the Grihya-sutra, Gobhila, mentions the signs of pubescence, and the exegete, Bhattānārayana, in explaining them, prohibits even sleeping with such girls on the same bed,* so as to avoid giving them any pain by premature intercourse.

From the above remarks, it follows that a girl till she manifests undoubted and visible signs of pubescence, should not be allowed to have intercourse with her husband, even though she has menstruated. The conclusion is, therefore, inevitable that where there is no guilt, there can be no expiation.

Now I pass on to the consideration of the second question, "What is the proper time for conception?" Let us quote from the Jyotish-Tatwa of Raghunandan†:—

"The advice I would offer to those who are unable to follow the aforesaid injunctions, is this—'If a husband, twenty years old, has intercourse with a woman who has completed her sixteenth year (when the blood in her womb is purified), good offspring will be born, but if they are of less age, their offspring will be bad.'"

Raghunandan thus defines menstruation (ritu) when it is taken in its proper sense:—

"That condition in a woman, in which the flow of blood is stopped in three days, and unattended with pain, in which the blood is as red as the jāvā-flower, and devoid of bad smell, is the Ritu, or menstruation."

When the words ritu (menstruation) and ritumatī (menstruated) are taken in their right senses, according to the above definition, there can be no misgiving as to the right interpretation of texts bearing on the subject.

The principal object of marriage is to secure male issue, for the due performance of obsequial rites; and to attain

* Those who do not see much harm in allowing immature girls to sleep with their husbands on the same bed, will do well to refer to Bhattānārayana.—Translator.

Yes, and specially our good friends the amiable Pir Ali Rajas and Baboos of Calcutta, who have ranged themselves among the Coryphæuses of the Garbhādhān Chorus. They claim—and they have, on numberless occasions, in a variety of shapes, asserted—Bhattānārayana as their first progenitor in Bengal.—ED. R. & R.

† It is a wonder that those who follow Raghunandan implicitly, should misunderstand and misinterpret him so egregiously. The same Raghunandan who sanctions sexual intercourse at the first menstruation, condemns it before the husband is twenty years old, and the wife has completed her sixteenth year, and also defines menstruation which qualifies a girl for proper intercourse, and which is only possible after she has attained some degree of maturity. The so-called followers of the great exegete make a fool of him, and instead of reconciling many apparent inconsistencies occurring in the different parts of his Ashtāvinsati-Tatwa, cite only such portions of it as are in favour of customs of very recent growth. A few lines after, the same compiler quotes another stanza which says, 'Should a woman who is in her sixteenth year, i. e., who has not completed her sixteenth year, give birth to or conceive a child, she, her child and her husband shall die.' What would be the meaning of all these denunciations, if premature intercourse were sanctioned, and not only sanctioned, but its omission visited with the punishment provided for fornicide. Curiously enough, Raghunandan, in his chapter on Dvirāgama cites a stanza which directly supports the present legislation. It is this:—"Should a bride at her twelfth year go to the house of her husband, then her husband will die." (Samprāte dvādasē varṣe patim hanti dvirāgame). Hence, before a girl has completed her twelfth year, she will not be allowed to go to the house of her husband and the couple cannot live as husband and wife. This prohibition does, by implication, put a stop to dvirāgama of a bride before her twelfth year, though there is no express provision to that effect. But the present custom that obtains only in Bengal runs counter to that prohibition. None of the advocates of the Age of Consent Bill, so far as I am aware, has quoted the above stanza. Some of us are, however, old enough to remember with what pertinacity the Pandits of the last generation would stick to the above injunction and make no exception, in violation of it. The Pandits of the present generation have, however, at the bidding of their rich patrons, hit upon a plan to do away with that prohibition, by allowing what is called Dhulpāye-lagna, according to which, a newly married girl can go to the house of her husband on the very day of her return to her father's house from her first journey.—Translator.

such an object, intercourse with young girls, well developed, is enjoined.

In the Rig-Veda, Mandal 10, Sukta 183 and Rig 2, it is mentioned that a wife when yuvati can give birth to male issue.

Now the celebrated exegete Sāyana interprets the term yuvati into tarunī, which is thus defined in the Bhāva-prakasha, a medical work of great repute:—

"Upto the age of sixteen years a woman is called vāla (maiden), then upto the age of thirty-two, she is to be known as tarunī (young woman), and then till her fiftieth year, she is adhi-rudhā (matron), and after that she is vridhdā (aged.)"

The renowned medical authority Susrata, in the chapter called suridasthana, affirms:—

"If a male before he attains his twenty-fifth year produces conception in a female of less than sixteen years, the child shall die either in the womb, or shall not live long after the birth, or live as a weakling. Hence one should not cause conception in a girl of tender age."*

Now there are certain authorities which are in favour of intercourse soon after the marriage. It is time to cite and explain them.

Gobhila says:—

"Some authorities hold that intercourse may be permitted three days after marriage."

Aswalāyana says:—

"When intercourse takes place three nights, twelve nights, or one year after the marriage, a son like a rishi will be born."

Paraskar says:—

"One should have no intercourse for a year, or for twelve nights, or six nights or three nights at least."

Authorities like the above evidently relate to what is called the Gāndharva marriage, which the bridegroom and bride themselves contract after mutual agreement, and which is only possible in case of grown-up brides.

Manu permits such a marriage to a Brahman, and holds:—

"A maiden who has menstruated should wait three years, and then after that she should get a husband of her own caste. In such a case neither the wife, nor the husband incurs any sin."

It is now easy to reconcile the above dictum of Manu with that of Parāsara who lays down:—

"A Brahman who, in his infatuation, marries a menstruated girl, becomes the husband of a Sudra woman; he should not be spoken with, and should be expelled from the dining company (of his peers)."

This denunciation can touch only marriages other than the Gāndharva when no expiation is gone through. But when such is the case, the menstruated girl becomes purified and is fit for being married according to the Brāhma and other three methods of first class marriage.

The author of the Nirnaya-Sindhu has shewn all that, when explaining the text of Aswalāyana,

"Kanyām ritumatīm suddhām kṛtvā nishkṛitimatmanah," &c.

Gobhila, in the chapter on "Who is fit for marriage," does not prohibit marriage with a menstruated girl, though he gives preference to one unmenstruated, affirming that the unmenstruated is the best.†

* Any scion of a good Radhiya Brahman family in Bengal might vouch for the truth of the statement that, in bygone generations, premature conception was a rare occurrence. Had it been insisted upon before as at the present time, misalliances in the best families, instead of being an exception, would have been the rule, and the purity of descent would have been a thing of the past.—Translator.

† Any one who has any acquaintance with the Shastras cannot but see that our ancient lawgivers have had three objects in view. First, purity of sexual relations; secondly, legitimacy of offspring; and thirdly, birth of healthy and virtuous offspring. These three objects they have striven to secure, first, by enjoining fathers to bestow their daughters to good husbands, secondly, by denouncing husbands staying away from their wives, and, thirdly, by regulating intercourse between husband and wife. They have laid down that if a good bridegroom is at hand, the father can give to him his daughter in marriage before her pubescence; but in no case would they sanction premature intercourse or intercourse on prohibited lunar days or intercourse by a diseased husband, for that would defeat the primary object of marriage, i. e., birth of healthy and virtuous offspring. Custom followed in the wake of these salutary injunctions from generation to generation, until, in Bengal, extraneous influences, which it is needless to describe here, have produced a change which every educated man must deplore.—Translator.

A DELIVERANCE OF AGE ON THE BILL.

TO DR. SAMBHU CHUNDER MOOKERJEE.

MY DEAR SIR,—I thank you and your collaborators for the honor you have done me by summoning me to a conference on the subject of the Age of Consent Bill, but I deeply regret that, being a confirmed invalid, I am unable to leave my house. Your summons emblematises to my mind a call to duty by every individual conscience which has been awakened by the agitation on the question. Coterie debates are taking place in almost every home on the momentous topic of child marriage and the bearing of the little Bill upon it. I have my own share of cogitations, and I gladly take part in talk and argumentation with members of my family and intelligent and learned friends who visit me. Not having ever taken part in public life, I believe, so far as I am conscious, that I can approach the subject under the dry light of reason and deal with it as a problem of casuistry. As I have thus been exercising my mind, I may be justified to have my say on the subject and, anticipating your permission, I shall endeavour to give expression to my humble views.

1. The general aim of the Bill is to protect Indian female children, of all creeds and nationalities under the age of 12 years, from physical or organic injuries, originating from concupiscent acts of males, and that too in amendment of a thirty years' old law of the same kind, by extending the age from 10 to 12 years. It is such a beneficent measure as to preclude the possibility of there being two opinions on it in any civilized community, and in fact nothing but words of approbation have been heard from oppositionists of all shades of views so far as its principle is concerned.

2. It embraces in its scope two classes of females under 12 years, unmarried and married. With reference to the former, which includes prostitutes and concubines and the seduced of all grades of society, no dissentient voice can possibly be raised. Proposals, if I mistake not, have come from opposers as well as supporters of the Bill to raise the age of consent in their case still higher than what has been recommended; nor has the power of the legislature to legislate in this respect been questioned in any quarter.

3. In respect of married girls, no ground of opposition exists among people who, from religion, practice, principle and motives and circumstances do not or cannot or even strongly dislike to, marry their daughters or allow consummation of marriage under 12 years. This very large portion, I may say a vast majority of Her Majesty's Indian subjects of all castes and creeds, not only remain unaffected by the Bill, but their instincts should impel them, unless otherwise led, to hail it with pleasure. Opposition, however, in a marked form, comes from Bengal, and in order to ascertain the extent of this local opposition, we must exclude from the province, districts in which the most objectionable forms of child marriage or its attendant foul practices do not prevail, as also the larger portion of its inhabitants who profess the Mahomedan faith, and then, examining the remaining portion of Bengali Hindus, keep out of reckoning the Rarhi Kulin Brahmans who, in respect of their marriages, are guided by their own conventional rules and allow their females, as a rule, to be married at a higher age, also that class of critics who want to discuss the Bill on its merits but have thought fit and convenient to join the hostile camp under various impulses. It will now be easy to take muster of the residuum of Bengali Hindu oppositionists.

4. Now I fail to see how injuries to female children from the congress of males—whether those injuries be of a patent and violent form, or less hurtful at first but working insidiously and with certainty, according to the rule of averages—how such injuries, which in the case of children all over the world are per se wrong in their nature, wrong in the view of civilized nations, revolting to humanity and to the universal sense of justice and which must appear so too to the oppositionists whoever they are, in reference to unmarried female children—can be at once metamorphosed into a right, proper and humane thing, by the magic application of the holy word married to qualify the phrase Hindu female children of Bengal proper, by any amount of special pleading of the said residuum of its Hindu inhabitants.

5. I humbly admit the right of every enlightened Government to combat evils of such enormity, however they may appear to the people familiarised with them by long established custom or by any particular religion sanctioning such custom in respect of married life. Such right is identical with the raison d'être of the British Government, and it has been illustrated, times out of number, by its legislating acts, and is being exercised every day by Judge-made laws, and therefore it cannot clash against its ab initio declared policy and the Queen's Proclamation which have no meaning when opposed to the eternal laws of the universe.

6. Most irrelevant, far-fetched or barely possible issues having been mingled up with the criticisms against the Bill, and false or exaggerated fears and perhaps pseudo-patriotism having been imported into the discussion, the voice of Young Bengal and right-minded Old Bengal is silent which would otherwise have been loud-mouthed to protest against the infernal practices in connection with child marriage in Bengal proper, to depict which the pen of a Stead and a Pall Mall Gazette is needed, after the thick veil is torn asunder that shrouds them. I am an old man of three score and ten, and I cannot resist weeping over their silence, and here I must confess reason's light remains not dry but I must brush up.

7. Viewed under the fierce light of truth, Bengal proper of to-day exhibits in respect of the nature of its child-marriages and in respect of the practices under their shelter, the most demoralising acts in the shape of antepubertal commerce between lad and lass the same acts and premature sexual intercourse in the case of gross misalliances in respect of ages with all the serious consequences of an insidious nature aggravated by the proverbial modesty and power of endurance of our females, by the association of poverty in most instances and various other circumstances.

8. The particular custom of Garbhadhan which is pleaded against the Bill, is in respect of the actual custom, generally nonexistent. Nowadays, on the first occurrence of an event in a female, the ceremony which is performed is called the Punarvivaha or second marriage. With reference to most Brahman and all other castes, the family priest officiates in it, and at its termination the husband does not necessarily approach his spouse. The Garbhadhan has been unearthed to emphasise the necessity on such Punarvivaha occasion of the sexual congress—a necessity which, driven to its logical conclusion, would justify an adult of any age and of any vigorous development of body to approach his wife on the above occasion, however tender be her age or delicate her frame, because of her exhibiting an initial sign of approaching possible ovulation. If this were true, if it were as prevalent as it has been urged, it would more strongly justify Government interference.

9. Thus then reason, humanity, justice and true statesmanship prompted the incubation of the law which should ride roughshod upon any old custom or pretended religion, to the contrary, specially that which is corroding the vital energies of Bengal. As a matter of fact, however, neither custom nor religion can be pleaded in favor of the opposition so far as the Garbhadhan is concerned, and the Government, with the most commendable and most tremulous regard for our religion, so long as it jars not with public policy, has, in regard to this legislative measure, confined itself to a particular custom, and contemplated only an educative effect upon the people, in respect of eschewing an admitted evil custom—a custom against which young men are already fighting, but not always with success. It is well known also that, owing to various reasons, though not all of them of the best sort, marriages of girls in their 12th or 13th year, among some high and middle castes, are coming into vogue. The proposed measure would help the spread of this salutary practice. In connection with this practice, it is worth noticing that the pushing up of the nubile ages of girls glaringly proves the fact that, as a general rule, they do not exhibit their catamenial condition until some time between 12 and 13—a fact which corroborates strongly the testimony of the Doctors on this subject, which Government has collected.

10. The only argument against the Bill or rather criticism in respect of its merits, to which I have conscientiously been able to attach some importance, is that which applies to allowing nature to tempt the exercise of the concupiscent appetite under peculiar favorable circumstances of connubial life, whereby it would be next to impossible to prevent the breach of the proposed law which, when proved, would be most disastrous to the very creature whom the law wants to protect. But thinking over the subject, I am humbly of this mind. No human institution can be perfect, and we must accept as inevitable certain evils which form the black side of a measure compensated by its bright side. Then again penalties attached to the breach are of a graded character, and it is not always that the highest forms will have to be resorted to, nor in the nature of the case can such convictions be many. Antepubertal commerce can only be sufficiently checked by home influence, but its stealthy prevalence in an immoral atmosphere would be minimised by the law hanging in terrorem over the heads of the married people and their parents. As to the fear of false prosecutions, they may be successfully checked by attaching very heavy penalties to them, while at the same time the prosecution under the law might be left to those whose interest it would not be naturally to conceal the crime.

11. There are many things which may be suggested as adjuncts to the fair and smooth operation of the law when passed, but these details can be worked out by wise heads and men of practical knowledge. It occurs to me only now that the law should not come into operation under less than a year, and that during this period all sorts of publicity that could be devised should be so given to the law that it may reach with certainty every home. Some forms of registration combining in one view birth, marriage and the first birth of such marriage, death and widowhood, with circumstances of age, &c., may be devised.

12. If we are satisfied in our consciences that, we are right, with, maybe, simple shades of difference of opinion in minor matters, we should as honest men and loyal subjects represent, as we really feel, our convictions in support of the Bill, which is indeed a beneficent measure such as under existing circumstances Government in its wisdom is bound to adopt.

Shovabazar, 15th February, 1891.

ANANDA KRISHNA BOSE.

THE AGE OF CONSENT.

BY "A HINDU"

With Notes by Dr. J. N. Bhattacharjee.

Premature intercourse is admitted on all hands to be a grave evil. But what is premature intercourse? According to our Rishis, pre-menstrual intercourse with a girl, whatever her age, is premature, and has accordingly been denounced by them in no measured terms. But according to the Government of to-day, intercourse, whether pre- or post-menstrual, with a girl under 12 is premature. Evidently, the Government of 30 years ago did not think so. Has it since been proved by physiology beyond the possibility of doubt that that is so? It is on record that in the early days of steam mills and factories, boy and girl operatives were allowed in some establishments in England to sleep in the same place under the impression that they were but children and no harm could result from the arrangement, and the result was that some girls of 12 and also under were found to be eniente. The climate of our country may possibly have some little influence in accelerating maturity. I know of a well-known gentleman in the Sub-Executive Service who was born when his mother was only 11, and the gentleman's physique is admirable. The mother too is not known to have suffered in any way. I know a young man (who is an assistant jailor now) whose physique is absolutely enviable, in spite of the fact that he was born when his mother was but 11. The mother too is as healthy as any average Hindu lady of her age. The Rishis, whom we are bound to credit with infallibility, have also indicated their opinion on the physiological aspect of the question by laying down that consummation of marriage is to be performed ordinarily (1) on the first occurrence of a certain event in the girl, though they expected that that event might occur while a girl was still under 12.

If the supposed conflict in Raghunandan's digests does not exist, then it follows that he believed, on the authority of the Rishis, that Garbhadhan on the first occurrence of a certain event was not premature from any point of view.

The argument in my last letter, which, you say, is rather one in favour of the position that sickly children were not wanted, is also one in support of the theory that spiritual bliss was attributed to the possession of a son because of the necessity to society of male members and also of the position that, according to our Rishis, the outcome of consummation of marriage with wives under 12 need not be sickly. If they did not want sickly children, and if at the same time they directed (2) consummation of marriage ordinarily on the first occurrence of a certain event in the wife, which event might in their own estimation take place at 11, it follows that they expected that the outcome of such consummation would not be sickly. It is probable that they thought they had sufficiently provided against sickly children resulting from marriage, by laying down that men shall not ordinarily marry under 24.

It is possible to deduce a very strong argument in favour of the position that the Rishis commanded consummation of marriage at the very earliest opportunity, from the reason assigned by them for the punishment to which the guardians of a girl expose themselves by letting her remain a maiden till after she has menstruated. The reason is said to be that they become guilty of fœticide as often as there are ritus during her maidenhood. That shews wherein lay the gravamen of the offence of the guardians. According to the Rishis, their offence evidently lay in their suffering an opportunity (3) for impregnation to go by without the possibility of impregnation, such opportunity beginning, according to them, as soon as a girl menstruated. What could they mean by laying down that the guardians would be guilty of fœticide of all things? The fiction is pregnant with significance. Menstruation endows a girl

(1) Yes.—The rule as to approaching the wife at every Ritu, including the first and the last, appears at first sight to be laid down in such broad terms as not to admit of any exception. Yet the commentators have deduced very important exceptions as we have shown already. We do not say that the injunction is not binding at all. Our contention is that the rule is subject to such reasonable exceptions as are deducible from other texts and rendered necessary by the dictates of common sense and humanity.

(2) Here is a begging of the question at issue.

(3) We have again to warn "A Hindu" against attaching too much importance to the public utterances of the leaders of mankind. Their object is anyhow to enforce obedience to their fiats. There need not be much of truth in their reasoning or in their threats. By the very necessity of their position, they are obliged to adopt any weapon that they can lay their hands on, provided it is sufficiently effective for the purpose of persuasion or bullying. If the inference, drawn by "A Hindu" from the denunciation pronounced by the Rishis on fathers who neglect to give their daughters in marriage before Ritu, were sound, then how is it that Medhatithi lays down that consummation is not proper on the first occurrence of a certain event within the first year after marriage?

with conceptual potentiality, and those who are instrumental in preventing the potentiality from becoming an actuality, are guilty of destroying what the actuality might have been.

There cannot be the least doubt that the Rishis were swayed by practical considerations in enjoining the early marriage of girls and ascribing spiritual merits to such marriage. There is also as little doubt that the considerations suggested by the Dr. in note 7 to my last letter, were among them. But it appears to me that they had also other objects in view, one of them being to secure the greatest possible increase of population, (4) consistently with marriage in regular form. The problem for the social scientist of early times was how to bring about increase of population, as the problem for the social scientist of modern times is how to get rid of extra population and to restrict population within reasonable bounds. If the marriage of all girls were secured before they menstruated so that impregnation would be possible at the very earliest opportunity, his object would be accomplished.

I hope I have said enough to shew that, according to the Rishis, the child-bearing age is the attainment of puberty, which is indicated by a very characteristic natural phenomenon in the girl. The fact that some girls do conceive immediately after the first occurrence of a certain event, affords physiological proof of the position.

I never meant to say that the begetting of a child is obligatory, even where it is impossible or very likely to be attended with danger. It cannot be obligatory in the first case, for the simple reason that it is not possible to achieve an impossibility. It is not obligatory in the second case according to the Rishis themselves, but they have taken care to enumerate the circumstances in which they consider it likely to be attended with danger. For instance, they provide that marriage need not be consummated on the first occurrence of a certain event in the wife, if either the husband or the wife is ill at the time. My opinion is that there is nothing in the Arsha Shastras (5) to shew that the Rishis thought post-menstrual consummation of marriage with wives under 12 to be likely to be attended with danger. On the contrary, they would appear to have been of opinion that post-menstrual consummation of marriage, irrespective of the age of the girl, was safe enough. Possibly, they were right too. Unless menstruation is brought about by artificial stimulation, its occurrence denotes the subject's capacity for sexual intercourse.

I do not suppose that there is no provision in our codes for the guardianship of childless widows. What I suppose is that there is none in our early codes, and also that the son is the most approved and desirable guardian. We all know what sort of guardians the husband's relatives prove to the childless widow.

My reasoning, I think, need not justify remarriage or niyoga. My argument is that, since remarriage or niyoga is not permitted and the Rishis appear to discourage either and yet lay down that a son is necessary to the widow, both for spiritual and worldly purposes, there appears to be reason enough for the injunction that marriage is to be consummated at the very earliest opportunity. I gave sufficient indication of my argument in my first letter.

Hindu law is already harsh enough to widowed and sonless daughters and daughters-in-law, but the proposed legislation will make it still harsher, by depriving them of certain spiritual, domestic and pecuniary possibilities that even the harsh Hindu law does not deny them.

It is doubtful if the prevention of degeneration of species comes within the legitimate scope of legislation by an alien Government.

The age at which girls are now married is generally 11, and if things were simply left to themselves, the marriageable age of girls would, in about ten years hence, be pushed up to 12, by sheer force of circumstances and advance in ideas.

THE AGE OF CONSENT.

I have hitherto considered the Bill from the religious point of view. But from whatever point of view it may be looked at, it appears to be open to objections out of number. The following is a moderate indictment :—

- (1.) It has been most unconstitutionally introduced.
 - (a) It was sprung upon the people.
 - (b) Its introduction has not at all been justified.
- (2.) It is being equally unconstitutionally hurried through the Council.
- (3.) It is a direct violation of the Queen's Proclamation.

(4) Why is it that neither the Rishis nor the Commentators encourage the begetting of more than one child? Manu himself lays down that one son is necessary for spiritual purposes, the others are begotten of lust only, Manu Chap. IX., Vs. 106-107.

(5) It should be borne in mind that our shastras do not profess to lay down rules for all possible cases that might arise. They contain only some general rules, by the proper interpretation of which we are to regulate our action in life.

(4.) It is calculated to create, and has actually created, great discontent.

(5.) It is pure nonsense, a gross abuse of language, to call the act proposed by the Bill to be created into an offence "rape."

(6.) It is bad law to declare such an act "rape." A man can never commit "rape" on his own wife.

(7.) It is equally bad ethics to stigmatise the act as "rape."

(8.) The Bill is opposed to physiology, inasmuch as it affects to lay down a hard-and-fast age where none can be laid down.

(9.) The punishment provided is monstrously out of proportion to the enormity of the moral delinquency involved in the offence wanted to be created.

(10.) For that very reason, the proposed legislation is bound to fail of its object.

The Government, the Police, some District Magistrates and some Sessions Judges are always finding fault with Indian juries for their supposed tendency towards acquittal. But whoever has given thought to the subject and made careful enquiry about it, knows that ordinarily juries are more convictingly inclined than Judges or Magistrates. It is only in murder cases that juries are found to incline towards acquittal. Mr. Beighton, of the Bengal Civil Service, in an article in the Calcutta Review of some four or five years ago, discovered some little insight into the nature of cases in which trial by jury resulted in miscarriage of justice. But what, do you think, is the reason of juries inclining towards acquittal in murder cases, while they shew a decided inclination towards conviction in other cases? It is simply the enormity of the punishment provided. Capital punishment is opposed to the instincts of the average Indian. The Indian Penal Code has been bodily adopted by the Cooch Behar State, but never has a murderer been visited with the extreme penalty of the law in that state, and, probably, never will be. (I do not say that a murderer ought not to be visited with capital punishment.) What I want to make out is just this, that the provision of capital sentence for murder is largely answerable for the unreasonably large number of acquittals by Indian juries in murder cases. The thought of the gallows to which their verdict of guilty will send the prisoner, is ever present to their minds and induces them, even in cases in which there ought not to be any reasonable doubts as to the prisoner's guilt, to persuade themselves that the little morbid doubts that occur to them are reasonable. If juries could be only assured that their recommendation for not exacting the extreme penalty from the prisoner would be listened to in every case in which they might think fit to make it, a much larger number of convictions in murder cases would be equally assured.

Similarly, if the proposed legislation were to provide a reasonable punishment for the offence sought to be created, there might be some chance of conviction by juries.

Talking of the subject of the punishment provided, the question naturally arises, What are things coming to? Are we returning to those barbarous times when murder and larceny were grouped together in the same category, both being punishable with death?

(11.) The very enormity of the punishment provided will arouse in the public mind a most unhealthy sympathy for the breakers of the proposed law and necessitate perjury and sometimes forgery and bribery to get them off.

(12.) The proposed law is likely to be inoperative; or (13.) It will operate very hardly on those very child-wives, for whose protection it is intended, by depriving them of their husbands.

(14.) A mere prosecution under the proposed law, even though it may end in acquittal, will produce unbearable scandal and consequent estrangement of feelings between husband and wife.

(15.) The proposed law will operate hardly on Hindu child-wives by, in some cases, depriving them of certain religious, domestic and pecuniary possibilities they otherwise have under the Hindu law.

(16.) It will serve to afford a very convenient handle to designing, unscrupulous men to gratify their spite by causing the greatest possible indignities to the families of their enemies by invoking the proposed law against them.

(17.) The safeguard supposed to be afforded by the non-cognisable character of the offence sought to be created, is more imaginary than real, so that, in spite of the non-cognisability of the offence, the proposed law must place considerable power in the hands of the Police. It is competent to Magistrates to take cognisance of any offence (a) upon receiving a complaint of facts which constitute such offence, (b) upon a Police report of such facts, and (c) upon information received from any person other than a Police officer, or upon his own knowledge or suspicion, that such

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Some occupations tend to the development of certain diseases, and those who toil as miners are peculiarly liable to rheumatism, lumbago, and other allied complaints. In the goldfields and copper mines Holloway's remedies have been largely patronized by the workers to their very great advantage, and they can be confidently recommended as invaluable remedies for inward congestion, spasms and cramps in the bowels, and all those conditions of the lungs and liver to which those who work underground or in impure atmospheres are so peculiarly liable. For cuts, bruises, sprains and stiffened joints, the action of Holloway's Ointment is eminently healing and soothing, and a supply should always be at hand in case of need.

offence has been committed. So it is open to Police-officers to cause the initiation of proceedings under the proposed law by reporting supposed facts constituting the offence and induce the Magistrate to direct an investigation by the Police itself. What is more, it is possible for a Policeman to cause the initiation of proceedings by creating in the mind of a Magistrate a suspicion of the commission of an offence under the proposed law without so much as committing himself by anything in writing. While on this part of the subject, I may as well observe that a Magistrate can also initiate proceedings upon information communicated by anonymous or (what is worse) pseudonymous letters. What, however, is most dangerous is that, even if a prosecution initiated under (b) and (c) be found to be false, there is no body that you can catch hold of to prosecute for malicious prosecution or perjury. The Indian Evidence Act provides that no Magistrate or Police officer shall be compelled to say whence he got any information as to the commission of any offence.

Over-zealous Magistrates will not be wanting who, in their philanthropic ardour for reforming Indians and with their minds always made up that they (Indians and not themselves) are a set of downright brutes, will not hesitate to proceed under (b) and (c). They will argue that laws are made to be enforced and not to remain dead-letters on the statute-book, and since from the very nature of things complaints under (a) are not likely to be forthcoming, they cannot do better than proceed under (b) and (c), whenever possible.

(18.) The Bill, as originally introduced into the Council, was bad enough, but modified as it has been by the Select Committee, it is still worse.

The provision that only Magistrates of the highest class should be permitted to take cognisance of the offence of rape where the offence is alleged to have been committed by the husband of an outraged girl, is one of which the wisdom is open to very grave doubts. The first evil that it will involve is that almost the whole of the members, male and female, of the unfortunate family in which the offence may be alleged to have been committed, will be dragged to headquarters, sometimes from the remotest and most out of the way corners of a district. The second is that cases of this nature will necessarily come on almost always before Europeans and occasionally before Indians, more Europeanised in their ideas than downright Europeans and whose greatest ambition in life is not to yield in any way in respect of Europeanism to the genuine articles. Both classes are great believers in reform and are therefore somewhat unsafe for being trusted with cases in the interests of reform. The third is, that in all probability the first impulse of a European Magistrate holding an enquiry into such a case will be to have the veils of the lady-witnesses removed by his Mahomedan orderly. Reformers may think that that too will advance the cause of reform, but the ladies themselves and their relations will consider themselves outrageously insulted. The fourth is, that reformer-Magistrates will probably be more than usually inclined to commit witnesses (consisting of the relations of the girl or her husband) for perjury in cases in which the prosecution will fail. To European Magistrates, it will appear perfectly improbable that men and women, who are not absolute idiots, can really be ignorant of the exact age of their own children, and whenever there is any discrepancy or vagueness, it must be intentional. Fifthly, District Magistrates are not necessarily safe, specially in these days when promotion in the magisterial line is so abnormally good that men of no more than five years' standing are being put in as Magistrates. Besides, is it not a fact that there is not a month but the Press drags to light the high-handed doings of some Magistrate or other?

But of what good is it to go on multiplying reasons?

(19.) The Select Committee has betrayed an amount of perverse zid quite unworthy of the supreme councillors of a vast Empire. It has treated a large mass of influential representation from the people with undeserved contempt. (Note, ye! puissant strengtheners of Governmental hands, with what scant courtesy your own representation, which, as a literary production and also as an apology for the proposed measure, is such a masterpiece, has been treated. There is not a single modification in the sense of your very moderate suggestions.)

(20.) A habit formed during constableness in early life, is more likely than not to cling to some Policemen, even when they rise high up the ladder. Only, the fatter they pay the greater the quantity of grease required to lubricate their palms.

Is the Bill really a thing of such perfect beauty that the Hon'ble Mr. Nulkar should be so desperately enamoured of it as not to have a single word to say against it?

I had almost forgot to point out that there is only one thing wanting to complete the inhuman cruelty of the Bill. It is that omission on the part of the relations of the girl or the boy to give information to the authorities of the commission of an offence under it, should be made an offence punishable with the same punishment as the offence itself.

ARE universally admitted to be worth A GUINEA A BOX. For Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, and Blotches on the Skin, for they have done it in countless cases.

The first dose will give relief in twenty minutes. This is no fiction, for they have done it in countless cases.

Every sufferer is earnestly requested to try one Box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

For females of all ages these Pills are invaluable. No female should be without them. There is not a medicine to be found to equal them for removing any obstruction or irregularity of the system. If taken according to the directions given with each box they will soon restore females of all ages to sound and robust health. This has been proved by thousands who have tried them, and found the benefits which are ensured by their use.

For a Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, and all Disorders of the Liver, they act like magic, and a few doses will be found to work wonders on the most important organs in the human Machine. They strengthen the whole muscular system, restore the long lost complexion, bring back the keen edge of appetite, and arouse into action with the rosebud of health the whole physical energy of the human frame. CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE THREE WISHES.

BY MRS. ACTON TINDAL.

—Nihil est ab omni

Parte beatum.—Hor. Od. 16; Lib. 2.

I.

I SAW two youths, and one fair child beside them,
Discoursing idly of their coming days,
And marvelling what fortunes might betide them,
• Threading with fancy's clue life's future maze.
The sun shone on them and around—the earth
Was glad as their own hearts with vernal mirth.

II.

The eldest-born spoke first—on every feature
• Beamed fiery genius yet untamed by grief;
A frank, and brave, unchastened, generous creature,
Whose faults and virtues stood in bold relief;
“I ask for fame,” he said, “o'er crowds to blaze—
Give me the scholar's lore, the poet's bays!”

III.

The second spoke—cold, calm, and unimpassioned—
He asked for wealth, and power that wealth might gain;
In stronger mould, and coarser, he was fashioned;
Less Avid were his joys, less keen his pain;
He asked for length of days, and hours of ease,
Menials to serve him, courtier friends to please.

IV.

The fair child spoke —“I would there were no sighing,
No tears to wipe away, where I may dwell;
• Unknown the mystery and the fear of dying,
Unheard in that bright land the cold farewell;
Here change and darkness come o'er all things fair,
And living eyes grow dim, neath brows of care.” •

V.

A year had passed—gay was the new May morning;
The birds were warbling in the budding trees,
• While nature sprang to life—in solemn warning,
The knell of death resounded on the breeze—
White plumes were floating o'er the funeral train;
They bore the young to earth's cold arms again.

VI.

Yes! the three friends were there; but two were weeping
In mourning garments next the funeral bier,
While the fair child beneath the pall was sleeping,
• Dried up the fountain of each human tear!
His wish was granted, and the child was blest—
For God had given his beloved rest!

VII.

Years flitted by—the glory had departed,
• And life's enchantment faded from the eye
Of him, the hard—the brave, the lofty-hearted—
• Who bent to fame in proud idolatry—
Yet his the proud applause he once desired,
Him wondering crowds had followed and admired.

VIII.

Of what avail to him the praises spoken
By stranger tongues, the tears that dew his lays?
Old ere his time, in strength and spirit broken,
Sad was the evening of the poet's days!
• Wreaths deck his tomb, and anthems lull his rest,
And spirits like his own declare him blest.

IX.

And he who asked for wealth—his prayer was granted;
Unharm'd, his agonies the seas restore;
Jaundiced the ingots seemed for which he panted,
Yet still insatiate, still he thirsts for more.
Human affections in his heart grow cold,
And o'er their ashes cowers the lust of gold!

X.

Yes! mark his furrowed brow the fitful gleaming,
Sudden and anxious, of his sunken eye—
He knows not whom to trust, how'er fair-seeming;
• The love he never sought, no wealth can buy;
He fears his neighbour, and he hates his hen—
For heaven hath cursed him—granting him his prayer!

XI.

Be wise! and leave with God the coming years;
Thy future, as thy past, before him lies.
Shrine in thy heart no idol—doubts and fears
Perplex our fancy-woven destinies!
Trust Him in time and death; be still, and wait;
• The silver lines of mercy thread thy fate!

Holloway's Pills.—With changing temperature the digestion becomes impaired, liver disordered, and mind despondent. The cause of these irregularities is easily removed by the use of Holloway's Ointment and Pills. They directly attack the source of the evil, remove all impurities from the circulation, restore the affected organs to their natural state, and correct all defective secretions. An easy means of restoring health and strength is supplied by Holloway's Pills and Ointment. These famous medicines are blood renovating remedies, whose influence reaches the great centres of the nervous system, purifies the circulation, induces a healthy state of the bodily powers, gives tone to the stomach and brain, producing a desire for food, and all the proper requirements for health and vigour.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

ON Thursday, the 19th March 1891, exactly at 35 minutes past 3 O'clock in the afternoon, the Age of Consent Bill was, by unanimous vote of Council, passed. It was a bright day brightly begun and continued bright to the end.

THE Financial Statement 1891-92, was published as a Gazette Extraordinary yesterday. Here is the official summary:—

"The Accounts of 1889-90 have closed with a surplus of Rs. 2,612,033. In the Revised Estimate for 1890-91 the Revenue is estimated at Rs. 85,313,500, and the Expenditure Rs. 82,526,400, yielding a surplus of Rs. 2,787,100. The larger part of this surplus is due to the rise in the rate of Exchange.

The net Revenue from Opium is expected to be Rs. 218,200 less than the Budget Estimate. The net Railway Revenue, apart from the Exchange on sterling payments, is only slightly better than the Budget Estimate. Most of the other Revenue heads show improvement.

In the Budget Estimate for 1891-92 the Revenue is estimated at Rs. 86,025,300 and the Expenditure at Rs. 85,999,700, yielding a surplus of Rs. 115,600. The Famine Grant is restored to the original amount Rs. 1,500,000, of which Rs. 1,043,000 is under Famine Relief and Insurance, and Rs. 457,000 represents the loss on the Indian Midland and the Bengal-Nagpur Railways, which have been constructed for the protection of the country against famine. The estimate of net Opium Revenue is Rs. 5,318,700, being Rs. 361,500 less than the Revised Estimate of 1890-91. Exchange is taken at Rs. 5½d. There is an improvement of Rs. 164,300 as compared with the Budget Estimate of 1890-91 in the net charge for Upper Burma.

It is stated under the usual reserve that the Secretary of State proposes in 1891-92 to sell £16,000,000 of Council Bills, and to raise a loan of £2,000,000 for discharge of 3½ per cent. Debentures and advances to Railway Companies.

The Estimates of 1891-92 provide Rs. 3,500,000 for Capital Expenditure not charged to Revenue, and also the sum of Rs. 1,008,300 as loans for local purposes. But it is not expected that it will be necessary to raise any loan in India in 1891-92. This satisfactory result is due mainly to the large surpluses of 1889-90 and 1890-91, and to the provision in those years for Reduction of Debt. Out of the grant for Famine Relief and Insurance, the sum of Rs. 1,040,000 is assigned for the construction of Protective Railways and Canals in 1891-92.

Future prospects, apart from questions connected with Exchange and Military Expenditure, are considered by Sir David Barbour to be decidedly encouraging."

AS we announced last week, the Viceroy starts on his spring tour on Tuesday next at 10 P.M. The departure will be private. There will be no guard-of-honor, but a detachment of the Body-Guard will escort him from the Government House to the Howrah railway station and the salute will be fired on the following morning at 9. Only the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, the Commissioner of the Burdwan Division and the Magistrate of Howrah will meet Lord Lansdowne at the railway station. At Allahabad, the Viceroy will be received by the Lieutenant-Governor, N.-W. P. His Excellency reaches Nani Tal on the 18th April, where the Commissioner of the Kumaon Division will receive the Viceroy and accompany him throughout the trip to the Kumaon hills.

LADY LANSDOWNE reached Simla on Wednesday night.

THE Commander-in-Chief left Calcutta yesterday at 9 in the morning.

SIR Charles Elliott is always on the move. His next tour commences on the 30th March. Leaving Calcutta that day, the Lieutenant-Governor arrives at Julpauri the next day and halting there for three days—1st, 2nd and 3rd April—leaves it on the 4th and reaches Purneah the same day. Leaving it on the 7th, he arrives at Nya Dumka (77d Rampur Hat) on the 8th and Sun on the 11th, returning to Calcutta on the 13th April.

OF the 150 candidates who went up for the Pleaders' examination held at the Senate House on the 24th, 25th and 26th February last, only 16 have passed.

THERE will be two centres in the Bhagulpore Division for the next Half-yearly Departmental Examination of Assistant Magistrates and others commencing on Monday, the 27th April next, one at Purneah and the other at Bhagulpore. Similarly, there will be two places for examination of Junior Civilians, Deputy Magistrates and others—one at the Commissioner's Office at Burdwan and another at Midnapore, the former for those employed in the districts of Burdwan, Bankoora, and Beerbhoom, and the latter for those of the local District. A third centre at Calcutta, at the office of the Presidency Commissioner, has been ordered for the officers of the Hooghly and Howrah districts.

THE Compounders' examination has been fixed for the 7th April, at the Temple Medical School, Patna.

THE road cess for the Darjeeling District for the cess year commencing from the first April 1891, will be at the maximum rate.

THERE will be at Buda Peste, on the 15th May next, an Exhibition of pottery, stone and cement ware, as also of machinery and tools used in the said industries. The Government of India has been asked to exhibit "the various and interesting industries of British India, especially the Art Pottery produced by the various Government establishments."

FOR chewing pan within a few feet of him, the Magistrate of Gya, taking it as an intentional insult, put a muktear named Bangshidar on his trial, found him guilty under section 228 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced him to a fine of Rs. 20, in default 14 days' simple imprisonment. The High Court—Messrs. Justices Norris and Beverley—have issued a rule to shew cause why the conviction and sentence should not be set aside.

THE same Bench refused to interfere in the matter of an application for transfer of a case from the file of Mr. Gordon, Deputy Commissioner of Kamrup, on the ground that Mr. Gordon, before proceeding judicially with the case, had officially reported to the Commissioner that "there can be little doubt that the charges are true." The affidavit did not disclose the source of this information. To a question of Mr. Justice Norris, as to how he came to know of the contents of a confidential letter, the petitioner, who was present in Court, explained that he had heard it from a person whose name he did not remember. This elicited the remark of the Judge that it was very plain that the petitioner had surreptitiously obtained access to the document from some one at the Commissioner's office.

THE Zemindary of Ramnad in the South is reported to be in a bad way. It was released from the bondage of the Court of Wards and made over to the present owner on the 3rd November 1880, after an administration of 17 years. The Zemindary is an ancient and extensive property, dating from the days of the Ramyana and equalling in area to a fourth of the Madura District, with a population of 5 lacs and a revenue of 11 lacs. The father of the present Zemindar, popularly known as Duraraja Thaver, at his death, in 1871, left the estate considerably involved. The Government of Lord Napier then took up the management, the Court of Wards paid off the debts to the amount of 23 lacs, invested 9 lacs in irrigation works, rescued 112 villages with a revenue of Rs. 50,000. The son came to the property freed of liabilities and with a reserve in the treasury of 4 lacs. He entered into a career of reckless extravagance, increased the establishments, plunged into litigation with his brother, with the result that in one year and four months, the treasury is exhausted and he himself in debt to the tune of 10 lacs. The dewan, whose services were lent by the Government, and drawing a salary of Rs. 1,000 per month, has been called upon by his original employers for having received large presents from the Zemindar.

NOTWITHSTANDING the boasted progress of the country and the undoubted improvement made during British Rule, there are still predatory tribes and hereditary criminals in different parts of the Empire. We learn that down South in Madura, there is a tribe called Kellars who are at once agriculturists and thieves by profession. They render the roads unsafe to goods in transit. Thefts are constant. At particular periods, such as those of scarcity, these Kellars go in for ambitious crime and extend their operations, organising themselves into bands of desperadoes under adventurous spirits, and commit regular dacoities and highway robbery on a large scale, utilizing the railway for the purpose. They show not only organization but also self control, breaking up their bands suddenly to disappear in the mass of the peasantry.

LOCUSTS are rather a formidable pest in the Panjab. Not only have they in the Jhelum and Rawalpindi districts inflicted considerable damage to the advanced rabi crops, and are hatching more mischief by laying eggs there, but last week they actually stopped the Railway train in the neighbourhood of Attock. The authorities are at their wits' end how to deal with this invasion of a microscopic majority—an insignificant, infinitesimal but multitudinous foe. Many a little makes a mickle, and should the little insects be able to breed without molestation on the spot, the prospect must be alarming.

THERE was lately a panic at Singapore over hydrophobia, followed by a call for destruction of all the dogs in the island. European mothers, according to a local paper, were in a state of terror whenever their children went out for their morning and evening exercise, lest they might be bitten by a mad dog. The Chinese too, with all their Bhudistic reverence for life, at last joined in the cry of Death to the dogs! And no wonder, considering that there were 12 deaths in their community alone, within a few months, from hydrophobia.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

A GREAT shipping accident has clouded this week. In the midst of a violent storm at night, the steamer Utopia with seven hundred Italian emigrants on board proceeding to New York, went down off Gibraltar, having collided with Her Majesty's ironclad Rodney. The boats of the Channel Squadron there present were immediately lowered and tried their best to save the illfated passengers and crew and succeeded to some extent. Still many were beyond the reach of help and it is said that more than five hundred men have perished.

MR. Justice Scott has left Cairo for Bombay to settle his retirement preparatory to take up his appointment in Egypt.

TELEPHONE communication has been established between London and Paris. Tested at the General Post Office, London, the hearing is declared perfect.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has sanctioned the payment of Rs. 121-2-0 to the Director of Public Instruction for the expenses incurred by him from his private pocket in hiring the Calcutta Town Hall lately for the delivery of a series of lectures to young men on subjects relating to the conduct of life.

SIR Charles Elliott has sanctioned a further grant of Rs. 2,000, in full payment of the building grant (Rs. 6,000) to the Church Mission Society's high English School at Garden Reach.

THE Government of Bengal has issued orders on the subject of the prohibition of the emigration of Afghans, Pathans, and other Asiatics into the Colony of Victoria with instructions to the Inspecting officers of Passenger Ships proceeding to Australia that they should warn natives, especially Pathans whose presence in that Colony is not desired.

A REPORT has been called for from the Director of Public Instruction to report the circumstances which have led him to propose increased accommodation for the branch school attached to the Calcutta Madrasa at an estimated cost of Rs. 15,000.

SIR Charles Elliott is at it still, acquainting himself with his agencies and appliances, and pursuing his inspection of the different departments and offices. He has already seen the Custom House, the Calcutta Collectorate, &c. With his own Secretariat he is of course making a thorough acquaintance. On the 14th instant accompanied by Messrs. Cotton and Streatfeild, he paid a visit to the Financial Department of the Civil side of the Bengal Secretariat. On this occasion the Lieutenant-Governor's visit was far from formal like any of his predecessors. Sir Charles spent two hours on his legs making minute enquiries into the working of the Department, in fact, he went round the table of every assistant of that Department. It is said that the object of his visit was to give effect to Mr. Risley's system with reduced establishment. As matters stand our impression is that there is plenty of work in the Bengal office to keep the hands fully employed, but there is need of proper adjustment and organization. There are most important departments in the office under the Chief Secretary which are undermanned, while there are departments under other Secretaries which do not require the number of hands they have got. Under the circumstance an immediate redistribution is needed to reform the Bengal office. Perhaps it may be noted that Mr. Risley's system is by no means an improvement of the system of the Court of Directors of the Company or the bundle system of Sir George Campbell. Barring the admirers of Mr. Risley no one speaks well of it in the Bengal office. That system has been found fault with, in certain respects, by the Government of India, in the Home Department. The Bengal Government has already received a severe scolding from that Government. As regards cost, Mr. Risley's system is the most expensive system that has ever been introduced in the Bengal Secretariat. The cost of printing must be enormous and it is hoped that Sir Charles will make an enquiry into the matter. And what cart-loads of printed forms which must have cost Government thousands of rupees were destroyed when Mr. Risley's system was first introduced. On the whole we are afraid that the Bengal Secretariat, with its increasing work, does not admit of reduction of establishment, but certainly it admits of heavy reduction in printing in various forms.

THE conduct of the Ceylon Magistrate, who recently caused a witness to be hand-cuffed and tom-tom-med round the village as a liar for having persisted in prevaricating and telling lies, has not met with the approval of the Ceylon Government. And no wonder. So long as the law is what it is such conduct cannot meet with the approval of the Government. But that is no reason why the public too should denounce Mr. Moon. If they cannot exactly support him on legal grounds, they ought to express their sympathy with him on moral grounds, if only to mark their appreciation of an honest attempt to put down a tremendously growing evil. Whoever is tolerably acquainted with the deplorable state of things obtaining in courts of justice cannot help admiring the Ceylon Magistrate for the sensitiveness his moral nature appears to have retained in spite of contact with the immoral atmosphere of a law court and also for the very summary and effective, if rather original, method he adopted of punishing the offending witness. What most forcibly strikes an outsider watching a proceeding in a law court is the incredible amount of perjury that is daily committed and apparently with perfect impunity. It is useless to disguise the unpleasant fact that the law itself is in a large measure responsible for this state of things. It lays down such a round-about procedure for bringing a lying witness to justice, while it affords him all possible facilities for escape, that very few judges care to make the attempt. Sometimes, such attempts must from the very nature of things be futile. Demeanour is fugacious and does not admit of being transferred to paper, and yet demeanour is of the very essence of prevarication and sometimes alone convicts one of falsehood. The result is that unless a witness, whose mendacity and prevarication are proved by his own demeanour, is punished then and there by the judge hearing his testimony, he escapes in toto. Sometimes, judges are loath to initiate proceedings for committing a witness for perjury, simply because it involves much useless trouble and waste of time to comply with the round-about procedure laid down, and they have so much to do without inviting such superfluous proceedings. Thus things have gone on, drifting from bad to worse, and people in general have learnt to consider themselves perfectly secure in lying in courts of justice. There is, however, one consolation for our countrymen, which is that such of them as indulge in untruthfulness in courts of justice are in good company, for the state of things in England appears to be equally bad. "The Judge of the Birmingham country court is driven to despair by the untruthfulness of the parties who come before him. In commenting on a case the other day, he declared that this was the fifth instance that morning in which more or less respectable persons had been guilty in the witness-box of the most deliberate lying. To such a pass have things now come that he described himself as going home sick at heart, day by day, from hearing people give each other the lie direct in matters about which there could be no possible mistake."

If the Legislature considers it worth its while to take serious steps for the systematic repression of the evil, it must arm the judiciary with powers, at once summary and drastic, for the punishment of witnesses telling gross and transparent lies in the witness box. The desired reform can be effected by just slightly modifying S. 480 of the Criminal Procedure Code (which lays down the special procedure to be followed in certain cases of contempt of court) so as to make it applicable to an offence under S. 193 of the Indian Penal Code.

THE returns have not yet been thoroughly scrutinised and compiled. That will take time. Meanwhile, the off-hand results of the late census are being declared.

The population of the territories under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has been returned at 74 millions, which is an increase of $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The increase is most in Howrah, in the tea districts, and in East Bengal, and least in Southern Behar, probably from emigration. The town of Howrah, which according to the previous census had 90,813 souls, now counts 113,004.

Calcutta, which is understood to have been censused without particular care, has returned a population of 650,246 souls.

The population of Chandernagore is reported to be 24,281 of which 4,932 are British subjects.

It is said that efforts are making at Lahore to create a prejudice against the Bengalees. So the disease has reached the capital of the Panjab. For some years, Bengalophobia has been a common complaint in the N.-W. Provinces. The original sufferers were Europeans who communicated it to the natives.

IN acknowledging the latest edition of Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, and Knightage, the Army & Navy Gazette notices—

"that, between December 5, 1889, and the same date in 1890, two peerages have been created (including the Dukedom of Clarence and Avondale), three have become extinct, and one (the Barony of Dacre) has been merged in a higher dignity. Nine new baronets have been created and three baronetcies have become extinct, fifty-two gentlemen have received the honour of knighthood, and eighty-five have been nominated as Companions of various Orders. These honours include those conferred upon the occasion of the opening of the Forth Bridge. We are pleased to see that such has been done in recording the services of members of the Distinguished Service Order."

That ought to silence those who complain of the cheapening of Indian titles by multiplication. Comparing the areas and populations of the two countries, there is little room for fear that titular distinctions will be made too common by any liberality.

VACCINATION is all very well, but then it leaves a scar and ladies naturally object to spoil the spotlessness of their snow-white persons with an unsightly inscription. Instead of taking the puncture on their arm, they prefer to receive it on parts less exposed. In Chicago this vanity has proved a serious embarrassment to the Medical Department. The Western races are so chaste in language that it is improper to talk in mixed society, of legs—even of a table. There, in that State, the dear creatures in their nervous dread of disfigurement of their busts or arms make no scruple to lay bare their shapely extremities to the eyes profane of strange medical men for operation thereon. The practice has grown into a nuisance and the officers complain of it, being unprovided with the necessary conveniences, suitable apartments we suppose, for the interesting martyrs to the tyranny of Sanitary Science. After much correspondence and discussion it has been ruled that the Medical Inspector shall not vaccinate any one on the leg without special instruction from the Commissioner of Vaccination.

Hoonure Chin—the ingenuity of the Chinese is proverbial throughout the East. Europe herself must bow to the pigtailed as among the most efficient of the early cultivators of science. At any rate, China has long been acknowledged as the land in which some of the most remarkable discoveries, such as those of gunpowder, printing, and the mariner's compass, were made. How, by whom, or when these discoveries were made is not known, beyond a rather vague acceptance of the claim of the Celestial Empire. An Austrian savant has thrown some light upon the last of the three inventions. The south-pointing needle is mentioned first by Kwei Ku Tsz, a Chinese writer of the fourth century before Christ. The knowledge of the property must have come to the Chinese by accident, from the wealth of iron-stone, much of it magnetised, in their country. With such abundance of mineral resources, iron needles must have early come into use, instead of stone-needles with which man usually begins. Some of these iron needles,—those that were magnetised—must have attracted notice by their peculiarity. But such was the rate of progress even among this gifted Eastern people that it must have taken a thousand years or so to utilise this property of the magnetic needle for purposes of navigation.

Before that could be done it was necessary that the South-pointing property of the needle should be defined with some approach to accuracy. This was first done in the eighth century by Viping the Astronomer Imperial. He was a sort of Father Lafont at Court, cultivating both divinity and physics, being at once monk and man of science. He had probably travelled to India; for the Chinese owed their Higher Astronomy to the Hindus and he is said to have studied the Hindu Astronomy. He discovered that after all the needle pointed only South-wards, not due South. He detected a variation of 20 degrees 9 mns. Thus this people went on till the twelfth century when an embassy was sent to Corea. His Excellency Su-King, the ambassador, in the record of his mission called Shih Kas Lilu first describes the floating needle as a means of determining direction which he observed on the voyage. This was in 1122, or a century before the mariner's compass was known in Europe. This Narrative of the Embassy to Corea closes the controversy, for the present at least, by giving the Chinese the priority in the discovery of the mariner's compass.

Orientalists are particularly fond of asserting their claims to priority in every respect. Our people are never so happy as when they are able to prove that the Hindus originated the liberal arts and sciences of which the Europeans now boast. It is a morbid feeling which we wish to discourage. It is a sign of degeneracy and worthlessness. And what is the value of priority without the capacity for progress?

To complete the worthlessness of the agitation against the Age of Consent Bill just passed into law, the Opposition held what they call a Mahapuja or Great Worship at the shrine at Kalighat, on Sunday last. We are able to place before the public an authentic account of the degradation of religion which the pinoters of the demonstration celebrated that day:—

"A dozen of Brahmans were engaged in the morning to recite the chandi hundred times, though many more Brahmans assembled to enjoy the fun. Homas were performed in a small scale by dozen different persons in the morning, but in the evening, Rajah Inder Chundra had a homa performed in a rather grand scale, at his own cost. The Puja was severally made by different parties, and the Sankalpa was made in their respective names. The Bangabasi party had a separate Puja made in the name of all Hindus who were against the Bill. Babu Ramánath Ghose had a separate puja made in his own name, and he presented a gold bangle to the goddess which he said he had long before promised (manusha) on some other account. Raja Inder Chunder's puja was rather in a moderate scale. No person besides Babu Ramánath is known to have made any valuable presents to the goddess. The majority of the persons assembled did not even care to go inside the mandir. Most of them assembled outside and made great golmal shouting Haribole and joy ma Kali rakha kara. Two or three maunds of sandesh and some batasha were distributed by the Bangabasi party, and on the whole the cost of this party is said to be within (Rs. 300) three hundred. At about 2 or 3, I had been to the mandir and found two sanyasis making a great row with shouts of Haribole and leading people round them in a wild sort of dance. But up to that time the number of persons that had visited the shrine could not exceed 5 or 6 thousand persons in all. I was however very soon compelled to leave the mandir, for some of my Calcutta acquaintance were ent upon drawing the attention of the infuriated mob to me as a heretic and a supporter of the Bill.

After 4 O'clock, the sankirtan parties, some 20 or 25 in number, began to pour through the streets. Though there were some of these parties which seemed to be composed of respectable persons, the majority of them were composed of lower class people. The number of persons assembled, it is rather difficult to compute. Of course, the crowd was thickest for about an hour and a half between 4-30 and 6 P.M., but I don't think the reports published in the papers about a lac of persons assembling can be true. Before the arrival of the sankirtan parties the crowd which was visible only within the compound of the mandir, was very thin, and I don't think the number that visited the shrine up to then could exceed to thousand.

You may have heard that the Sankirtan parties, before starting for Kalighat, assembled at Jagu Babu's bazar, and were received at Sir Romesh C. Mitter's house very cordially. * * *

I will now relate two incidents which appear to me to indicate to a certain extent the character of the mischief done by the writings of the Bangabasi paper. Within the mandir compound, I heard a police constable bragging of the valour of his countrymen (North-Western people), and he said that, these Bengalis have money and are wasting their breath and money in mere supplications, but that his countrymen do not care to waste their breath in that way and if the Bill passed, he said that he had received definite information, that his countrymen would rise in a body against the Government.

I saw another Bengali Babu, evidently under the influence of liquor, brandishing a thick club and exciting the mob to rise against the Government.

* * * * *

A European gentleman had a most cowardly attack from the infuriated mob."

Whether the puja was maha or not, the goddess has not heard the prayer. The table has been turned. She favors the kumaris or who ought to be so, and the Bill, which intended to protect them is passed. Goddess be praised!

WE congratulate both Captain Hearsey and Mr. Allen, of the Pioneer, on the settlement out of court of the former's suit against the latter for damages for libel, laid at Rs. 50,000. Captain Hearsey has accepted Rs. 10,000 as damages and Rs. 1,000 for costs, giving an understanding not to proceed against the other proprietors of the paper—Col. Corrie, Mr. Rattigan and another.

AT Saturday's meeting of the Senate of the Calcutta University, the following elections to the Syndicate were carried by ballot. Sir J. Edgar, Sir A. Croft, Mr. C. Tawney, Babu Asutosh Mukherjee, and Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadur.

THE LAST DAY OF THE CONSENT BILL IN COUNCIL.

THE struggle is over. The anxiety is at an end. The dear Bill has passed in its integrity. After all, Civilization has won—won, not easily to be sure, but won decisively. It has won against the combined forces of barbarism. The Goths and Vandals of Bengal stoutly stood up in defence of their ancient immunities and with the help of auxiliaries from distant Provinces, they have been keeping up all these months a constant warfare against the reason and conscience of the day. Thank God, they have been completely discomfited, and routed with great slaughter. Let us hope that it was their final fight—their last chance—the expiring effort of Darkness to overwhelm the Light and prevail in the universe.

The 19th March 1891 will be a memorable day in the history of India. It is a proud day in the annals of British legislation in India. During the entire life of the Council of the Viceroy and Governor-General for making Laws and Regulations, that Chamber was never engaged upon more gracious work than on Thursday last. On that day, a grave omission was supplied—the neglect of generations of legislators atoned for. The wrong of more than thirty years on the most interesting and most helpless class of Her Majesty's subjects has been removed.

To ourselves and those trusty friends and loyal liberals and true Hindus who worked with us during the trying season of unparalleled agitation—to all indeed who clung to the Bill through calumny and persecution—this ending of the matter is, of course, peculiarly satisfactory. We, for one, are relieved of a great anxiety. While others were sure of the passing of the Bill, we were troubled with doubts. Far from being sanguine, to the last moment we were fearful of its fate, and we made no secret of our fears to personal friends. Nor was there the least affectation in our anxiety. With our knowledge of the machinery of Government and the influences to which British policy is subject from the constitution and conditions of the Government, we could not in the nature of things be sanguine. And then, is not the experience still fresh in our minds of a great disappointment of what we may call only the other day, we mean that in connection with the Ilbert Bill? Surely a sanguine attitude after one such experience, would have been out of the question. In this Ilbert Bill controversy we had, as on the present occasion, been on the side of Government with this difference that on that occasion our countrymen were united. Although for ourselves we cannot look back to the part we then took in that controversy with complacency—and no better argument against that Bill could be possibly conceived than the incidents of the Calcutta agitation of the last few days,—we were sincerely in favor of the Ilbert Bill and took an active share in the movements and organizations got up for strengthening the hands of the Government. We were in communication with the Government and we were assured that the Government were firm and they were sure of passing the Bill, unless the Home Government intervened. We were asked to be firm ourselves and, for the rest, counselled to use our influence with the Home public to prevent the possibility of the Bill being countermanded by the Secretary of State. Our influence and means in this direction were small, but still such as they were, they were exerted. We communicated with personal friends and received reassuring messages. Some of these indeed contained hints that though there might be no real danger from the Home Government, there might be danger where we least expected it. Indeed there were references to Lord Ripon's own want of firmness. We did our best, however, to support the Government of Lord Ripon in every way we could. Towards the end, it was proposed to wait upon Mr. Ilbert in deputation with an address, by way of further strengthening his hands. The present writer did not quite see either the point or the dignity of such a movement, but his objections were overruled by confidential information of a nature which left him no option in the matter. Accordingly a most influential deputation waited upon Mr. Ilbert—and will it be believed that at the very moment he was assuring the deputation of the firmness of the Government with regard to the measure, the Government must have been in treaty with the oppositionists and scarcely three days had passed when rising one morning we were thunderstruck with the apparition of the Concordat? We could scarcely believe our eyes and yet it was but too true. If this has happened once, why might it not happen again. Our present Viceroy is not, indeed, weak, but he is liberal in the highest degree, and constitutional and respectful to public opinion beyond a doubt. What if the clamorous agitation impressed him? what if the Home Government intervened at the last moment? A line from Westminster, while the Viceroy was on his legs in the Council Chamber and in the midst of a crushing period, scattering the opposing forces of barbarism—and is it at all improbable that he would in that case wind off the unfinished period in a different key of loyalty to the people even though led by a mob of mercenary Pandits? No. These are not mere idle surmises, they are real contingencies which men of experience have to reckon with. They were, at any rate, present in our mind and we were, therefore, never free from anxiety as to the finale of the Bill. Happily our fears have been disproved, and the Government of Lord Lansdowne have shown a rare firmness as they have taken a true gauge of public opinion on the subject.

All true supporters of the policy of the measure will, we are sure, be perfectly satisfied with the Bill in the shape in which it is passed. We have nothing personally to complain of on this score. And we congratulate the Calcutta Committee in support of the Bill on the distinguished compliment which the Viceroy has paid them. His Lordship's memorable speech throughout shows distinct traces that their representation had received the sympathetic consideration which they had a right to expect from a Lansdowne. And the last word of the speech is at one with the last word of the Memorial, the Viceroy concluding by accepting the last suggestion of the Committee in a thoroughly cordial spirit. The Calcutta Committee made, indeed some other suggestions for safeguarding the operation of the Bill which in our opinion went beyond the requirements of the case. Such a thing, however, is scarcely avoidable in the case of a large body representing various classes, some of the members of which were naturally not altogether free from the influences exercised by the oppositionists. At the same time, however, the Committee took care to show that they had sufficient confidence in the Government, and above all, they were anxious that the main object of the Bill should not be weakened by any modifications, they or others might propose. The Committee's suggestions were in reality of a general kind and were embodied in the following terms:—

"It does not become your Memorialists even to seem to impose any duty on the exalted Representative of Majesty itself, but, in view of the peculiarity of the subject and the peculiarity of the situation, they venture to think that all reasonable fears would be removed and most nervous suspicions appeased, if, following upon the assurance given in your great speech in Council—a speech of the highest as well as most generous statesmanship—Your Excellency gave suitable warning to the Local Governments and undertook yourself to watch the operation of the new Law."

The Viceroy has received the request herein conveyed in a most gracious manner for which the Committee cannot be too thankful. The Viceroy concludes his great speech with the kindest reference to the Calcutta Memorial:—

"I have only one word to add. A hope has been expressed that when this Bill has become law the Government of India will closely watch its operation, with the object of ascertaining whether further safeguards are necessary in order to prevent its abuse. I gladly give the assurance for which we are asked. We shall cause the working of the measure to be watched with the utmost attention, and we shall be prepared, if the safeguards which we have already accepted should prove insufficient, to strengthen and add to them."

Probably what will seem to many the least satisfactory part in the proceedings of the Council is the retention of the Police in the administration of this legal provision. Not only is the Police, in the personnel, it is true, of the higher native officers, retained, but it has incidentally come in for a certificate of good character from the highest authorities for which it must thank the occasion. For ourselves we do not share the extreme popular distrust of the police. The suggestions made for setting aside the police from having anything to do with this law are, like many other suggestions on this subject, simple impracticable. The police is the recognised machinery of administration and before a substitute for it is found, it must be employed. It is no small proof, however, of the anxiety of the Government to give every reasonable satisfaction to the people that in conformity to the popular feeling, this agency is to be all but wholly excluded from investigating cases under the law. His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor has gone even further. While as head of the Executive Government he is jealous of the name of the police department, he has in deference to suggestions made to him by persons entitled to advise on such subjects, directed that the Subordinate Executive Service should be employed instead of the police in making enquiries, after an investigation shall have been directed by the District Magistrate upon his personal satisfaction that a prima facie case has been made out. The conciliatory spirit shown by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in this respect is, indeed, the prevailing note of all the speeches in the Council. The Viceroy's speech, while firm and straightforward, is charming for its tone of courtesy and appeal. Sir Andrew Scoble also has shown great consideration to the chief opponents by fully giving his reasons for not accepting their objections. Indeed, all the speeches were conceived in a spirit of earnest appeal to the good sense and judgment of the community.

Humanity has triumphed. Long live the British Rule! The Bill is passed. The child-wife is saved. In ordinary circumstances, we would only rejoice at the event, but our feelings are of a very mixed character on the present occasion. There is bitterness in our cup. The opposition to the measure has been most unfortunate—nay, disastrous. The halo of mysterious sanctity that so long encircled our ancient religion has been rent away. At the instance of professional agitators and irresponsible publicists, its holy name has been taken in vain. The boy in the fable who cried, the Wolf, the Wolf, was not more thoughtless than the Baboos who have pretended to identify Lord Lansdowne with a British Aurungzabe. The great Charter of our civil and religious liberties—the Proclamation of 1858—has been similarly treated—simply done for. Our patriots and defenders of the faith have succeeded in having it consigned to the waste paper basket. Appealed to in season and out of season, in support of contentions to which it had no application, the Government have at last been forced to say distinctly that the authority of that Instrument is not to be frivolously cited in bar of the authority of the Government to do what is best. The opposition is simply ruinous to our political prospects. It undoes the whole work of the Congress whose six years of toil and trouble is nullified. Let no one charge us with inconsistency for speaking now of the Congress in the strain of appreciation. The Congress is a thing to be proud of—it has men in it who are a glory to the country—its objects are patriotic, and its demands always honorable. It, nevertheless, we have not been able to grow enthusiastic about it, its principles and objects could not but command our heartiest sympathy. Our differences with the Congress arose from no conflict of principles. They were due to a feeling of diffidence whether the country was as yet ripe for the pretensions of the Congress, and to distrust of the caucus. And those who know us will, we hope, trust our assurance that in a case like this we would have been delighted to be proved wrong on both heads rather than right. Apart, however, from all personal differences, the Congress conferred a dignity on the country—it raised the status of the nation. And who will say, after the discreditable scenes of the last fortnight, that we remain where we did—that we have not been lowered in the estimation of the civilized world?

If in the heat of the moment, our countrymen are not able to realize the mischief they have done by their misbehaviour, let us tell them how that behaviour strikes any well-ordered mind. Here is a barbarous custom which even their own champion is fain to confess as “pernicious.” There is no denying the inhumanity of the custom—an inhumanity all the more heinous from being exercised upon poor child wives by their natural protectors. The custom does not prevail in its aggravated form in any of the Hindu communities of India—in Bombay or Madras, the N. W. Provinces or Oudh, Behar or Orissa. It is confined to Bengal, and even here, to a limited area of the province. For all our education and enlightenment, we have not ourselves been able to sweep away the custom as we ought to have done. In the meantime the evils of it, attended with the greatest cruelty, sometimes culminating in death, began to create scandal, till the Government found themselves bound to interfere. The Government interfered in the only way they could by proposing a legislative remedy.

We confess we have not the heart to rejoice at the passing of the Bill, when we remember how dearly it has cost us. A representative of our nation of whom we have had reason to be proud has been condemned in the Council by member after member for having set the keynote to an agitation of which we cannot be too much ashamed. The good name for intelligence, education and liberality which we have so long enjoyed—a name which was to pave the way to our political progress, has been frivolously and wantonly sacrificed. A religion of which we are justly proud has been made the cloak for horrid practices abhorrent not merely to every religion worth the name but to common humanity—nay to common sense. Our best educated men—our men of light and leading—barristers more English than native in their manners—men with all the culture imparted by travel in the most civilized countries of the world—have under a strange infatuation arrayed themselves to forward the cause of barbarism and bring on themselves the severe denunciation of the responsible rulers of the country. Alas! that they should be condemned as rebels, and incendiaries to whom in moments of trial we should naturally look for sober counsels and wise guidance! Here was eminently a trial of the nation. They have failed to set their house in order. There were their social arrangements and practices from which the veil could not be lifted without causing horror to the spectator. Strangers come and offer them help in a most needful reform. And far from hailing such offer with gratitude, far from admitting their own failure—what do they do? They first deny the existence of the evils; if forced to admit them, they say they are bound up with their religion. Even their doctors deny the evil of the premature consummation of marriage. Reading their recorded opinions, one would think early marriage and early consummation of marriage were no evils. A strange reaction must have set in among us to make such retrograde sentiments possible among our educated countrymen.

Where is all their youthful fervour for reform? Have they forgotten all the dissertations they composed against the evil customs of their country? Has age such a softening influence that they must throw overboard all their old projects of improvement? Is respectable Hinduism to be made an impossibility by the obstruction of those to whom we look for its rehabilitation? If the really orthodox offered the opposition we would not complain. They know no better. But that opposition rather than cordial support should come from those who are Hindus but in name, simply passes our understanding. And what can such oppositionists expect but contempt for their pains. The opposition to the widow marriage Bill was a really orthodox opposition and it was treated with more consideration.

Public Paper.

From—The Secretaries to the Calcutta Committee in Support of the Age of Consent Bill.

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

SIR,—We have the honor to request the favour of your submitting before Her Majesty's Government in India and the Honourable the Council of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General for making Laws and Regulations the facts hereinafter mentioned and the documents hereunto annexed.

For some years, the condition of the female sex in India has been under discussion, both in this country and in England. The unsatisfactoriness of that condition was generally admitted, though the advisability of legislation to remove the acknowledged evils was doubted by many, the Government coinciding with the latter. Meanwhile, certain cases cropped up in the courts of judicature, which accentuated the sense of unsatisfactoriness and quickened the public conscience in favour of some reform. In this state of preparation of the public mind, a case occurred in Calcutta, which at once disclosed a deeper horror—a more scandalous practice—and the inadequacy of the law to meet it. Under a nefarious custom, a poor girl, alleged to have been of more than ten years of age, was murdered in bed in marital intercourse, by a big healthy adult of some thirty years of age. The Jury unanimously found him guilty, but under the Indian Penal Code, his offence amounted only to grievous hurt, &c., (Sec. 338.) The Hon'ble Judge of the High Court who sat in that case pointed out the defect in the law, decanting on the difficulties in its administration, all which might be removed by raising the age of consent from ten to a higher limit. That case created a great sensation both here and in Great Britain. The need of reform of the Code was pressed from all sides upon the Government. Many were the suggestions from different quarters, but the Government, after inquiry in the several Provinces, only proposed to raise the age by two years, that is, to the twelfth year, as an amendment least likely to disturb the social arrangements of the people and as one certainly not calculated to interfere with their religious beliefs or rites. Accordingly, the Hon'ble Law Member introduced his Bill of that purport. So moderate indeed was the measure that, while disappointing the reformers, it was expected by the Government themselves to have scarcely any other than educative effect. Notwithstanding that, it had the misfortune of meeting with the opposition of an Honourable and learned Member, and that opposition within was soon echoed without. Certain parties now took advantage of the opportunity to raise the cry of “Religion in danger,” and were able to alarm the ignorant and unsophisticated into the belief that the Government were attacking the Faith of Hindus and Mahomedans. They held meetings in different parts of the town, issued pamphlets and leaflets, and went preaching from house to house. Their new papers were full of wild complaints and mischievous suspicions. Not content with confining their agitation to the metropolis, they sent messengers and messages to the country, and even wrote and wired to other Provinces to join the cry.

Under these circumstances, the friends of the Bill had a duty to perform. Under ordinary circumstances, they might be inactive, content to give the measure a silent support. But when a necessary and humane, but moderate and unobjectionable, measure was attempted to be defeated by a mostly spurious agitation, swelled by unworthy and even mischievous agencies, it was time for the loyal and peaceful supporters of the Bill to gather together and express themselves, and do their humble best quietly to advance it.

Accordingly, a meeting was called on the 15th February, at 12, Wellington Square. It was very respectably attended, as the names in the accompanying minutes, which appeared in the newspapers of the day, will show. These names represent the flower of the different sections and classes of native society. For the first time, not only Hindus and Mahomedans combined in a common cause, but the two leading parties in Mahomedan Bengal and both sects were united, as they had never been, on the same object. The meeting was pervaded by a commendable desire to advance the measure. And what of health unanimity of feeling was wanting was produced on the spot. Heartily accepting the principle of the Bill, the meeting resolved to take steps for strengthening the hands of the Government.

A strong Committee was formed to carry out the objects of the meeting under the presidency of its chairman. There were in it such Pandits and Hindu Lawyers as Principal Krishna Kamal Bhattacharjee and Dr. Jogendra Nath Bhattacharjee, such Brahmans of high pedigree and pure caste as Dr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee and Babu Doyal Chand Banerjee. Babu Prosono Chundra Roy, a Zemindar of the Nuddea district, was a good representative of the country Bhadracharya. Babu Narendra Nath Sen represented the numerically small but important medical caste. The numerous and influential Kayasthas had such men as Babu Gopal Lal Mitter, Vice-Chairman of the Town Corporation, Kumar Girindra Krishna of the Sovabazar Rajas, Roy Obhoy Chunder Dass Bahadar, Babu Saroda Prosad Ghose, head of the ancient Ghose family of Sham-bazar, Banian to Messrs. Hoare, Miller & Co., Babus Devendra Chunder Ghose, B.L., Nalin Bihari Sircar, merchant, Bhupendra Nath Bose, M.A., B.L., Sarat Chunder Roy, Mr. S. C. Biswas, son-in-law of the Hon'ble Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, Mr. H. C. Mallik, dock-owner, and Babu Jogendra Krishna Bose, a great grandson of Raja Radhakanta Deb, K.C.S.I. Medicine furnished Dr. M. N. Banerjee, Babu Hem Chunder Rai Chaudry, Babu Doyal Chand Banerjee. The faculty of Law was largely represented. Men like the Hon'ble Dr. Rash Behari Ghose and the Hon'ble Dr. Sircar would strengthen any body however superior. The significance of the Brahman Raja of Bhawal and the Kshetraya Maharaja of Sonbursa goes without saying. So far Hindus the small community of Parsees in Calcutta too had a good member in Mr. Mehta. The Mahomedan element in the Committee was simply superb.

Such was the Committee. It immediately set to work, and has left no stone unturned to further the cause the meeting had so much at heart. The Committee became the rallying point for the friends of the Bill. Voluntary communications were received from different places and unexpected quarters. Owing to the desperate methods of some of the agitators on the other side, however, we were obliged to proceed with great caution. We chiefly relied upon persuasion for the success of our cause. Many on our side set themselves to study the question, specially in its more recondite bearings. Having prepared themselves, they proceeded to discuss it with men in private or in the columns of the newspapers. In this, Dr. Jogendra Nath Bhattacharjee, Baboo Barada Charan Mazumdar, Baboo Mohini Mohan Chatterjee, Baboo Jogendra Chunder Ghos., Baboo Khetter Mohun Ganguli, Baboo Doyal Chand Banerjee, and Baboo Hem Chunder Rai Chaudry, particularly exerted themselves. Several of them have written pamphlets, more or less elaborate, for gratuitous distribution. Among the tracts published and circulated free by the Committee, not the least important is Dr. Bhattacharjee's "On the Legislation of the Rishis and the Age of Consent Bill." In Bengali, we were fortunate in procuring a remarkable opinion, delivered to the Government, by Pandit Ram Nath Tarkaratna, a Sanskrit poet of great merit and one of the best-read Pandits in the empire, which on the authority of the highest Hindu scriptures and law books and commentaries, from the Rig Veda downwards, triumphantly disposes of the religious argument against the Bill. This the Committee at once got printed and published and it is being freely circulated. A condensed translation of it, enriched with notes by Nyalankar Nilmani Mookerjee, M.A., B.L., Professor, Presidency College, has just appeared.

The Committee early resolved to approach His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General with a Memorial in support of the Bill. A Memorial was drawn up and printed and copies circulated in town and country. A translation into Bengali of it was also circulated among those who do not read English. An Urdu version is also ready.

In this way, the country was prepared with right and sober views, with, we are happy to say, the happiest results. Considering that the reading and writing part of the people is small, and of this part those who take any interest in affairs or understand anything about the machinery and personnel of the Government are a handful, the Committee has every reason to be satisfied at the amount of success that has attended the call upon the country to sign the Memorial.

This Memorial, signed as it is by eight thousand subjects of Her Majesty, chiefly Hindus and Mahomedans, we now have the privilege to forward for submission before His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General.

Besides Calcutta Proper, signatures have been received from twenty-eight different towns, namely, Bhagulpore, Santipore, Barnagore, Mymensing, Jalalpur, Boidyanath, Berhampore, Dum Dum, Cuttuck, Bagirhat, Dacca, Furreedpore, Kalighat, Rungpore, Cooch Behar, Bansberia, Kidderpore, Sylhet, Contai, Julpigori, Dinajpore, Nuddea, Bunkura, Patna, Bankipore, Silchar, Shillong, Chota Nagpore. These are all in Bengal and Assam. It would be too tedious to give details of the execution, and it might be invidious to single out particular names for special recognition. It may be generally stated that the list includes many respectable men and some of distinction and even eminence. There are certainly about two hundred graduates and licentiates in medicine. With the exception of a few, taken by mistake, all the signatures are the hands of those whose names they are. As a rule, care was taken to prevent unreality, and in no case was a name taken unless the signer understood at least the general purport of the document.

Our Committee was repeatedly urged to start a Memorial from the Women of Bengal. For reasons, the idea was abandoned, but several ladies have signed our Memorial. We have besides received a separate Memorial from forty-five ladies of Mymensing, which we have much pleasure in sending for due submission to His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor-General.

THE DEBATE ON THE AGE OF CONSENT BILL IN THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

On Thursday the 19th the Age of Consent Bill was unanimously passed. Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter was not present, having sent word of his illness. Member after member spoke in favor of the Bill. The Viceroy closed with a great speech.

His Excellency the President said :—

I might almost leave the case where it has been left by his Honor the Lieutenant-Governor. As, however, strong personal appeals have been again and again made to me, either to cause the Bill to be abandoned altogether, or to postpone its further consideration, I will say a few words to explain why it is that the Government of India cannot adopt either of these courses. It can, at any rate, scarcely be contended that during the months which have passed since this Bill was introduced into Council its provisions have not been adequately discussed. From that day until the present it has been criticised and examined with extraordinary ingenuity, and an amount of research and erudition has been brought to bear upon its consideration so great, that we are justified in believing that little remains to be said either for or against our proposal. I cannot therefore bring myself to share the opinions of those who would have us postpone the passing of the Bill in order to give time for further discussion—time which would be used for the purpose of still further unsettling the public mind, and misrepresenting the scope and intention of the measure.

"The opposition which it has encountered has proceeded from three quarters. There is, in the first place, the general suspicion which has been occasioned in the public mind from the fact that the Government of India has determined to legislate upon a subject which, although it does not immediately affect the marriage law of any section of the community, has an indirect bearing upon the social usages of one of those sections. To the more ignorant portion of the public an appeal has been made upon the ground that its religion is threatened by the action of the Government of India; and this statement has probably been enough to cause uneasiness to many who are entirely unaware of the real scope of the Bill, who do not read the discussions which take place in Council or even those which are to be found in the columns of the newspapers, and who are ready, upon the mere affirmation of the framers of hostile resolutions or the conveners of public meetings, summoned under the circumstances so well described by the Hon'ble Mr. Nugent, to testify their alarm and their conviction that their spiritual welfare is seriously threatened. Of the opposition which we have encountered from this quarter, all that I have to say is that I hope and believe that it will be of a transient character, and that the Hindoo community, and even the most unenlightened section of it, will in time find out that its religion is not endangered by what we are about to do. Although we cannot blame the credulous listeners who are led to believe assertions of this kind, and made on apparently good authority, we have, I think, a right to complain of those who are reckless enough to disseminate such statements and, upon so slender a pretext, to fan the embers of a dangerous agitation. I earnestly trust that even those who are unable to support the Government measure will, at any rate, have the honesty to see that its objects and effects are not exaggerated or misrepresented, and that if the Government is attacked, it is not attacked for doing what it has neither done nor intends to do.

"The main volume of the opposition which the Bill has met has, however, originated not so much in sources of this kind as in the belief, apparently entertained by many devout Hindoos, that the new law will involve a direct interference with a specific religious observance. We are told that the Hindoo religion requires the consummation of marriage immediately upon the attainment of puberty by the wife; that puberty is not unfrequently attained prior to the age of twelve; that, of in such cases the marriage is consummated, the person who so consummates it will find himself an offender against the Penal Code, owing to the performance of an act which his religion requires him not to leave unperformed. Such interference on the part of the British Government is, we are told in direct opposition to the terms of the Queen's Proclamation; and this argument has been largely, and I must say most unscrupulously, used for the purposes of discrediting the Bill and imputing a breach of faith to the Government which has introduced it. Now, with regard to this contention, let me say at once that no Government of India has yet admitted, and that no Government of India will, I hope ever be found to admit, that the Queen's Proclamation, to which this appeal is made, is capable of any such interpretation as that which has been placed upon it by those who used this argument. If that interpretation is to cover the case now under discussion, we must read the Queen's Proclamation as a contract that, whenever the requirements of public morality, or of the public welfare, moral or material, are found to be in conflict with the alleged requirements of any of the various religions prevailing in this country, religion is to prevail and considerations affecting public health, public morality and the general comfort and convenience of the Queen's subjects are to become of no account. The contention is in the face of it a preposterous one. Such a contract would have been absolutely retrograde and out of place in the great charter issued in 1858 by one of the most humane and enlightened sovereigns who has ever ruled over the nations of the earth.

"I will venture to say that, in the eyes of every reasonable man or woman, the pledges contained in the Queen's Proclamation must be read with a two-fold reservation, upon which the Government has always acted and which was not specified in the letter of the contract, simply because it had always been acted upon and was perfectly obvious and well understood. The first of these reservations is this, in all cases where demands preferred in the name of religion would lead to practices inconsistent with individual safety and the public peace, and condemned by every system of law and morality in the world, it is religion, and not morality, which must give way. It has already been pointed out that this reservation has been invariably insisted upon, and examples have been adduced in which, from time to time, the Government of India has intervened in order to prohibit certain acts, which unquestionably had the sanction of religion, upon the ground that those acts were opposed to the general interests of society. The precedents afforded by our legislation against infanticide, against the immolation of widows, and against the immunities enjoyed by Brahmins, have been appropriately cited in illustration of this argument. Every one of these enactments were, if we are to accept the narrow interpretation of the Queen's Proclamation, acts of interference with the religious belief or worship of the Queen's subjects from which those in authority under the Queen were charged to abstain on pain of her highest displeasure. Sir Andrew Scoble has very properly referred those who rely upon this construction of the Proclamation, and who hold that it entirely debars the Government of India from legislating in respect to any matters affecting the religions of the people of India, to the provisions of the Act under which our business is at this moment being conducted—I mean the Indian Councils Act of 1861, which is the statutory embodiment, in precise terms, of the general principles set forth in the Royal Proclamation. Now that Act, far from absolutely precluding the Government of India from dealing with matters affecting religion expressly contemplates the possibility of such legislation becoming necessary, although it safeguards it from irresponsible initiation. The words of the 19th section show as clearly as possible that subject to proper precautions legislation such as that which is taking place was contemplated by her Majesty's advisers who were responsible both for the Proclamation and for the Act from which I have just quoted. But I will quote, as embodying what I believe to have been invariably recognised as the principle applicable to such cases the terms of the judgment of the Privy Council when the abolition of the practice of Sati came before it upon appeal. 'The Council recommended that the petition should be dismissed for four reasons of which the third ran as follows:—'Because the Regulation, (that is the Regulation prohibiting Sati) cannot properly be regarded as a departure from the just and established principles of religious toleration, on the observance of which the stability of the British Government in India mainly depends; and because the rite is not prohibited as a religious act, but as a flagrant offence against society.' The framers of the judgment proceed to say that 'it admits of question whether the rite is sanctioned by the religious institutes of the Hindoos; by many of the most learned Hindoos of the present day it is regarded as absolutely sinful;' and it is added in the fourth reason that it was the duty of Government 'to prohibit a practice which so powerfully tended to deprave the national feeling and character, and which taught preverted religion to predominate over the best feelings of the heart.' The rite was therefore pronounced illegal, and its observance prohibited.

"The words which I have quoted appear to me to be singularly apposite in the present instance, where we are dealing with what may most appropriately be described as 'a flagrant offence against society,' and the reservation is one which should, in my opinion, be made in reference to all cases in which the sanctions of morality and those of religion are in direct conflict. I would, moreover, ask whether such a reservation is not specially necessary when the religion with which we have to deal is the Hindoo religion. I trust that neither here nor elsewhere shall I allow myself to say a word which might sound in the ears of the Hindoo subjects of her Majesty disrespectful towards the faith which they profess. It is a faith of which some of the tenets are worthy of a place amongst the articles of the noblest and purest creeds professed by the most civilised nations of the earth. But there is probably no religion more cumbered by super-imposed traditions, more hampered by accretions of doubtful value, more perplexing to its votaries, owing to its fluctuating and elastic character. It is a religion which is co-extensive with the life—social, political and domestic—of those who profess it. Every act, every incident of the daily life of a Hindoo, has its religious aspect. I believe I am right in saying that the Shastras lay down that whatever a man does should be done with a religious object. Let us give all credit to a religion which obtains so strong a hold upon those who profess it, and which so entirely pervades their existence. But the very fact that we are concerned with such a religion renders it doubly necessary for those who are responsible for the Government of the country to be cautious how they allow themselves to admit that religion must be allowed to block the way whenever it can be shown that a religious sanction of some kind or another can be discovered for the practice which it is sought to control or to forbid. To say that everything which such a religion enjoins must be recognised as an insuperable barrier, to be on no account traversed by the course of legislation, would mean the complete and fatal paralysis of the law as a reforming agency. The question then which we have to decide is whether we are to postpone, or to abandon, a useful measure of reform, demanded in the interests of humanity, calculated to effect a material improvement in the Hindoo race, and supported by a majority of the Hindoo community, merely upon the ground that it is objected to by a minority of that community upon the strength of a religious cannon of doubtful authority—a religious cannon which rests upon sanctions so slight that its transgression can be atoned for by the payment of a nominal fine.

"What I have said seems to lead inevitably to the second of the two reservations of which I spoke a moment ago. It is this, that in all cases where there is a conflict between the interests of morality and those of religion, the Legislature is bound to distinguish, if it can, between essentials and non-essentials, between the great fundamental principles of the religion concerned and the subsidiary beliefs and accretionary dogmas which have accidentally grown up around them. In the case of the Hindoo religion such a discrimination is especially needful, and one of the first questions which we have to ask ourselves is, assuming that the practice with which our proposed legislation will interfere is a practice supported by religious sanctions, whether those sanctions are of first-rate importance and absolutely obligatory, or whether they are of minor importance and binding only in a slight degree.

"Now, I venture to affirm that the discussion which has taken place has established beyond controversy that the particular religious observance which we are urged to respect is, in the first place, a local observance, and one far from being universally recognised by those who profess the Hindoo faith. It is a practice which is, in the main, peculiar to the Province of Bengal, and which is followed only in a portion of that Province, and only by certain classes within that portion. It will not be contended that devout Hindoosim is not to be found outside this restricted area, but the Hindoos of other parts of India do not share the alarm with which this Bill is regarded in Bengal. In the next place, it is admitted that the religious sanctions by which the practice is supported are of the weakest kind. The elaborate statement recently published by Dr. Bhandarkar of the Dekhan College at Poona, who is admitted to be one of the highest extant authorities upon questions of Hindoo religious law, makes it perfectly clear that the precepts upon which the practice in question rests may be regarded as permissive only. It is conceded on all hands that, under certain circumstances, the consummation of the marriage may lawfully be postponed, and that even where it is not lawfully postponed the omission of the necessary act is an offence which may be expiated by the slenderest and most insignificant penalties. It was stated a few days ago by Mr. Javerilal Umashankar Yajnik, in the eloquent speech delivered by him at the meeting recently held at Bombay, that it might be said without exaggeration of the eighteen millions of the Hindoo population to whom he was referring, that the bulk of them not only did not perform the Garbhodhan ceremony, but even the name of it is not known to them. Look again at the evidence which we have received from his Highness the Maharaja of Jeypore with regard to the manner in which these questions are regarded by the Chiefs and Sardars of Rajputana, who are well described in Rao Bahadur Kanti Chunder Mookerjee's admirable letter as 'rigid and orthodox Hindoos,' and far from likely to break the laws of their religion without compunction. Look also at the outspoken utterances of such men as our hon'ble colleague Mr. Nulkar, as Mr. Telang, as his Highness the Maharaja of Travancore, as His Highness the Maharaja of Vizianagram, as Mr. Justice Muthusami Aiyar of Madras, and, even in Bengal, of such men as his Highness the Maharaja of Bettiah, his Highness the Maharaja of Dubhanga, or in Calcutta itself, as Raja Durga Churn Law, lately our colleague in the Legislative Council, as Baboo P. C. Mozoomdar, whose note upon the subject deserves the most attentive study, and as Dr. Rash Behari Ghose, the eminent pleader, who has stated that, within his knowledge, the Garbhodhan ceremony is admittedly not observed in many respectable Hindoo families and is not unfrequently more honoured in the breach than in the observance. I cannot, in the face of the evidence of such men as these, accept without a protest the statement of our hon'ble colleague Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, whose absence from the Council I deeply regret, that we are 'forcing this reform upon an unwilling people.' To them, and to many more who have raised their voices in support of the measure, I desire to offer a public acknowledgment of the service which they have rendered. I feel convinced that the time is not far off when their fellow citizens, without exception, will recognize that such men as these, rather than they who have so noisily and so thoughtlessly repeated the parrot cry 'our religion is in danger,' are the true leaders of public opinion in this country.

"I will, however, not further pursue this branch of the subject, which has been fully dealt with by previous speakers. If we can say not only that the observance under discussion is far from being regarded by the majority of those who profess the Hindoo religion as essential, but also that its practice is repugnant to common sense, abhorrent to modern civilization, debasing to those who adopt it, and detrimental to the physical and moral welfare of the race, we may, I think, consider that we have placed it completely outside the category of those religious customs and observances on behalf of which the Queen's Proclamation may be invoked, and which are deserving of recognition and protection at the hands of the responsible law-givers of British India.

"I will now pass for a moment to the third great objection which has been raised against the measure. It is the objection founded upon the anticipation that it will lead to inquisitorial action by the police, to prosecutions instituted from vindictive motives, and to criminal investigations into family matters of the most domestic and private character. Of this objection I will say that, whatever may be our opinions with regard to some of the arguments which have been brought forward against the Bill, there can be no doubt as to the perfect sincerity with which this argument has been urged upon us. The apprehension, considering the condition under which a great part of the population of this country lead their lives, is a perfectly natural one; we should, if we were situated as they are, probably entertain a similar apprehension ourselves. I would, however, in the first place, entreat the public to be cautious how in this or in any other case it allows itself to be too much influenced by arguments founded upon the possibility that a new law is likely to be abused in this manner. If the Government of India had been deterred from legislating whenever it could be told that its legislation would place in the hands of the police or of private persons a weapon which they might use in an improper manner, many of our most useful enactments would never have found their way into the Code. Now, as far as bona fide prosecutions are concerned, the assumption that there will be frequent prosecutions under the new section is obviously based on the anticipation that the law will be frequently broken. I am sanguine enough to believe that this expectation will not be fulfilled. It is an expectation upon which the frequently expressed belief that the new law will be a dead letter is a somewhat remarkable commentary. Our proposals, moreover, already command a very large measure of public support, and I do not doubt that in the end Native opinion, which has always ended by supporting the law in cases of this kind, will end by supporting it in this instance also. When once it has become established that that which is, I believe, already regarded by a majority of the people of this country as a moral offence, and which our hon'ble colleague Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter himself stigmatizes as a vice and as a pernicious custom, is also an offence which will render those who commit it, or those who abet it, liable to penal consequences, the offence will, I venture to think, become one of rare occurrence. I may observe in passing that it was mainly in deference to the apprehensions of which I have spoken that we found ourselves unable to accept the well-intentioned proposal that we should insert in the Bill, as an alternative for the limit of age which we have adopted, the attainment of puberty by the girl. This proposal, which seemed to us open to objection upon other grounds, was certainly open to criticism, for the reason that its adoption might have led to investigations far more inquisitorial, and far more repugnant to family sentiment, than any which are likely to take place under the Bill as it stands.

"It is, however, contended that the tendency of the Bill will be to encourage proceedings which are not instituted bona fide but from malicious motives, and in order to bring disgrace upon the family of the accused, and a moving picture has been drawn of the anguish and humiliation which such proceedings will occasion of the usage to which an innocent woman might be exposed before the question of fact could be satisfactorily disposed of, and of the public scandal which would be created if things which usually sub judice teguntur are allowed to be openly discussed in a public Court of Justice. The argument is one which I can assure the Council the Government of India has most anxiously considered. We have, I think, shown our sense of the necessity of guarding against these risks by making the offence a non-cognizable one, and thereby increasing the difficulties in the way of vexatious prosecutions. We have also agreed to add to the measure a clause preventing all but District Magistrates from dealing with cases in which husband and wife are concerned, and precluding any police officer below the rank of an inspector from making or taking part in the investigation when one has been directed by the Magistrate.

"But it may be argued that these precautions will be of no avail. It will be said, the 'reputation of our families and the sanctity of our homes will still remain at the mercy of a dismissed servant or an offended neighbour.' I cannot bring myself to share these gloomy anticipations, or to believe that false charges of this kind will be as common as we are asked to believe. The person who makes them will, in the first place, tender himself liable to the most severe punishment. The very fact that the offence is to be punished by a heavy penalty increases, as the hon'ble member in charge of the Home Department has well pointed out, that to which the person falsely charging such an offence exposes himself. We should moreover, remember that the false witness will have not only the law to reckon with. If the charge which he makes is odious, how odious will he be who invents such a charge, and how tremendous will be the penalty which he will pay by attracting to himself the indignation of the whole community to which he belongs. It is however not only to considerations of this kind that we must look for a safeguard against the danger. We have to remember that the person who seeks to prefer a charge of this sort must make out a prima facie case, sufficient to satisfy a Magistrate of the highest position and respectability---a Magistrate who under existing procedure is bound to take into account the character of the person by whom the charge is preferred. Is it likely under such circumstances that a trumped-up accusation will have the desired effect? Is it not much more likely that it will recoil upon the head of him, who makes it?

"I do not, however, wish to press this argument too far, and I will assume that in spite of every precaution there will be cases---I do not for a moment believe that they will be common---in which such charges will be preferred from malice or from other improper motives. Assuming this to be the case, all that I would ask the opponents of this Bill to do is to open in their minds what I might call a debtor and creditor account for and against this measure. Let them set upon one side the risks to which I have just referred and which I believe to be infinitesimally small, and let them set upon the other side the certainty that this measure will remove a standing reproach from the Hindoo community, and that it will afford to their wives and daughters a protection of which, after the ghastly disclosures which have taken place during the discussion of this measure,---disclosures of which but for their horror more would certainly have been heard,---we cannot for a moment doubt that they stand sorely in need. Which way ought the balance to incline? Will not those whose feeling are feelings of true patriotism reply---'We are content to run this risk, we are content to expose ourselves to the annoyance which once in a way the spite of a private enemy or a corrupt informer may occasion to us and to our families for the sake of the good which this change in the law will bring to our sons from whom it will remove a cruel temptation, to our daughters, whom it will rescue from the worst of outrages, and to the whole Hindoo people, whom it will liberate from a disgraceful reproach.'

"I have already explained the reasons for which we have been unable to accept the suggestion, which has been made to us, that we should abandon our intention to raise the age of consent and deal at once with the whole question of the marriage law by invalidating all marriages contracted with a woman below the age of twelve. A change of the law in this direction is one which will, I trust, ultimately be demanded by the Hindoo community itself. It is not one which, under existing circumstances, we are prepared to impose upon that community. So long as we adhere to our present proposal, we are, I believe, in an inextinguishable position. No new departure is involved in the amendment of the law which we recommend. The existing law, of which the justice is admitted, specifies the age at which intercourse with a woman, whether with or without her consent, is an offence against that law. No complaint is made of this enactment, nor is it likely that any one will be found bold enough to propose that the protection which is already afforded to these young children should be withdrawn from them. The necessity of an age limit being admitted, the only question which the Council has to decide is whether our proposal fixes that limit at the proper point. We contend that the point at which we propose to fix it accords, at all events, more closely with the physiological facts than any other. We have been pressed to adopt a higher limit, but we desire to keep on the safe side. We justify our proposal on the ground that the British law would fail to provide adequately for the safety of the children of this country if, while it protects them from all other kinds of illusage, it failed to protect them from a particular form of illusage infinitely more revolting, and infinitely more disastrous in its direct, as well as its remoter, results, than any other form of illtreatment to which they are liable.

"I have only one word to add. A hope has been expressed that when this Bill has become law the Government of India will closely watch its operation, with the object of ascertaining whether further safeguards are necessary in order to prevent its abuse. I gladly give the assurance for which we are asked. We shall cause the working of the measure to be watched with the utmost attention, and we shall be prepared, if the safeguards which we have already accepted should prove insufficient, to strengthen and add to them."

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

MAN'S LOVE.

OH ! Fanny, do not sigh for me,—
I shall not sigh for you ;
With heart unfettered, light and free,
I smile a last adieu.
Though strewn with flowers the sportive hours
With Fanny that flew by,
I could not stay another day,
For India's gold—not I !—
For still my bounding heart is free,
And longs for something new ;
Then, Fanny, do not sigh for me,—
I shall not sigh for you !

The bird that hath not built its nest,
Is not more free than I ;
The butterfly is not more blest,—
From sweet to sweet I fly.
My pathway lies through sparkling eyes,
I count them o'er and o'er ;
Each dawning light appears more bright
Than that which shone before !
For ah ! to love them all I'm free,
(I'll use that freedom too !)
Then, Fanny, do not sigh for me,—
I shall not sigh for you !

WOMAN'S LOVE.

" THY home is not so bright, Ladye,
As it was wont to be ;—
Thine eyes have lost their light, Ladye,
Thy laugh its ringing glee.
Thy step is sad and slow,—
Thy faltering accents fail ;
Alas ! that tears should flow
Down cheeks so young and pale !
Thou wert not once so sad and strange ;—
Oh ! what has wrought this wondrous change ?"

" Mine eyes are like the moon, Pilgrim,
They shone with borrowed light ;
My cheek, like flowers of noon, Pilgrim,
Grows pale with coming night.
My voice is like the bird
That greets the op'ning day ;
My laugh is only heard
When this poor heart is gay :
Oh ! when the sun has left the sky,
The earth is dark—and so am I !"

" The sun is shining bright, Ladye,
Down from the summer skies ;
The flowers that sleep at night, Ladye,
Now ope their smiling eyes.
The birds are singing now,
* With free exulting voice ;
Nature is glad—and thou,—
Why dost not thou rejoice ?
Look up, and greet the sun's bright beam—
Feel that of night thou dost but dream."

" That dream is in my heart, Pilgrim,
It lieth there so deep,
It never will depart, Pilgrim,
Awake, nor yet in sleep :
A dream of severed ties,
Of love so fond—so vain ;
Of words, and smiles, and sighs,
That will not come again !
My sun, alas ! was not in heaven :
Its light from human eyes was given !"

* LIVE for thyself ! let each successive morn
Rouse thee to plans of self-indulgent ease ;
And every hour some new caprice be born,
Till all be thrown aside that does not please .
So shalt thou learn how shallow is the fount
Whose glittering waves all wholesome thirst destroy,
And, heart-sick, even in youth, begin to count
Springs without hope, and summers blank of joy !

Live for thy fellow-men ! let all thy soul
Be given to serve and aid, to cheer and love ;
Make sacrifice of self, and still control
All meaner motives which the heart might move .
The sting of disappointment shall be thine ;
The meed of base ingratitude be won :
Rare veins of gold illumine the labored mine
And toil and sadness cloud thy setting sun !

Live for thy God ! Thine anchor shall be cast
Where no false quicksands shift its hold away ;
Through the clear future, from the sunrise past,
Glow the calm light along the even way.
* The loss of human hopes shall vex no more
Than the quick withering of earth's common flowers,
For well thou know'st when pain and death are o'er,
Eternal spring shall glad the heavenly bowers !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THERE is joy at Arnee. Mr. A. Streenewasa Row, Sahib Bahadur, the Jaghirdar, has returned from his pilgrimage in the North, after visiting Benares, Hurdwar, Agra, Gwalior, Nassick, Bijapur and other places.

On the 5th March the little commune of Riedisheim, near Mulhouse in Alsace, was thrown into commotion by a horrible act of cruelty. To punish his son, a boy of twelve, for some slight offence, a man bound the child's hands, passed a cord under his arms, hoisted him up to the ceiling, and then with a hammer nailed his hands to the wall. Attracted by the cries of the victim the neighbours ran into the house, rescued the child, and but for the police would certainly have hoisted up the father instead. The Police had the greatest difficulty in protecting the fellow from the indignation of the people while he was being conveyed to Mulhouse goal. He would have been served right. Such miscreants do not deserve pity.

THE Yunani Medical School, Delhi, of whose establishment and inauguration we gave a full account, is progressing favourably. Colonel H. Grey, the Commissioner of the Delhi Division, visited this School recently and made the following interesting remarks on the visitors' book :—

"The progress and success of Delhi Medical School is gratifying. That Hakim Abdul Majid Khan should have conceived and started such an enterprise is quite a new departure in Indian Medicine. Hitherto that Art has been intrusted because its practitioners have to a great extent worked empirically, and with no guarantee of qualification except their own assertion. But those, who leave this School, after a complete course, will possess a good guarantee of qualification, and their practice, far from being empirical, will be based upon sound instruction, not in the yunani therapeutics only, but in anatomy, in pharmacy, and in practical diagnosis and treatment of cases. In this combination of European and Oriental medicine the school meets a great want, and that a distinguished Indian Physician like Hakim Abdul Majid Khan should thus bestow not time and means only, but his special knowledge, his ancestral methods, his family library of accumulated scientific experience upon the advancement of his profession in India, is as before said, a new departure. For in Oriental countries the practice has hitherto been to jealously guard the personal knowledge and acquirements for personal advantage. As far as I can judge the system of instruction is as practical and sound as it is evidently popular. The number of pupils already attending the school, and their success as shown by the list of prize-winners in the first year's report, prove that full advantage is likely to be taken of his philanthropic undertaking."

A REMARKABLE performer called Gavashamba Yogiswar of Benares has turned up at Tanjore, where he is holding seances. Before the elite of the town he is giving demonstrations of Yoga practices. On the evening of the 7th March many of the learned were present, for two, Assistant Surgeon V. V. Patanker and Dr. Nailer, the Civil Surgeon of the District, when the Yogiswar fairly astonished them by his feats :—

1. He introduced the small ends of a rope $\frac{1}{4}$ inch in diameter at its ends and $\frac{3}{8}$ in its middle up his nostrils and brought them out through the mouth drawing the cord to and fro freely.
2. He swallowed wholesale a fairly coarse cloth of 21 feet by 30 inches and brought it out again.
3. He dislocated his wrist ankle and hip almost entirely checking the circulation and then restored the parts to their normal positions and conditions.
4. He showed various feats by working his intestines and other abdominal viscera at his will."

It is said that the medical men, lawyers and others who were present have certified to the facts. There was no deception practised. The subject is worth serious and scientific inquiry.

THE Press of Paris publishes a remarkable letter of E. M. De Vogué's on the convocation of a universal Congress for Peace. We translate it for the benefit of our readers, as follows :—

"You ask for my opinion as to the possible success of universal Congress for Peace.

I believe with Darwin that the violent struggle is a law of nature which governs all being; I believe with Joseph de Maistre that it is a divine law; two different ways of naming the same thing.

If one portion of human society—let us take the civilized West—come to suspend the effect of this law, some races more instinctive will charge themselves to apply it against us; the races will give reason according to nature against human reason; they will succeed, because the certainty of peace—I do not say the peace, I say the certainty of peace—will engender before half a century, a corruption and decadence more destructive of men than the worst of wars.

I think we must make criminal law of the war for mankind what we ought to make all our criminal laws; vis. to soften them, to render their application as rare as possible, to strain all our efforts that they may be of no use.

But the entire experience of history teaches us that we cannot suppress them so long as there remain two men on earth, some pain, some riches and a woman among them.

I shall be very glad if the Congress can give me a lie; I doubt whether it will give it to history, to nature and to God."

At the Holi Festival on Wednesday, the Maharaja of Hutwa held a Durbar for the formal installation of his new ministry. He spoke feelingly of the recent death of Babu Bhubaneswar Dutt, the late Dewan Manager, and by way of practical demonstration of his appreciation of the latter's services announced the following appointments:—Babu Devendranath Dutt, nephew of the late Dewan, to be Dewan and first Manager; Babu Bipin Behari Bose, cousin of the late Dewan, Superintendent of the Raj, to be Manager; Babu Girindra Nath Dutt, another nephew, to be Superintendent, and Babu Norrundra Nath Dutt, another nephew, to be appointed Private Secretary to his Highness. These gentlemen then presented their respective nuzzurs and received from his Highness valuable khillats.

After this let no friend of the deceased repine that there was no memorial meeting nor even a Gazette on his death. This is the Oriental style of memorialising. And it is a truer, nobler and withal more practical, mode of recognising claims than the European vapouring which we are now cultivating.

The proceedings are creditable alike to the Maharaja and his late Manager. We as Bengalis are proud of the compliment paid to our people.

THERE was a long and interesting debate lately in the French Senate, on the condition of Algeria, in which many prominent politicians of various parties took part.

M. Jacques denied antagonism between the natives and the colonists. He detailed the various measures which had been adopted for the improvement of the country. He confessed however that the question of the education of the native children did not receive sufficient attention.

M. Jules Ferry regarded Algeria a glorious feather in the French cap. It was time to look back and see how France had treated her colony. The question of questions was the land question. There were two opposing interests to fight over it, the native on the one hand and the colonist on the other. During the Empire Algeria was governed for the benefit of the Arabs. A reaction followed with the Republic. From 1871 to 1883 the colonists were petted, and the Arabs went to the wall. In 1883, however, a credit of 50,000,000fr., was asked for the colonisation of 300,000 hectares of land taken from the Arabs and 80,000 of State lands. This credit was refused, and the rejection proved a mortal blow for State colonisation. As to the talk of a conflict between the 3,000,000 natives of Algeria and the colonists, there was no such danger. The security of the country had been amply provided for. The question of education was no doubt full of difficulties, but they were not insurmountable. M. Ferry pointed to the success attained at Tunis. It was not proposed to give a thoroughly French education to the children but only such an elementary education as would not come into conflict with the Koran. Towards arriving at a modus vivendi, the Minister of the Interior was willing to collaborate with a committee. To be of any use that committee must be like the great English Parliamentary Committee, with power to summon witnesses. M. Ferry concluded with bewailing the indifference of the public to colonial affairs, and the consequent ignorance that prevails in respect of them. The misfortune of Algeria was that it was too little known.

THIS is the first time that the gods have been disturbed in order to eke out a political agitation against a proposed legislation. The incident is so novel that all Hindus must be curious to know the mode of appeal to Heaven. We have therefore been to the trouble of translating the Bill of Worship which was circulated. Here is the English translation of the Bengali invitation to the Maha Puja at Kalighat to ward off the Age of Consent Bill :—

"THE GREAT WORSHIP AT THE SHRINE OF KALIGHAT,

Sunday, the 2nd Chaitra, 1297, of the Sala era.

If the proposed Bill of Consent pass into law, great injury will be done to the Hindu Religion, the principal pillar of the great edifice of the Hindu Religion will be broken, a great calamity will be caused in the midst of the domestic circle of the Hindus. In order that the aforesaid dire, invenomed bill may not be passed into law, a grand worship consisting of sixteen offerings will take place before the Mother (meaning the Goddess Káli) in the forenoon of Sunday, the 2nd Chaitra.

We hear that the English are determined to pass the law. Though millions upon millions of Hindus with clasped hands have cried ever so much before the sovereign, have adduced arguments ever so much, the Government does not lend a hearing to anything.

We are the loyal Hindu subjects. At this last moment we will go to Kalighat, and pray weeping at that great shrine (sacred seat) before that Bestower of all Blessings, that Destroyer of Calamity, that dread Goddess of Illusion, saying, O mother! save us, grant the right sense to the Government!

All the residents of Calcutta are to be present at Kalighat on Sunday; millions and millions of people will assemble. All, rich and poor, learned and ignorant, all will join in the worship of the Mother. All have an equal right before the mother.

A more imposing spectacle than was seen at the conjuncture called the Aradhodaya, will be witnessed on this grand occasion.

At Kalighat one hundred Brahmans will recite the Chandi, a grand worship consisting of sixteen offerings will take place. The names of Doorga and of Madhusudana will be repeated, one hundred thousand times each, oblations into the fire will be made ten thousand times. Many a band of Hari-chanters will shake the whole way from Calcutta to Kalighat. At this time of death [from the Bill,] the children of Hind shall all die with the word Kali, Kali, Hari, Hari! on their lips. Such is the general vow.

On Sunday at 2 O'clock about fifty bands of chanters will assemble at Jagu Babu's Bazar, Bhowanipore, thence in rows the chanters will proceed towards Kalighat.

Children of the Hindu race! Come forward! At the fixed time, bathing in the sacred Ganges, with hearts pure, chanting the name of Hari, do all pray with full fervour before the Great (goddess of) Illusion for safety to the Hindu religion.

(Signed by) Khetterpal Smritiratra, Raj Kumar Nyaratna, Chunder Sekhur Chudamani, Ambica Churn Banerjee, Inder Chunder Sing, Nilkrishna Deb, Romanath Ghose, Gungaprosad Sen, Bepin Behari Mitra, Nundo Lal Bose, Girindra Kumar Dutt.

The English advertisement was a much simpler affair, namely:—

"Grand Maha Pujah at Kalighat.

A grand Maha Puja in connection with the Age of Consent Bill will be held at the celebrated shrine of Kalighat on Sunday the 15th March (this day) 1891. Every true Hindu is invited to attend, and offer his prayers to Heaven at a crisis like this.

Puja and Homa in the morning; Sunkeertan in the afternoon.

(Signed by) Khetter Pal Smritiratra; Chander Sikhur Chooramany; Rajkumar Nyaratna; Neel Krishna Deb; Binaya Krishna Deb; Inder Chunder Singh; Damodar Das Burman; Raj Kumar Roy; Roma Nath Ghose; Gunga Prosad Sen; Bepin Beharee Mittra; Narendra Nath Mittra; Nanda Lal Bose; Poshupati Nath Bose; Girindra Kumar Dutt; Ambica Charan Bannerjee; Dheerendra Nath Dutt; Kiran Chandra Roy; Nibaran Chandra Dutt.

THE Englishman gives the rough results of the Census of the Central Provinces:—

"The returns have been received for all the province, except one district and one feudatory State. Allowing for these omissions, the results in round figures are as follows, as compared with the previous Census:—

British Territory.

1881...	... 9,838,791	1891 10,725,000
---------	---------------	----------	----------------

Feudatory States.

1881...	... 17,09,720	1891 20,50,000

There has thus been an increase of about 9 per cent. in British territory, and of about 20 per cent. in the Feudatory States."

This is no doubt a startling difference between British India and Native India. Our contemporary is bound to find out the cause and does not find it easy to do so. It writes:—

"The large percentage under the latter heading is no doubt to be ascribed in part to stricter enumeration; but still the increase is remarkable. According to the official theory, the cultivators ought to move from Native to British territory, sua si bona morint. [sic] But in actual experience, it would seem that the reverse is what is happening, and the Census will probably show that this is the fixed condition of things throughout India."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THOSE who frivolously object to the passing of the Age of Consent Bill as if it were a foregone conclusion, cannot have read the proceedings of the Council, or read them to any purpose. The speeches of the member in charge of the Bill, and of Mr. Hutchins in particular contain abundant proof of the anxious consideration which the Select Committee paid to the more weighty of the objections urged against the Bill and the more reasonable suggestions which had been offered for its modification. Probably the oppositionists would have been perfectly satisfied if, instead of a hard and fast limit of age, the occurrence of a certain physical condition in the girl-wife had been adopted as an alternative for the limit of age. And was this proposal rejected without sufficient consideration? On the contrary, was it not treated with every respect? The Viceroy himself calls it a well-intentioned proposal and both he and Sir Andrew Scoble enter into a full examination of its merits. It would no doubt have allayed the opposition by removing the religious objection. But at the same time it would have let open the door to inquisitorial proceedings of a far more repugnant nature than what would attend the adoption of the age limit. On this point Mr. Hutchins says:—

"To a certain extent I sympathize with this view. Real and natural puberty would undoubtedly be a far better physiological test than any hard-and-fast age. There are, however, insuperable objections to the magistracy investigating delicate questions of this description, and I am sure no one would press these objections more strongly than those who oppose the present Bill. The condition too is one which is easily simulated, and which can be, and is, accelerated by the very evil which we are seeking to stop or by other unnatural practices. I do not forget that among Hindus the attainment of puberty is usually attended with certain ceremonies and becomes a matter almost of public notoriety, but even this does not obviate the objections which I have just stated. Besides, it must be remembered that we are not legislating for Hindus alone: the Penal Code has universal application."

"I may observe in passing that it was mainly in deference to the apprehensions of which I have spoken that we found ourselves unable to accept the well-intentioned proposal that we should insert in the Bill, as an alternative for the limit of age which we have adopted, the attainment of puberty by the girl. This proposal, which seemed to us open to objection upon other grounds, was certainly open to criticism, for the reason that its adoption might have led to investigations far more inquisitorial, and far more repugnant to family sentiment, than any which are likely to take place under the Bill as it stands."

WITH regard to other modifications emanating from one or other quarter, most of them were of an impractical character which reflects on the fitness of the proposers to advise the legislature. Surely the Council cannot be blamed for not being a party to amendments which would have made the law absolutely a dead-letter. Such proposals could not possibly be accepted without virtually abandoning the principle of the Bill. Everybody in making suggestions for the improvement of the Bill spoke from his own point of view, and some of the proposals were absurd enough to show that their authors could not have any idea of the points of view from which the Government viewed, and must view, the subject. Nevertheless these proposals had received the consideration of the members of the Select Committee and the objections to their acceptance were in some cases stated with a fulness which ought to set at rest the cry of the Bill being hurried through without hearing the other side.

THE proposal for making a distinction in the law of rape in favor of the husband, stands on a different footing. Even those who fully sympathize with the action of the Council on this head will admit that this is eminently a point on which something may always be urged with honor on the other side. Sir Andrew Scoble remarks on the proposal as follows:—

"Then it is said that the offence, when committed by a husband against his wife, ought not to be classed as rape, and should be visited with a lighter punishment. I do not think it desirable that the gravity of the offence should be minimized in this way. I agree with Sir Meredith Plowden that 'it is an offence affecting the wife not as wife, but as a human creature'; and I should greatly regret if this Council were to weaken the effect of the Bill by drawing a distinction in favour of brutality on the part of husbands. With regard to the amount of punishment to be inflicted, that is a matter for the consideration of the Courts, which will apportion it, within the limits laid down in the Bill, according to the circumstances of the case; and while, in some instances, a light penalty may be inflicted, it can scarcely be doubted that cases will occur in which the highest penalty awardable will not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the offence committed."

The spirit of these words is highly honorable to the speaker, and though lying under a stigma of barbarism at the present moment, we can fully appreciate them. Though a lawyer retired from practice Sir Andrew managed to raise the subject out of the lower sphere of vulgar technicalities into the serene atmosphere of that general jurisprudence which is the highest morality, the same to all nations and races. We trust all who honestly pressed for differentiation of the offence of rape, will bow to the Law Member's argument. Sir Andrew is not without high precedent. Thereby hangs a tale, which we hope we may mention without indelicacy. He heard his father, who worked with Lord Brougham for the abolition of slavery, say that that great man proceeded on the principle that unless the crime were made a felony it would not be possible to stamp out the evil.

THE passing of the Bill has already had the quieting effect upon the community which was anticipated. The country wants nothing so much as rest. Will it be allowed it? Although there is talk of continuing the opposition, and even carrying it to England we trust soberer counsels will yet prevail, and our countrymen will be content to rest upon the laurels they have already won! England is no place to stand such disgraceful impudence, and although it is not the war so much as the sinews of war which some people have chiefly an eye to, we think those who will have to provide the sinews will soon find themselves in a different mind. In the meantime we are glad to hear some of the leading Garbhadhanists themselves talking of conforming to the law in thorough earnest. This is the proper attitude, and this is the time for men of education to explain to their less favored brethren how conforming to the law is easily practicable without any great sacrifice. It is in the educative influence of the measure that its efficacy will chiefly lie. Men are not, indeed, debarred from marrying their daughters before 12. Under exceptional circumstances they may well be justified in doing so. But such marriages should always take place on the implied condition which now prevails in Behar, Orissa and other parts of India. The married couple are under no circumstances to be thrown in the way of temptation. Under ordinary circumstances, however, it would be more expedient to put off marriages till the age of 12, and what a scope this would give for the development of female education so far as efforts in that direction are being made in some places. Altogether the law will exercise a salutary effect both upon the physical and moral wellbeing of the race, and the barbarous fashion of looking at even children with an eye to their capacity for sexual intercourse will give place to healthier views.

THERE is a pretty little tempest in a teapot in the great Pacific Ocean. The situation of affairs in the Hawaiian Archipelago is critical. The new Queen seems to be ambitious and obstinate, yet she is evidently slow to make up her mind what to do under the circumstances. It was unfortunate that she did not form a Government at once on the news of King Kalakua's death. The delay encouraged all sorts of intrigues. The influential American missionaries headed by the Chief Justice, Mr. Judd, offered to form an administration. The Queen would have none of it. She was not prepared to hand the country over to the Europeans, planters and merchants, who were opposed to the interests of the natives and who would have no Kanakas in executive offices. Other cabinets were then proposed and abandoned, or formed and dissolved. At last Mr. Widemann was charged to conduct the Queen's Government and the new Premier formed a ministry but two of the old ministers would not vacate their posts, and could not apparently be ousted. Meanwhile the Commander of the Honolulu Rifles, Colonel Ashford, had planned a coup d'état by seizing the Queen and keeping her as a faux royalty and establishing a native Government on the lines of Mr. Wilcox's policy of 1887, but luckily the conspiracy was nipped in the bud.

The Queen desires to keep all parties in the country in humour, but her views in regard to the future succession is likely to give offence. Instead of making Princess Kamilani heiress she contemplates the succession in favour of her son. This seems but natural, but then the latter is illegitimate. What is worse in the eyes of the White population is that he is a full blooded Kanaka.

The people of the Archipelago are not what they were when Captain

Cook discovered the islands. They are indeed Christians and civilised. But it is just possible that there is a lurking preference in them still for the wisdom of their ancestors. The Queen probably considers the objection to her son on the ground of illegitimacy a weak White prejudice. Her personal preference for him is but natural and to her credit as a mother.

THERE is a curious law of compensation in the West in operation between the Atlantic Continents. What is lost on one side the water is gained on the other side. This was well-illustrated in the case of the Irish Home Ruler, when the cloven foot of the Demagogue was exposed in the O'Shea divorce suit. Spurned by the respectability of the Eastern Hemisphere, he became the hero fit for the mobocracy of the Western. In proportion as he was at a discount at home, he rose in premium in the United States. He received undeniable assurance in the following telegram from "Milwaukee.—To Parnell, London—Will give you 75,000 dols. for one hundred lectures in America. Contract guaranteed by 25,000 dols. deposit.—Answer fully at our expense—Messrs. Thompson, Gaylor, and Depres."

Mr. Parnell of course declined the offer. He sets on himself a higher price. He had in his pocket the key to the Rint chest, which must be surrendered were he to abandon himself to the mercy of the Milwaukee Barnum as an exhibit throughout America. He would have had to give up all his parliamentary position and prospects. To descend from the uncrowned King of Ireland to a professional lecturer would have been a truly Irish anticlimax.

Probably no race of man is free from curiosity or the desire for money-making. These are developed far more in the West than in the East. But they are most intense in the Western Hemisphere. The passion for shows is as inveterate in the American as that for gambling in the Chinese. It is in the native country of Barnum that Barnumism best flourishes. The Americans seem to regard everything and everybody in their show-making capabilities. The Yankee would start in search of the Grand Lama or Prester John if he saw the least chance of either worthy submitting to be carried about like the Siamese Twins or Jumbo, for the amusement of a gaping but paying multitude. The Americans have converted the most magnificent phenomenon of Nature—the cataract of Niagra, we mean—into a business and a show. One enterprising person made to Dickens a commercial proposal the degradation of which his transatlantic mind did not perceive. The Poet Laureate himself has not been spared. And now they would have utilised the stained Parnell if permitted.

SOME months ago, we quoted from an article in a British periodical an account of different kinds of food which have been in vogue among the races of man, including human flesh. Since then have appeared the startling revelations made by Mr. Stanley of the proceedings of his colleagues in African discovery, culminating in a charge of man-eating against one of them. Before this, another African traveller was the only Christian or civilised man who was suspected of a partiality for human flesh—we refer to Sir Richard Burton. Even in his lifetime, from time to time, he was more or less openly charged, and he scarcely seemed to deny the soft impeachment. The point was cleared up after the brave, good but eccentric man's death, in one of the obituary notices. Mr. Edwin de Leon, in his new work Thirty Years of My Life on Three Continents, gives the full particulars of the origin of the myth. He got them from old Dick himself, who thoroughly enjoyed the narration:—

"Dining in England with a very strait-laced set of people in the country, who he fancied considered him as something little short of an ogre, he met several very young ladies, and he made up his mind to horrify them. He commenced giving a narrative of an imaginary shipwreck on the Red Sea, or the Blue Nile, remote from all human habitation or help. After describing how they all suffered from the pangs of hunger, and the wolfish glances they began to cast on each other from time to time, as the days wore on, and no relief came; dropping his voice to a mysterious whisper, almost under his breath, he added: 'The cabin-boy was young and fat, and looked very tender, and on him, more than on any other, such looks were cast, until—' Here he paused, looked around at the strained and startled faces of his auditors, in which horror was depicted, and then abruptly concluded, as though dismissing a disagreeable memory—'But these are not stories to be told at a cheerful dinner party, in a Christian country, and I had best say no more. Let us turn to some more cheerful subject.' Of course, he was pressed to continue, and complete his story, but stubbornly refused; leaving his hearers in a most unsatisfactory state of mind as to the dénouement of the unfinished narrative. Burton told me he was thoroughly convinced, by the startled looks cast upon him by the younger ladies, that they believed that he and his tougher comrades in the shipwreck had roasted and eaten that cabin-boy, whose tenderness he had so eulogised. They seemed to have no doubt that he really was a cannibal, in fact as well as in intention."

Cannibalism may be a safe joke—of howsoever grim a kind—in a cozy drawing-room in England, but it is at times a dire necessity to travellers and voyagers. Then, and for them, the joke altogether ceases. The development of the situation which prepares men for that extremity, has often been described but never with such vivid fidelity as in the poetry of Byron, in his Don Juan. The horror of the extremity itself is still more frightful, and beyond painter or poet. The subject, in fact, is one of those too painful for artistic treatment. Herein the unpretending, indeed, bald and inaccurate prose of a seaman—Captain Hall—has succeeded in leaving a picture which Dante could not achieve. In his Arctic Experiences, Hall has photographed as it were the struggle for existence of the survivors between themselves, all together by fact and necessity but separated by deadly antagonism of interest, each trying to eat up the other. We have never seen so graphic an account of so degrading a distress. There is certainly no fun in it.

THE success of Girton is pronounced. Having brought up girl graduates, it is now turning out girl professors. The late Dean Alford's niece, Miss Marguerite Alford, who took a first class in classics at that College, has been appointed pro tem to the chair of Greek during the absence of the Rector who is away to the Continent, and who holds it.

By a slip last week we spoke of the meeting of the Faculty of Arts as a meeting of the Senate. To-day we have to announce that the Faculty of Law have elected to the Syndicate Mr. Justice Ameer Ali, as President, and Baboo Mohini Mohan Roy, member. The Faculty of Medicine have sent Dr. Birch, as President, and Baboo Taraprasanna Roy, demonstrator of Chemistry, Medical College, as member.

THE passage of the Bill has been followed by the usual fashion of a weak fallen race—revenge on those of their own countrymen who supported it. These hapless men are undergoing not a little persecution. There have been several assaults and rowdy attempts at breach of the peace by the more youthful and violent among the disappointed opponents of the Bill. This spirit is not confined to the younger generation, we are afraid, though the practical operation of it may be. The older men though ready enough to encourage and incite this sort of bravery in their brats, doubtless find it more convenient to give vent to their feelings by bespattering the more prominent of the supporters of the Bill with abuse. The support is attributed to motives of (to use a vulgarism) currying favor with the powers that be with an eye to honors and honorary and honorable offices. In the woebegone imagination of these our discomfited friends and brothers, we are nothing better than base self-seekers, dying for titles and recognition. They resent our characterizing the opposition as a barbarous one but they take far too little care to contradict the accusation by their own conduct. Alas! that we cannot differ in opinion and yet behave towards one another as gentlemen! But what better can be expected of the clientele of a hireling journalism.

Luckily all this is confined to Calcutta the home and centre of the agitation. The seat of the new phenomenon of mild Bengali ruffianism is appropriately the heart of Black Town. From the first some of the prime movers against the Bill were determined to defeat it, by hook or by crook. Early they resorted to questionable means. The few supporters of the Bill in the native press were their eyegore. Not content with the success of their own journals with populace and people, they made special efforts to crush the papers which had the courage to stem the overwhelming tide of opposition. The reward these latter received was boycotting. Meanwhile the controversy raged unabated. The agitators stumped the town and organised meetings in several wards and caused some to be held in other towns and even in some distant provinces. Efforts were made to inflame the Mahomedans against a measure provoked by Hindu, indeed Bengali, viciousness. These reckless men even went so far as to tamper with the military and the warlike races, luckily, for themselves as well as the country, without effect. Then they held the demonstration of thousands before Fort William. As the Viceroy would not come to treat with them, King Mob, King Mob would go to the Viceroy and go he did. The sentry was overpowered and the gate would have been forced and thousands of yelling natives, Bengalis, Hindustanis, Marwaris, and others, would have filled Government House in search of the ruler of India—with what consequences, God knows—were it not for the excellent arrangements made by the Commissioner of Police and the promptitude of his troopers in coming to the rescue. The Police succeeded in dispersing the mischievous crowd which as it retreated sent on the Police volleys of brick bats some of which struck the guardians of the peace, one in especial hitting the Deputy Commissioner. Of course there was far more noise than fight. The uproar before Government House was deafening. Next we had the Carnival of worship at the shrine of Kalighat, the programme of which we give in another column.

It was Sunday and Christian Calcutta was at divine service in the churches when the worshippers from Kalighat returned. As they passed the Cathedral where the Viceroy is wont to make his pooja the crowd collected there and kept up such a howl that for some minutes the service had to be suspended, till the Police succeeded in driving them away. Before, however, finally dispersing to their homes in the native town, they attacked the Church of the Brahma Samaj of India in Cornwallis Street, disturbing the service there and behaving infamously towards the ladies of the Brahma families living in that neighbourhood. Another day these exponent of wild rather than mild Hinduism trespassed into the interior of the Church and in their presence heaped on the Brahma ladies the most shocking terms of indecent abuse. A consideration for the feelings of the victims of this unheard of barbarity alone, we understand, prevented the elders of the Church from prosecuting the ruffians. It would seem as if grown bold with repeated impunity, some of them entered in the forenoon the office of the Brahma daily, the Sanjivani, and assaulted those whom they found there, and, after destroying as much of the type and plant as they could lay their hands upon, made their escape. Such at least is the substance of a case brought by the newspaper.

The parent of the Bill himself has not of course escaped the attentions—by no means welcome—of these Bengali Fenians and filibustering politicians. More than once has Sir Andrew Scoble's life been threatened. Notwithstanding every warning, the rash Briton not only swerved not, but the insane man's high spirits were as high as ever. He continued to dance on the edge of the precipice. Then, at any rate, he would not be allowed to live a moment if he got the Bill passed. Not all the Governor-General's body-guard would protect his Law Member. But the incomprehensible Briton performed his duty with quiet non-chalance, his indignation at the practice he sought to put down unabated by one jot.

It has been the same ever since. He has from the first been the most accessible member of Government and he has remained so to the last. The patron of many native institutions, he has as freely visited them after the Bill as before. Of course the Police could not allow him to incur all the risk without special measures for his safety, but that was their business. He has passed unscathed, however. Feeble attempts at demonstration against his measure were made here on two different occasions in his presence. On the first occasion at a meeting at Sobha Bazar under the presidency of Mr. Risley, C.S., a party of boys and young men left the place to mark their sense of the conduct—not of great Sir Andrew the author of the Bill but of the poor lecturer of the evening, Babu Haraprasad Sastri, in having supported the Bill! This was sufficiently base, but the worthlessness of the demonstration was further exposed when the Garbhadhani heroes were fain to take shelter in the hall again after being driven back by pelting rain! Such is the self-respect of souls broken down by early practice of Garbhadhan to the letter. On Wednesday last at another meeting of the same character at the General Assembly's Institution, under the presidency of Sir Andrew Scoble himself there was another attempt at creating a disturbance. On the arrival of Sir Andrew, accompanied by Mr. Risley, they were received properly with cheers. Sir Andrew Scoble was a Patron of the Society which was holding its anniversary, and this was his last opportunity of taking part in its proceedings. He was, therefore, very properly received as he was. The proceedings then commenced, and Baboo Kali Charan Banerjee was proceeding with his lecture on the Education of Law when a fiery spirit rose up and, more than once, interrupted the business. He was put down. At length he would have his way, and getting up, cried out, "The law is gone mad"; in obvious reflection upon the Hon'ble gentleman in the chair,

But he had a match for him in our Parsee townsman Mr. R. D. Mehta, who immediately had him handed over to the police. A European Constable was now introduced into the hall to keep the peace of the meeting. Sir Andrew went home with two European outriders--of the Police--following his carriage.

At the station the young disturber, who is said to be a graduate, was bailed out. Next morning on appearing before the Deputy Commissioner he was discharged. He has himself charged the Police with wrongful detention and contemplates the pleasure of detaining Sir Andrew Scoble to give evidence in his case.

FACTORY LEGISLATION.

INDIAN FACTORIES ACT, 1881, AMENDMENT BILL.

THE Factories Bill was passed at the same sitting of the Council which passed the Age of Consent Bill. The Council had, indeed, unusually heavy work, before it broke up for the session. Apart from several minor Bills, the two Bills passed on the 19th of March imposed an amount of diligent application on the part of the members of the Council which was truly very trying. There is much in these Bills of a like character. Both are intended to afford protection to those who are unable to protect themselves. Both of them likewise met with a vehement opposition--both labored under suspicions as to their true motives. While the Age of Consent Bill raised apprehensions of being a blow to the religious practices of the people whom it concerned, the Factories Bill was suspected of being undertaken at the instance of English manufacturing interests to deal a similar blow to the rival industries in India. The parallel, however, ends in the circumstances of their passing. The Factories Bill, laboring as at first it did, under suspicions of its sinister origin, was, after the explanations of the Government, cordially accepted by the Hon'ble Member in the Council who represented the interests supposed to be threatened by it. The Hon'ble Mr. Mackay, the mercantile member in Council, worked in thorough harmony with the other members of the Select Committee, and ended with supporting the Bill, although it had in the beginning created great alarm among the community he represented. Quite different was the case with the lot of the other Bill. The Government must have keenly realized the difference in the attitude of Mr. Mackay and of Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter on the two occasions. In fact if Mr. Mackay had taken with respect to the Factories Bill, the attitude maintained all through by Sir Romesh Chunder with respect to the other Bill, the Government of India would have been placed in a more false position. For, in regard to the Bill opposed by Sir Romesh Chunder, the Government had, at any rate, the support of the other Hindu members, and notably that of the Hon'ble Mr. Nulkar. The Factories Bill, on the contrary, without Mr. Mackay's support, would have been deprived of all private support, and its enactment would have appeared as a pure act of coercion carried by the Government in entire disregard of the opinion of the classes whose interests were affected by it. We congratulate Mr. Mackay on the sobriety and moderation and sense of responsibility which he has shown in a truly trying situation.

Our views of any proposed interference with the conditions of factory labor in our country could not but be identical with those of the factory owners. Anything calculated to hamper the growth of the infant industries must affect the interests of our working population. And the way in which the English manufacturers and particularly the member for Oldham in the House of Commons kept up the cry for reform of the Indian Factories Act could not fail to excite suspicion and alarm in our community. The application moreover of the suggestions of the Berlin Conference to a country not represented at the deliberations of that Conference and the circumstances of which were so different from those of Europe, was also open to great objection. These objections, however, have been removed by the action of the Government of India. The Bill proposed by the Government was a very moderate one, and the subject was referred for further consideration to a Commission. The Commission made very careful enquiries among the working people, and if they did not give a hearing to the mill-owners, still what they heard from the workmen was a sufficient guarantee against their recommendations militating against the interests of the one or the other of the two classes concerned, for in this case, it so happens that those interests are the same. Their recommendations were therefore very moderate, and while providing needful limitations for securing children and women from excess of work, they took care to see that these limitations did not go beyond the requirements of that object, so as either to injuriously affect the economy of factory management or the wages earned by the classes intended to be protected from the effects of over-work. With these safe-guards provided, the proposed legislation was divested of all the objections to which it might be originally open. The Legislature has attained a rare success in dealing with this measure. The balance has been held so evenly between the employers and the employed that Mr. Mackay was able to vote for the Bill in terms of the utmost cordiality. "I consider the Government of India have fought our battle with valour, and at the same time with discretion, and while by the measure before us they have provided in every respect sufficiently for the protection of the worker, they have declined to hamper or trammel with restrictions unsuited to this country the infant industries of India, and I am therefore prepared to support the Bill." After such an opinion of Mr. Mackay, we can have no word of dissent.

The discussions on the Bill were of almost as thorough a character as those on the other Bill. Most of the members spoke at great length and the terms in which they criticised the efforts of English manufacturers to embarrass the manufacturing interests of India are likely to give them pause before they raise their voice again.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

THE Financial Statement just published shows the progressiveness of the revenue under the more important heads. Taking the accounts of the last two years into consideration, one cannot fail to be struck by the evidence they afford of the general tendency of the growth of Revenue. In Land Revenue, Salt, Stamps, Excise, Provincial Rates, Customs, Assessed Taxes, and Forest, the improvement in the years 1889-90 and 1890-91, is no less than Rs. 26,280,000. And these are the sources of revenue which are, as Sir David Barbour states, intimately connected with the general well-being of the country. In framing the Budget for 1891-92, reliance is naturally placed upon this normal character of these heads of the revenue, and if the result is not to show a large surplus, it is due to the decreases anticipated in Opium and Exchange. While the fluctuations of the Exchange and the Opium revenue must chiefly account for the nominal character of the surplus in the present Budget, we cannot help thinking that it is also to no small extent due to the extreme caution and moderation with which the Budget is usually drawn. In proof of this we have only to turn to Sir David Barbour's own Statement.

For example, the Budget for 1889-90 showed a small surplus of Rx. 106,300. The Revised Estimate swelled it to Rx. 1,809,700, while the Final Accounts raised it further to Rx. 2,612,200. This great and, indeed, remarkable disparity between the actual and the budgeted accounts is explained by the Finance Minister to be due to accidental causes, but this explanation will scarcely be regarded as adequate by the general public. Nor is this the case in one year. The same disparity is observable in the accounts of the year 1890-91 although we admit it is a disparity which arising as it did chiefly from great fluctuations in Exchange could not possibly be anticipated. But excluding this element of uncertainty from consideration there were improvements also in the Revenue which might more confidently be expected.

The most prominent as well as gratifying fact, however, about the Statement is the steady development of those heads of the Revenue which betoken the general security of the financial position. The reassuring character of this is particularly brought out in the present Financial Statement, which is able to show a surplus notwithstanding the steady loss from Opium and Exchange. In Opium the decline continues from year to year till the revenue, which stood in 1880-81 at above Rx. 10,480,000, has dwindled to Rx. 7,593,400 in 1891-92. Sir David Barbour, however, is in hopes that for the present the lowest ebb has been reached, so that the only remaining element of difficulty which has to be provided against is the Exchange.

This subject the Finance Member has discussed at some length and with great force and clearness. Sir David Barbour keenly feels the necessity of finally arriving at a permanent solution of the problem, and is even prepared for some drastic remedy even at some immediate sacrifices in preference to the present painful position of uncertainty. The subject is of such a technical and at the same time important character that we feel no hesitation in quoting him:—

"The question of the future of silver possesses not merely a speculative, but an eminently practical, interest for India. I have long held the opinion that, however distasteful to the majority of men currency discussions may be, and however unwilling we may be to undertake reforms which affect the standard of value, the perpetually recurring evils flowing from a difference of monetary standard between India and the other countries with which her financial and commercial transactions are so important, cannot, and should not, be endured for ever, and that sooner or later a final solution of the problem must be found, and I am unable to discover any permanent remedy for the evils which, day by day and year by year, press themselves upon our attention in India, except either the general adoption of the system of double legal tender or the extension of the single gold standard.

Authorities whom we all respect have said that the system of double legal tender is a practical impossibility, and, if I may venture to say so, I agree that the double legal standard is a practical impossibility so long as a majority of those affected are opposed to its adoption; but, however, the principle were accepted generally, the difficulties which now seem so real and practical would, I believe, prove to be purely imaginary.

The recent action of the United States has, no doubt, to some extent, raised the price of silver and caused a rise in the rate of Exchange, but what India requires is not a high rate of Exchange rather than a low rate, but some system under which fluctuations in Exchange shall be neither great nor frequent, and shall oscillate round a fixed point. In this respect we have, so far, lost rather than gained.

It is held by some that a low rate of Exchange, or at any rate a falling rate, stimulates exports from India and is beneficial to the country, and, for proof of the correctness of their opinions, they point to the course of trade as it ebbs and flows daily before our eyes. With all deference to my friends who hold this opinion, I believe that it is one of the greatest delusions that ever gained possession of the human mind. Things are not always as they seem to be, and though we can all see the sun rise in the East and set in the West, we do not in the present day believe that the sun revolves round the earth once in every period of twenty-four hours. Trade between different countries is essentially a barter of goods for goods, and its extent and nature are determined, in the long run, not by the standard of value in use in either country, but by the comparative cost of production of commodities in these countries. Nor can I discover any good ground for the belief that the Native of India must be able to get more piece-goods for his wheat, because his rupee will purchase a smaller quantity of gold, or, what is the same thing, because the British sovereign will purchase a larger quantity of silver. That trade between different countries ebbs and flows in accordance with the fluctuations in Exchange is a fact which falls within our daily experience, and is wholly in accordance with theory, but I have yet to learn that the total quantity of water discharged into the sea by a river is dependent on the tides at its mouth, and that the greater the strength of the tides the larger the total average volume of discharge. The current may run into greater velocity when the tide is falling, but the additional volume of water poured into the sea is only the same as the volume which was forced back when the tide flowed the other way. The truth is that the apparent stimulus to, or apparent check on, exports which accompanies a fall, or rise, in Exchange is followed in each case by a reaction of precisely equivalent magnitude, or is itself the reaction which naturally follows a previous check or stimulus. It will probably be a surprise to most persons to learn that the total fluctuations downwards of Exchange since 1873 very slightly exceed the total fluctuations upwards, the difference being, I believe, not more than 3 per cent. While repudiating the theory that trade between England and India is benefited by the absence of a common monetary standard I do not deny that there is such a thing as a good standard of value and a bad standard of value, or hold that the question as to what is the best standard is of no practical importance. What I contend for is that the theory of a beneficial stimulus to trade owing to fluctuations in Exchange between countries having different standards of value, is an untenable and mischievous delusion. A sudden rise in Exchange, such as we had this year, will unquestionably check business for a time, and cause a depression of longer or shorter duration. But trade in time must adjust itself to the new scale of prices and will then proceed as before. The existence of the Indian Tea Gardens depends not on the relative value of gold and silver, but on the fact that the people of England want tea and are willing to give iron, coal, or piece-goods in exchange for it. An alteration in the relative value of gold and silver neither weakens their desire for tea nor reduces the amount of goods which they are willing to give in exchange for it, and cannot, therefore, in the long run, either stimulate or check the production of that article in India.

The task which the United States has undertaken of raising the price of silver by purchasing yearly a fixed though large quantity of that metal, is one which, if undertaken by any other nation, would, I feel convinced, result in disaster, but so great is the wealth of that country and so rapid its growth, that it would not be safe to say that its efforts must fail. We cannot blame the United States for adopting the course which seems best for its own interests, but I venture to think that it would have been better to at once adopt free coinage of silver. No doubt the people of the United States are warned in some quarters that the adoption of free coinage of silver will lead to the loss of their gold and end in financial ruin, but the same authorities not unfrequently warn India that her prosperity depends on her retaining the silver standard, and I know no reason why such different results in the case of the two countries should spring from the same cause. India uses the silver standard, but, though gold does not commonly circulate as money, she possesses an enormous quantity of that metal, and our experience shows that the silver standard gives rise to no difficulties in the interior of the country, and that the evils from which we suffer spring from the fact that we have large commercial and financial transactions with countries that have a different standard. The Foreign trade of the United States is but a small fraction of its total trade, and there is no civilized nation in the world which is more independent of the foreigner."

SIR ANDREW SCOBLE'S LAST.

Sir Andrew Scoble made his last appearance as chairman at the first Anniversary of the Students' Club and Library on the 17th instant, at the General Assembly's Institution. We have at another place mentioned the unhappy scene which occurred. With that single exception the meeting passed off without a hitch. And the whole proceedings were closed with a speech of rare felicity from Mr. Mehta, in which he took the opportunity of the every day vote of thanks to the chair to pay a handsome tribute to Sir Andrew Scoble for his services as a member of Government. He said:—

I now rise to invite you to join me in a matter, in which I am sure, looking at the enthusiastic manner in which you have received your Chairman this evening, I have already enlisted your warm sympathies. On your behalf, as well as on my own, I rise therefore to propose a vote of thanks to our worthy chairman, Sir Andrew Scoble, for having taken the trouble to come and preside at our meeting (cheers). Probably this is the last public function in this great metropolis, in which he will take a part, and therefore a sort of pathetic interest attaches to this vote. This is not the time nor the place to enter into discussion of the services, which you, Sir, have rendered to this country during the period you held the high office of Legal member to the Government of India. Great and illustrious men have held that office before you and you wore the mantle that fell from Lord Macaulay, Sir Barnes Peacock, and Sir Henry Sumner Maine and, Sir, you are no less worthy to fill a position rendered illustrious by the performances of these good and great men (applause).

I will not undertake to pronounce the verdict of history upon your career but this I will say that when the excitement of the present hour has past away and when a more correct appreciation of the situation has been obtained not only the present generation but also posterity will render to you that justice to which you are entitled by your participation in a great work of national advancement (Loud cheers).

We now wish you bon voyage and very many pleasant years of peace and tranquility at home, which you have so eminently earned for yourself by a lifelong devotion to the interests of this country (cheers) and we hope that in the midst of your retirement India will find a place in your heart. (Loud Applause.)

In the present temper of the Native Town, and specially after the disturbance so rudely crushed, by himself or at his initiative, it was a hazardous thing, for him, above all, to move thanks to the ogre at all. A little faltering, a single unlucky word might have spoiled everything, turned the contemplated triumph into a rout. But the speaker had confidence in himself and his cause and he carried the audience with him to the happy end. Sir Andrew is always Luck's favorite. May he maintain his good fortune with God's blessing to the last!

Public Paper.

From---The Secretaries to the Calcutta Committee in Support of the Age of Consent Bill.

To---The Secretary to the Government of India, Legislative Department.

SIR,---We have the honor to address you in continuation of our letter of yesterday forwarding the Memorial of eight thousand native Indian subjects of Her Majesty in Support of the Age of Consent Bill.

As the memorialists, residing as they do at many places and various quarters of the same city, have signed different copies of the Memorial, we have detached the signatures and sent them together.

To facilitate reference and judgment, we append a compiled list of the leading signatories.

We have gone through the papers and beg to state some of the results. Most of the leading families of Patna and many leading men of Patna, Bhagalpore and other places in Behar have signed. Maharaja Hurbulluv Narayan Singh of Sonbursa, who has signed, early took the lead on the subject. Cuttack is well represented. All the half a dozen Professors of the Ravenshaw College have signed. East Bengal has done herself supreme honor by her attitude in favour of civilization. Nawab Ashanullah of Dacca supported the Bill from his place in Council. Fourteen members of the Nawab family of the capital of East Bengal and fourteen Zemindars of the District and representatives of other great Mahomedan families of Dacca have signed our Memorial. Such leaders of Hindu society as the Brahman Raja Rajendra Narain Roy, of Bhowal, Dewan Kali Prosunno Ghose--the sage of the East--Babu Ananda Chunder Roy and all the prominent men at the bar and in the medical profession, the representatives of the well-known Nags and Dassas, most of the Ghoses, Guhos, Thakoortas, and others of the best blue blood of the Kayasthas have heartily joined in the movement.

Nearer home, in and about the metropolis, Kalighat took up the matter in earnest, and we have got the signatures of the best men living at that suburban shrine--of Brahmans intimately connected with the goddess there.

As the Petition of the Ladies of Mymensing we had the honor of forwarding yesterday is in Bengali, for the convenience of your office we beg to send a translation.

We enclose 419 signatures to the Memorial received since our letter to you of yesterday.

Descriptive List of the Principal Signatories to the Memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy of the Calcutta Committee in Support of the Age of Consent Bill signed by Eight Thousand subjects of Her Majesty.

THE AGE OF CONSENT BILL IN THE VICEROY'S COUNCIL.

19th March 1891.

The Hon'ble Sir Andrew Scoble moved that the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to amend the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, be taken into consideration. He said :—

I very much regret to say that I have received a letter from my hon'ble friend Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter in which he says that the state of his health is such that he will be unable to attend the meeting of the Council to-day. Had his indisposition been of a merely temporary character, I should have been prepared, with your Excellency's permission, to have moved that the discussion of the question involved in this Bill should be postponed for a few days; but as I understand that there is no likelihood of my hon'ble friend being able to take part in the further consideration of the measure, I can only reiterate the expression of my regret that the Council will not have his assistance in dealing with the important question which forms its subject.

The discussion which has taken place with regard to this Bill during the last ten weeks has had many good effects. It has shown, among other things, that outside Bengal there is very little real opposition to the measure, that in Bengal itself the extent and importance of the opposition have been by no means so great as has been represented, and that as regards the objections raised to the Bill, its supporters have everywhere had very much the best of the argument. It has elicited from all parts of India expressions of abhorrence of the practice which the Bill is designed to prohibit, and it has established that the practice, though undoubtedly prevalent in certain districts, is not found to exist elsewhere except in isolated cases. And if I may judge from the minute of dissent which my hon'ble friend Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter has appended to the Report of the Select Committee, it has satisfied him that the bulk of the arguments with which he assailed the Bill on the occasion of its introduction into this Council, are not tenable, and must be abandoned. As, however, the key-note which my hon'ble friend struck on the former occasion has been followed by most of the speakers and writers who have attacked the Bill, and it is desirable that an answer should be given to arguments which have been enforced by the authority attaching to his name, I fear I must occupy the Council for some time in going over the old ground, and showing how slight is the foundation, either in fact or reason, upon which the objections to the Bill are based, and what little justification there is for the outcry which has been raised against it.

It will doubtless be remembered that in introducing the Bill I spoke of it as a measure of protection, which it was the clear right and duty of the Government to adopt if the necessity for State interference was established. I did not perhaps dwell on this part of the case as fully as I might have done, for it seemed to me a self-evident proposition that little girls under the age of twelve are unfit for sexual intercourse, and ought not to be subjected to it. I considered it sufficient to rely on the report of Sir Stuart Bayley that in Bengal 'it is a general practice for Hindoo girls, after they are married, but before puberty is even indicated, much less established, to be subjected to more or less frequent acts of connection with their husbands; and upon the question of their fitness for such intercourse, I quoted the professional opinion of Dr. McLeod that, 'making all due allowance for climate and racial differences, and bearing social customs in mind, it would seem reasonable and right that the age of protection in this country should be raised from ten to twelve years.' Having thus established a prima facie case for the proposed legislation, I reserved further proof until my statement should be challenged, and though the challenge has been indirect rather than direct, it must be met. It is said that 'the plea of humanity does not avail'; that the case of Hari Maiti was an isolated case, and that 'the patent fact that many girls in this country become mothers before or immediately after twelve plainly shows that there is necessarily no inhumanity in the act itself.' My hon'ble friend Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, while assuming for the purposes of his argument that 'the rule of premature intercourse with girl-wives exists to a culpable extent in Bengal,' states that this assumption, so far as his knowledge of Hindoo society in Bengal goes, is not fairly tenable. I can understand my hon'ble friend's reluctance to admit the existence of a state of things so degrading to his countrymen, and I should have been glad had I been able to accept his testimony on the point. But what are the facts as stated in official documents which have been laid before the Council? Mr. Lyall, Commissioner of Chittagong, reports: 'The practice of consummating marriage with immature girls is universal in this division, as it is all over East Bengal. It is less common among Mahomedans, but is universal among all castes and classes of Hindoos. Every one consulted admits this whether in favour of reform or against it.' Baboo Nobin Chunder Sen, a Deputy Magistrate in the Chittagong division, writes: 'Being a native of this division,

I may assure you that the practice of consummating marriage with immature girls is universal in this division. It is not confined to any particular section or caste.' Mr. Allen, Magistrate of Noakhali, reports: 'The practice among Hindoos of this district of consummating marriages with immature wives is, I fear, widespread.' Mr. Dutt, Collector of Burdwan, states that 'the practice of consummating marriage with immature girls prevails generally and widely in this district. From my own knowledge I can also assert that the practice prevails widely and generally in Calcutta and in other parts of Bengal.' Mr. Lewis, the Commissioner of the Rajshahye Division, says: 'I have consulted the district officers and others and find a consensus of opinion as to the existence of the practice of consummation of marriage with immature girls throughout the division, except perhaps in the Jalpaiguri district, where the Meches and other aboriginal tribes do not favour child-marriage, and where, amongst the Mahomedans and Rajbungshis, females, being useful in field work, are not generally married until they are more advanced in age.' Mr. Gupta, the Collector of Mymensing, says: 'The practice of consummating marriage before girls attain puberty exists to a certain extent in this district, as more or less in all parts of Bengal; but generally it is more prevalent among the lower than among the higher castes of Hindoos.' Mr. Quinn, the Commissioner of Bhagulpore, reports as the result of his enquiries that 'among the lower classes of Hindus, and also of Mahomedans, though perhaps to a less extent, there is no doubt that the consummation of marriage with immature girls is of frequent occurrence. Girls are sent to their husbands' houses at a very early age, and often long before menstruation has begun, and when there no restriction is placed on the husband the natural consequence being that sexual intercourse must frequently take place while the wife is quite immature.'

There is no gainsaying this evidence. It establishes the existence in Bengal of a horrible practice, condemned alike by the Hindoo religion and by the commonest feelings of humanity, and with which the present law is powerless to cope in any adequate way. The records of the Criminal Courts are full of cases in which child-wives, between the ages of ten and twelve, have been done to death in the exercise of marital rights by their husbands. There must be no misapprehension on this point. It has been stated that the case of Hari Maiti is an isolated case, and my hon'ble friend asserts that 'after the most searching enquiry not a single case resulting in conviction of a husband for rape during the last thirty years has been found out.' My hon'ble friend is particular in his choice of words, for prosecutions have not always been followed by convictions, and rape has not always been the charge. But I will give him some recent instances of the class of cases which to my mind justify the proposed alteration in the law. In the Sessions Court at Rungpore in March, 1890, Dhula Naga was tried for rape of his wife; the defence was that the girl was not under ten years of age: the Judge gave effect to this defence, though he said 'the case is a painful one, the girl, or more correctly speaking child, asserting that the accused, who is a full grown man, forcibly had sexual intercourse with her, stifling her cries by putting a cloth in her mouth,' and the man was sentenced to three months' rigorous imprisonment. At Hooghly, in December, 1889, Jamiruddin was charged with having caused the death of his wife Parijan, and the Magistrate, Mr. Mullick dismissed the case on the ground that 'as Parijan was between eleven and twelve years of age, the accused committed no offence by having sexual intercourse with her and is not answerable for the consequences which unfortunately followed it. At Maldah, in May, 1889, Panchu Monim was tried in the Court of the Sessions Judge for culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The medical evidence indicated that the girl died from strangulation accompanying forcible sexual intercourse. The husband was twenty-one years of age, the wife about eleven. One assessor, a pleader, held that 'the deceased died accidentally, through her husband's trying to have forcible intercourse with her.' 'I don't think he is guilty' he added, 'because his violence was too trifling, considering his right as a husband, and it was accidental.' The other assessor merely suggested that 'some one else (than the husband) may have done it.' The man was sentenced to two months' rigorous imprisonment, which was afterwards enhanced to two years by the High Court.

I might multiply cases of this kind, which show not only that Hari Maiti's case is not exceptional, but that the present law, though not absolutely a dead letter, does not go far enough to efficiently protect this helpless class of children. No one can say that a few months' imprisonment is a sufficient penalty for crimes of this description, or that the marital relation ought to be allowed to be pleaded in extenuation or justification of such outrages on humanity.

There is, moreover, much reason to fear that comparatively few cases of this class find their way into the Criminal Courts, and not many, perhaps, into the hospitals. But I would invite the attention of the Council to the terrible list sent up by Mrs. Mansell and other lady doctors, of cases which had come under their personal observation of little girls, aged from nine to twelve, who had died, become paralysed or crippled, or been otherwise severely injured, as the result of premature cohabitation.

Against such positive testimony I attach little importance to the negative statement of a number of native doctors practising in Calcutta that not a single case of bodily injury to a married girl has come to their knowledge in the course of their practice.

And what of those cases in which neither death nor grievous hurt, nor other physical injury cognizable under the Penal Code, is caused? What of the cases in which motherhood is attained and which are relied on by the opponents of the Bill in justification of their demand that things shall be allowed to remain as they are? In a paper read by Dr. Bolye Chunder Sen before the Calcutta Medical Society, it is stated on the authority of Dr. Doyal Chunder Shome, Teacher of Midwifery at the Campbell Medical School, that of 21 cases of labour of girls between the ages of eleven and thirteen—ten of which were under his immediate care, while he had the general supervision of the other eleven—natural delivery took place in five cases, tedious delivery in five cases, instrumental interference in five cases, and still-born children were born in six cases. 'Most of the child-mothers,' he adds, 'kept tolerably good health after their first confinement; two of them only suffered from fever, and continued weak and anæmic; but many of the others fell victims to various diseases after the second or third confinement. I saw five of them dying of pernicious anæmia after prolonged suffering from fever and diarrhæa, and two died of phthisis. . . . The children born alive did not look small or undeveloped when born, but their subsequent growth was not satisfactory; one died of infantile tetanus, two of marasmus within two months of birth, two of diarrhæa within five months, and three during dentition of fever and convulsions; the remaining seven grew up to be weak and delicate children.'

Upon these facts I think I am justified in asserting that the necessity for further protective legislation is established. I cannot pray in aid what would be the most convincing testimony on the question, but I would emphatically endorse the opinion of Raja Doorga Churn Law, lately a valued member of this Council, who says:—'If child-wives could be examined as to the result of their first early meetings, there can be no question their evidence would be conclusive enough to justify the Government in stepping in and carrying out this reform.' What the women of India think on the subject may be gathered from the petitions addressed to your Excellency by native ladies of Amedabad, Calcutta, Bombay, Lahore, Poona, Mymensing, and other places, which have been laid before the Council, and in which they say 'our sex is solely dependent on the Government for the protection of our personal rights, the necessity for which has been made more urgent by the opposition with which the Bill has met.' These ladies are for the most part members of orthodox Hindoo families, and the sincerity and force of their appeal can no more be questioned than it can be disregarded.

I pass on now to consider an argument of some importance originally urged by my hon'ble friend, but which he does not now seem disposed to insist on. He disapproved of the Bill as being a departure from the non-interference policy hitherto observed by the Government, and guaranteed by the great Proclamation of 1858 which says:—"We do strictly charge and enjoin all those who may be in authority under Us that they abstain from all interference with the religious belief or worship of any of Our subjects on pain of Our highest displeasure." Now, this is too serious an indictment to be left unnoticed, even if my hon'ble friend has, upon maturer consideration, thought fit to abandon it. There is absolutely no justification for the contention of my hon'ble friend; and it is intolerable that her Majesty's gracious words should be perverted, as they have been on many platforms and in many newspapers, in order to support a charge of breach of duty by the Government of India. If my hon'ble friend had had the candour to read all those parts of the Proclamation which bear upon his argument, he would have found that while her Majesty declared it to be her 'royal will and pleasure that none be in anywise favoured, none molested or disqualified by reason of their religious faith or observance, but that all shall alike enjoy the equal and impartial protection of the law,' She was content to direct 'that generally in framing and administering the law, due regard be paid to the ancient rights, usages and customs of India.' There is here no such undertaking of absolute non-interference as my hon'ble friend suggests; and if there were any room for doubt on the subject, Parliament has given a fatal blow to the construction which he would adopt, by enacting, in section 19 of the Indian Councils Act, that, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General, measures affecting 'the religion or religious rites and usages of any class of her Majesty's subjects in India' may be introduced, not only into this Council, but into the Provincial Councils wherever they may be established.

But it may be asked, what is a 'due regard' to ancient religious rites and usages? My Lord, this question was answered sixty years ago, in relation to the practice of sati. There was then no Queen's proclamation it is true, but the Queen's proclamation merely reiterated and reaffirmed the principle which in this respect had been recognized and established by the Government of India long before its transfer to the Crown. The prohibition of sati was denounced on almost the identical grounds on which this Bill has been attacked. After the Regulation had been passed an appeal was presented to the King in Council against it. It was said to be 'an interference with the most ancient and sacred rites and usages of the Hindoos, and in direct violation of the conscientious belief of an entire nation'; it was urged, 'that the abuses (if any) which may have arisen or occurred in the practice of sati can be effectually prevented by a proper attention to the opinions of the Hindoos, and an equitable administration of the existing laws, without requiring a total interdiction of the practice'; and it was alleged that the Regulation 'is an unjust, impolitic and direct infringement of the sacred pledge to keep inviolate the religion, laws and usages of the Hindoos, manifested throughout the whole general tenour of the Acts of the Legislature of Great Britain, and the regulations and conduct of the Government of the East India Company.' The answer of the Court of Directors to these charges is the answer which I now make to my hon'ble friend's indictment, and it is this, that 'the power of making laws is vested in the Governor-General in Council, which power is recognized and confirmed by the British Legislature; that in exercising this power the Government of India has at all times manifested a just attention to the religious opinions and customs of the natives, so far as is compatible with the paramount claims of humanity and justice; and that a discriminating regard for those religious opinions is not incompatible with the suppression of practices repugnant to the first principles of civil society, and to the dictates of natural reason.' Upon these general grounds, and because the particular practice was a cruel one, and was prohibited not as a religious act, but as a flagrant offence against society, because it was questionable whether the rite was sanctioned by the religious institutes of the Hindoos, and because it was regarded as absolutely sinful by many of the most learned Hindoos, reasons which apply with remarkable relevance to the measure now under consideration, the Privy Council, to which the matter was referred, upheld the action of the Government and dismissed the petition.

So far, therefore, as the sanction of religion or religious usage is claimed for the practice which this Bill seeks to prohibit, it seems to me that the argument may be disregarded if the Council is of opinion that the practice is one which on grounds of humanity and morality ought to be prohibited. I am disposed to agree with my hon'ble friend that no legislative body (whether constituted as at present or in any other way) can satisfactorily deal with the question of the Shastras in the way of giving an authoritative opinion on them. But no member of this Council who has waded, as I have done, through the mass of dissertations on the subject which this controversy has called forth, can have failed to come to the conclusion that the construction put upon the Shastras by the Bengal Pundits has not been accepted in other parts of India, and that the balance of argument and authority is in favour of the supporters of the Bill. Even if it were not so, were I a Hindoo, I would prefer to be wrong with Professor Bhandarkar, Mr. Justice Telang and Dewan Bahadur Raghunath Rao than to be right with Pundit Sasadhur Turkachuramani and Mr. Tilak; and I should agree with His Highness the Maharajah of Jeypore in thinking that, had the ancient sages whose authority is invoked by the so-called orthodox party lived now, 'they would have taken upon themselves the responsibility' (as His Highness himself has done) 'of legislating with the view of protecting society from the pernicious consequences of early marriage and of the consummation of marriage before the child-wife has scarcely any idea of what marriage means.' It seems to me, moreover, unwarrantable to claim for Bengal an orthodoxy, and for its Shastris an authority, superior to that of the rest of India. It can hardly be contended that a doctrine which is non-essential elsewhere becomes essential because it is held in Bengal. No Legislature can undertake to discriminate between these variations of creed; but it derives support, in interfering with practices inconsistent with the public good, from the fact that those practices, so far as they are sought to be justified on religious grounds, rest on the authority of a comparatively modern scholiast, and are not countenanced by the teachings of the early law-givers who are the generally accepted expositors of Hindoo theology.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE BEGGAR OF THE PONT NEUF.

FROM THE GERMAN OF THE FREIHERR VON GAUDY.

CROUCHING the brazen pedestal beside
Where Henri Quatre's equestrian figure towers,
Soon as the blush of morn the east has dyed
Till sunset heralds the dim twilight hours,
A woman sits ; from her once beaming eye
The light is faded, and her pale cheek's hue
Is corpse-like ; a thin house-dog cowers nigh,
While thus her feeble voice for alms doth sue :
" I'm living still ! Deny not from your store
An alms to me, the poorest of the poor !

" My father on the hangman's cart I saw :
Still the mob's cruel jests I seem to hear :
I see bloodthirsty poissardes shouting draw
Their fettered victim to his fatal bier.
He slips—a gory stream is flowing there.
Hark ! Vive le Roi ! his latest accents say
The sharp axe falls ; like thunder rend the air
A thousand cries of ' Vive la Liberté !'
I'm living still ! Deny not from your store
An alms to me, the poorest of the poor !

" My mother died in the Salpêtrière,
I'm living still ! My gallant brother fled
Glory and death in La Vendée to share,
And on our father's hearth his life-blood shed
Me too—a proud count's child—they wedded me
To a vile base-born wretch, as lawful prey,
A brutal tyrant's helpless slave to be.
In ten sad years my beauty passed away
I'm living still ! Deny not from your store
An alms to me, the poorest of the poor !

" And I became the mother of a son,
'T was my delight his joyous face to view
Till with disgust I strove his kiss to shun,
As he each day more like his father grew
I cursed him ; from the bridge he sprang to die,
Here, from this spot, in the dark stream below,
Yet his last look of tearless agony—
God ! can I e'er forget that look ? Oh no !
I'm living still ! Deny not from your store
An alms to me, the poorest of the poor !

" Dimmed with incessant weeping are my eyes :
No home, no friends, no resting-place I know
Where I can sleep ; cold stone my couch supplies ;
E'en in my dreams I hear the waters flow.
I'm living still ! When sounds the midnight bell,
Then rise the foaming waves in swelling flood ;

With dripping hair my son—I see him well—
Exclaims, ' What mother curses her own blood ?'
I'm living still ! Deny not from your store
An alms to me, the poorest of the poor !

" Child without parents, sister without brother,
Wife without husband— I am living still !
Alone, unloved, unknown, a childless mother,
Poor, old, and blind—what more my cup to fill ?
Here is my faithful dog, my only friend ;
And he, ere long, starved at my feet will lie.
Oh that, life's lamp extinct, my woes would end !
When may I hope to be at peace and die ?
I'm living still ! Deny not from your store
An alms to me, the poorest of the poor !"

THE ROMAN SOLDIER.

WRITTEN AFTER HEARING A GENTLEMAN DESCRIBE THE APPEARANCE OF A SOLDIER FOUND AMONG THE RUINS AT HFRCLANEUM.

His spear was in his trusty hand,
His shield upon his side,
The heavy helmet's cumb'ring band
Curled his brow of pride.

Intent he walked his narrow round
With steady, measured tread,
When, hark ! a strange unearthly sound
Upon the wind is sped.

The earth seems trembling with dismay,
And reels and shakes with fear,
While nature's struggles seem to say
That nature's God is there.

And mingling with those sounds there comes
A strong and bitter cry,
Of thousands leaving pleasant homes,
And many left to die !

Still, rushing from a certain death,
Hundreds are hurrying past ;
Still hotter than the simoon's breath,
Comes the avenging blast.

And does the soldier stay behind,
While all are flying on ?
A moment !—Death is on the wind,
O, surely he is gone !—

* Calmly he turns to meet his death
When duty bids him stay,
And calmly yields his latest breath
Where duty points the way.

THE HEN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF CLAUDIUS.

A FAMOUS hen's my story's theme,
Who ne'er was known to tire
Of laying eggs—but then the scream
So loud o'er every egg—'t would seem
The house must be on fire.
A turkey cock, who ruled the walk,
A wiser bird and older,
Could bear 't no more ; so off did stalk
Right to the hen, and told her :
"Madam, that scream, I apprehend,
Does nothing to the matter ;
It surely helps the egg no whit ;
Then lay your egg, and done with it ;
I pray you, madam, as a friend,
Cease that superfluous clatter !
You know not how 't goes through my head :
"Hump ! very likely !" madam said.
Then, proudly putting forth a leg—
"Uneducated barn-yard fowl !
You know no more than any owl
The noble privilege and praise
Of authorship in modern days—
I'll tell you why I do it ;
First, you perceive, I lay my egg,
And then—review it."

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Lieutenant-Governor left for Jalpaiguri on the 30th March, and after visiting Purneah, Nya Dumka, and Suri, comes back to Calcutta on the 13th April next.

MR. C. F. Worsley has obtained furlough for eight months. Mr. G. Toynbee acts for him as Commissioner of Orissa and Superintendent of the Tributary Mehals, Cuttack; Mr. J. C. Veasey, Inspector-General, Police, officiates as Commissioner of the Burdwan Division; while Mr. E. R. Henry, Magistrate and Collector, acts as Inspector-General of Police.

It is said that Mr. Cotton takes furlough and that Mr. Risley acts for him as the Financial Secretary to the Government of Bengal. Mr. Reily, in charge of the Legislative Department, has obtained leave for twelve months. No successor is Gazetted yet.

DURING the absence of the Government of India from Calcutta, the Assistant Surveyor-General in charge of the Mathematical Instrument Department will have charge of that portion of the Revenue and Agricultural Department which is left at Calcutta.

DURING the absence of the Governor-General in Council from Calcutta, the Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal in the Judicial, Political and Appointment Departments will have charge of that portion of the Foreign Department which is left in Calcutta.

THE Superintendent of the Tributary Mehals of Orissa for the time being has been Gazetted to exercise the powers of a Political Agent under Chapters IV and V of the Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition Act XXI of 1879 for the states of Mourbhanj, Keonjhar, Dhenkanal, Nayagarh, Hindole, Talchere, Ranpur, Narsingpur, Nilgiri, Khondpara, Boud, Baramba, Athinullik, Daspalla, Pal Lehara, Athgarh, and Tigiria.

THE Spectator tells a rich anecdote. A Bishop who still adorns the episcopal bench once stayed at the house of a country gentleman who was a teetotaler. On the dinner table there were no intoxicants, but the host said to his guest in an undertone, My lord you will find some wine in your bedroom. By and by the squire came to dine with the Bishop, and found wine set before him, but the Bishop also took care to say quietly during dinner, Mr. So and So you will find some water in your bedroom.

MR. Jay Gould has a daily income of £1,500. Poor fellow! at the utmost he can be worth no more than £5,50,000 a year. How he must bow his diminished head in the presence of luckier dogs—far more bloated plutocrats! We can complacently call on our readers to pity the sorrows of a poor brother who has no more than seventy lacs of rupees a year.

THE Marquis of Dufferin and Ava's second son, Lord Terence Blackwood, has obtained high honors in the last examination for the Diplomatic Service.

THE Moorish Government has agreed to pay £50,000 damages for the massacre at the British Factory at Cape Juby in 1889.

ACCORDING to Professor Hunt, the animal that lays the greatest number of eggs at a time, is the white ant of tropical countries, which produces 86,400 a day during the season.

THE place for the next National Congress is Lal Bag, at Nagpore, in the Central Provinces. Mr. Hume had been there on his way home. At a meeting of 100 persons, he explained, in half an hour, the arrangements for the next annual gathering of delegates from different parts of India.

"A MERCHANT'S CLERK," in the Indian Daily News, appeals to the European merchants in behalf of Baboos worn out in their service. It appears that the good Commissioner of Rajshaye, Mr. Lewis, the founder of the Native Sanitarium at Darjeeling, is in no mood to rest on the success of his great achievement. He is now endeavouring to bring the benefits of the institution to the poorer clerks. He has remarked that it is impossible for one drawing a pay of Rs. 50 or Rs. 60 a month to go to an establishment, where the lowest monthly charge is Rs. 30. Accordingly, he pleads for free or partially free accommodation for this class. In our contemporary's correspondent's letter, the merchants are called to

"subscribe not less than Rs. 3,000, which will give them the privilege of nominating an occupant of a free bed for 3 months, every year, and thus afford the opportunity to those poor clerks who are sufferers, to obtain a fresh lease of life."

We do not quite understand the proposal, and do not know whether it is the correspondent's plan or Mr. Lewis's. We hope a more authoritative scheme will be forthcoming.

It is pleasant to read "A Merchant's Clerk's" testimony in favour of the disposition of the European merchants towards their men. In proof, he cites two instances:—

"Messrs. Kilburn and Company, have, for several years past, engaged the services of a Native Doctor, an M. B., to treat those of their servants who fall ill, and medicines are supplied at the expense of the firm. Mr. Mackay, of Messrs. Mackinnon, Mackenzie and Company, gives annual increases for the last two or three years to each and all of his employes, and he contemplates this year (owing to the death of one of their servants, who left his wife and children unprovided) giving his clerks a life-policy for Rs. 1,500, the premium to be paid by the firm."

AN Edinburgh correspondent writes to the Daily Graphic:—

"A curious competition took place among some lady artists a short time ago which certainly has not a little claim to novelty—a competition to demonstrate which of the artists could imagine and depict the ugliest man! No models were permitted, and the rules set forth that, 'while the artist might give her imagination full scope in delineating the features of her subject, the number of such features must be correct, and their relative position not out of accordance with the method of nature as it is maintained even in her most eccentric mood.' Thus, the eye of a Polyphemus would be disallowed, not only on account of its being single, but also because it was unnatural. It was further enjoined by the rule that all the works sent in were to be executed in the strictest privacy, and that no accessories might appear in the picture, but those which seemed probable and natural. The exhibition of the works to take place in the commodious studio of a certain young lady who was named. On my arrival there at the appointed time, my curiosity was much aroused concerning the competitive pictures, which, covered up from scrutiny like rare exotics from east wind, were suspended on the walls behind a curtain. All the guests being assembled, a lady who had taken a prominent part in getting up the exhibition made a short address. 'It seems to my companions and myself,' she said, 'that whereas much has been said regarding the principles of abstract beauty, very little has been said concerning the scarcely less important principles of abstract ugliness. We have been told that the line of beauty is a curve, but which of our celebrated art critics has as yet made the slightest attempt to tell us what is the main constituent of the line of ugliness? It is the contention of my friends and myself that ugliness is a positive and not a negative quality, and that the artistic eye should be trained to distinguish at a glance between an inoffensive absence of beauty and genuine ugliness.' The drawings were now simultaneously uncovered, and for an instant there was profound silence. Then a general murmur broke forth. This gradually increased in volume, until a ringing cheer, mingled with a few despairing hoots from a follower of Burne Jones, resounded through the room. The pictures, indeed, whether viewed at a distance or subjected to closer inspection, surpassed the wildest expectations of all present. Differing as they did both in size and conception—some hideous on the grand scale, others reaching the lowest depths of insignificance—this one, not so bad in feature, but rising to a Nero-like ferocity of expression; that one, lamblike, but from a physiognomist's point of view, expressive of the most hopeless inanity, the only difficulty was to which of these remarkable conceptions to award the palm. One particular only all the ideals depicted had in common—each man drawn, by an extraordinary coincidence, had his hair parted in the middle! The decision upon the pictures was the next thing. Those works which were picturesquely uncouth having been regretfully eliminated on the ground that nothing that is picturesque can be justly termed ugly in the true meaning of the word—'offensive to the sight'—two of the works were found to run each other very closely. The opinion of the majority having been taken, the award of merit was finally made."

We reproduce the above secondhand from our contemporaries who are giving it circulation without note or comment. For our part, we can not help a remark. Is it true? We rather doubt. Not but what there is no inherent improbability in the account. Indeed, the vraisemblance is perfect. Perhaps, it is a trifle overdone. It is too much of a good thing. It seems to us to be of a piece with the imaginative journalism in vogue in America. No names are given either of place or men, nor any sort of guarantee of reality. The whole is possibly a hit against some artistic ladies of the capital of North Britain. It is certainly a capital squib on the fashion of parting the hair in the middle. The satire is delicate and pleasant. It is unaccountable that ugly men should have a penchant for looking like beautiful women. But so it is. We make up by vanity for the absence of natural advantages.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has, for the year 1891-92, fixed the Public Works cess at one-half of an anna in the rupee on the annual value of lands, and on the net profits from mines, quarries, tramways, railways, and other immoveable property, (excepting, of course, such as may have been exempted under Section 2 of the Act, IX., B. C., of 1880) ascertained respectively as in the Act prescribed.

MAHAMAHOPADHYAYA Mahes Chunder Nyáyaratna, Principal, Sanskrit College, has obtained a year's extension of service.

THE Englishman of yesterday commences an editorial note thus:—

"Assam planters will regret to hear on the authority of a local paper, that 'solapa' toddy, the produce of the sago palm, is demoralising the Khonds to an alarming extent."

That is sufficiently mysterious. Which local paper can it be? Is there any newspaper press in Assam? We do not know of any English publication in that region. There may be a vernacular print. If Sylhet, which is naturally a part of Bengal unfortunately locked up in Assam by policy of state, is reckoned part of the Province, we lately heard of a Bengali paper there in connection with the complaint against our Lieutenant-Governor having advertised a particular Government notification in it to the exclusion of other papers. But our European contemporary who is so shy of recognising the existence of even native journals published in English—unless, perhaps they are also written in unexceptional Baboosese—is scarcely likely to appeal to the authority of a vernacular rag. Surely, the Editor of the Englishman, speaking of "a local paper" in connection with planters of Assam, cannot be taken to have used the word "local" with reference to his own locality. As a matter of fact, no Calcutta paper before the Englishman had noticed the dangers of the sago palm to Khonds or any others. But even granting the existence of some authoritative exponent of thought in Assam unknown to us to which the reference is made, why should the demoralisation of the Khonds, even their demoralisation to an alarming extent, be a matter for regret to Assam planters to speak of? The deterioration of a race is no doubt a lamentable thing, and all right-minded men, whether planters or not, whether living in Assam or elsewhere, will hear of it with regret. But why Assam planters in especial? The reason does not readily appear. For the writer proceeds:—

"The toddy in question is very potent and speedily produces the most complete intoxication. In the season the men rise, it is said, at dawn and repair at once to the palm trees, under which they stay until nightfall, alternately sleeping and drinking. So great is their infatuation with this form of debauch that they take the extremest precautions to ensure the safety of the palms, cutting down with their axes, or shooting with arrows anyone who attempts to meddle with them. It is even thought that if Government were to attempt to take the matter in hand by cutting down the trees, the Khonds would rise in armed insurrection."

So the mystification is maintained. It is not till some more sentences are passed that we are vouchsafed a glimpse of light. At last, however, we are incidentally told that the Khonds

"are able to withstand as perhaps no other race in India the effects of malaria; and it is this immunity from fever that makes them so valuable to the planter of Assam and the Mauritius. But the sago palm is more fatal to them than the deadliest miasma of their own hill jungles."

We wonder whether the writer is an Assam planter. Anglo-Indian journals are class journals and they do not know, and scarcely care, to disguise their class character.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Native Passenger Ships Commission, under the presidency of Surgeon-Major A. S. Lethbridge, M.D., C.I.E., have reported to Government. The Governor-General in Council, in return, has recorded his appreciation of the manner in which the work has been done. The enquiry involved much labour and trouble and it is, after all, satisfactory to find the Commission of one mind in their conclusions. The Government believe that the thorough investigation made by the members will have the effect of finally settling the questions that led to the appointment of the Commission. The report has been referred to the Governments of Madras, Bombay and Bengal and the Chief Commissioner of Burma, and to the Chambers of Commerce, Calcutta, Bombay and Madras for their opinions in respect of the amendments of the law and the rules under the law suggested by the Commission. On receipt of these opinions, it will be time for the Government of India to legislate.

WITH a regard for the pockets of the rate-payers far in advance of their own representatives, Sir Charles Elliott required a deliberate vote of the Municipal Commissioners, before he could sanction the increase of pay of their Chairman from Rs. 2,500 to Rs. 3,000. The conditions are laid down in the following letter "From the Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Municipal Department, to the Chairman of the Corporation of Calcutta,--(No. 372, dated the 3rd March 1891).

I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 644, dated the 16th February, 1891, forwarding, for the approval of Government under Section 43 of Act II (B.C.) of 1888, a Resolution passed by the Commissioners in Meeting instructing the General Committee to enter the salary of the Chairman in the Budget at Rs. 3,000 per mensem.

2. In reply, I am to say that, looking to the fact that the salary of the Chairman was fixed at Rs. 2,500 so short a time ago as April last, and that it was then understood that the Commissioners felt very strongly on the subject, the Lieutenant-Governor would have expected that some explanation of the present resolution would have been submitted, showing either that the conditions had changed, or that something had occurred to convince the Commissioners that their former attitude was no longer tenable.

3. If it is the deliberate wish of the majority, that is to say, of not less than 38 of the Commissioners to increase Mr. Lee's salary to Rs. 3,000 a month, the Lieutenant-Governor does not desire to oppose such a Resolution, but he must be satisfied that it is their wish, and that they have good reasons for it with which their constituents will be satisfied. He is not able to accord the approval of Government required by the Act to a Resolution which gives no reasons, and is supported by 13 only out of 75 Commissioners in a Meeting at which only 23 were present, and where it is understood that 7 abstained from voting and 3 opposed it."

Accordingly, 45 Commissioners met on Monday to reconsider the matter. There was the Budget too to consider and to fix the rates for the official year just commenced. But the first item occupied the whole time of the Commissioners. They were divided on the question. The Suburban party in particular were incensed against the Chairman for the manner in which the allotment in the Budget for Suburban improvements has been framed, and they decided the fate of that evening. They or the majority of them voted against the increase, and, led by Mr. Apcar, who had cut short his Easter holidays to join the fray, the meeting deferred the question till the next year's Budget, by 26 against 17.

It was a hard-fought field. Sir Henry Harrison with rare generosity sought to obtain for the successor of his choice the grant which he himself had nearly missed from the obstructiveness of a Lieutenant-Governor who had too much knowledge of the private life of his brethren in the Civil Service. He pleaded his cause with all the chivalry of his nature and the dialectic skill of a cultivated Roman Catholic. Dr. Macleod's practical Scotch mind wanted to found a Lord Mayor and he already revelled in visions of turtle soup and endless health-giving sparkling Hungarian besides orthodox champagne. All to no purpose. Even Surrender Not abandoned Sir Henry to join Mr. Apcar, in deference to the organised opposition. Still the discomfited clung desperately to the field. Every art, parliamentary and unparliamentary, was resorted to to shuffle the voting into a victory, but in vain. The difference was too substantial for any such manipulation.

The result is of course a gain to the rate-payers. It would have been more agreeable if it had been arrived at on public principle, without baser alloy. Indeed, we cannot help sympathising with the Chairman. Like a blunt Englishman he has trod too many corns before securing the main chance.

THE Budget came up on Thursday. It was partially gone through and has been again postponed to Tuesday next. It shews a deficit in some of the funds, and it was proposed to levy a Busti rate. The Busti owners are already smarting under the new law which realizes the rates from the owner of the land, and it was a very poor compliment to them to raise the question when they have not yet exhausted their resources for relief. There was opposition and the matter was dropped.

At that meeting,

Baboo Kalinath Mitter drew attention to the deficit in the water rate and sewerage rate funds which were serious matters. It was incumbent on them to see how to make both ends meet. There should be no contribution from the General Fund. His suggestion was to make the different rates self-supporting. There was clear provision in the law that they should levy a rate on the Bustee owners, and this rate should not have been eliminated from the Budget by the Committee. Before they passed the Budget, he thought a rate should be fixed by the meeting on the Bustee owners."

The Baboo evidently suggested the Busti rate to make up the deficit in the Water and Sewerage rates. Yet he would not mix up the rates together but keep them separate. The Commissioners are competent to impose a rate on owners of bustees, but only "to defray the cost of a special establishment for the cleansing of bustees." They are not entitled to more nor competent to divert the particular collection to other purposes.

It is now near over a hundred years that Burke bewailed the end of Chivalry among the most gallant exemplars of the sentiment in Europe—the French. According to the great publicist, the death of Chivalry was synchronous with the destruction of the old régime. With the rise of the Empire and specially the restoration of monarchy, Chivalry doubtless rose again—possibly to be driven out again with the old constitution. Thus, Chivalry has known many vicissitudes in France.

With the changes in the constitution of the state or the personnel of Government the conditions which sustain the sentiment flourished or decayed and with them the sentiment itself. With the downfall of the Second Empire, even the poor scarecrow of the rehabilitated nineteenth century Chivalry received its quietus. Honour soon became an obsolete term. Rationalism became the rage. Men became far too philosophical to care sufficiently for respectability. Neither age nor birth commanded deference. And now sex itself has ceased to be regarded, and the very obligations of hospitality are set at naught.

The treatment of the Empress Frederick at the capital of civilization naturally recalls the fervid exclamation of Burke.

Here was a lady of the highest rank—an Imperial Dowager—accomplished and good, who visited a gallant people on a mission of peace and high culture, to humour the sensitive community of the Beaux Arts into exhibiting at the Berlin Exhibition, and, if possible, bring about at least a social if not political reconciliation between the two greatest and most civilised nations of the Continent, insulted on the flimsiest, most irrational and puerile pretext, namely, that, among many other sights, she had been quietly visiting the old Palaces of St. Cloud and Versailles. And what was the objection to her at those places? Why, only this that the victorious Germans in 1870 demolished St. Cloud and crowned their valiant King as Emperor at Versailles. Why, one would suppose that that was the better reason for the Empress mother's taking a turn at those places! What reasonable man would expect such a visitor to omit seeing them? It was in the highest degree delicate in the Empress that she refrained from all fuss and just stealthily performed her necessary part of inspecting those sites. As guest of the nation, the French ought themselves to have taken the Empress round to the palaces, among the objects most interesting to her. What is the humiliation to them of her seeing them? If they could endure their defeat and their disasters, could they not bear the enemy visiting the scenes?

NOT many years Beluchistan was a terra incognita. But Sir Henry Green discerned its strategic importance in view of the sure advance of Russia to India. His constant appeals to British statesmanship to anticipate from Quetta the Russian advance necessarily familiarised the British public with the geography of the tract. Then came the Second British War in Afghanistan and the necessary seizure of Quetta and the construction of the railway to it. Before the irresistible British, the Ameer of Cabul fled to die a miserable death in exile. The British then retired within their borders, leaving a representative at Cabul. The history of the first British occupation of Afghanistan was soon enough repeated, and again troops had to be pushed up to avenge a sad outrage. The vengeance was complete, but there was no longer the same disposition to meddle with the Afghans. The British mind was driven to an opposite extreme. Under the revulsion of feeling produced by these calamities, the importance of Beluchistan was dimmed and the Khan was left in the lurch and the railway given up. This was but the reaction of a moment. Again a statesmanlike scheme of defence of the Empire recommended the resumption of the abandoned military railway and rehabilitation of the neglected Frontier. Once more Beloochistan—now oftener written Beluchistan—rose into importance. A great British cantonment and station has risen in the midst of a sandy and rocky waste. Civilization has been shot from India across the border far away into the heart of Central Asia. Verily, Quetta is an oasis in the desert of barbarism. There of all places in that region is a society of Europeans and English-speaking Indians. Of course, it is the only place between Sind on one side and Teheran and the Russian border on the other, stocked with the conveniences and comforts of European life. One thing alone had been wanting, and that has at length been supplied. We do not refer to the gallows. The British commenced with that. It is a condition sine qua non of civil order in that part of the world. They had publicans and sinners—to any extent, but no publicists. They had no newspaper and they have got it. The nearest approach to the thing they enjoyed was an advertising sheet. This has now been expanded into a regular weekly journal under the name of the Beluchistan Gazette. We wish Quetta joy of her new possession. We hope she will know how to keep it. Let her nurse it betimes to make the venture strong. It deserves good treatment. The Gazette is nothing brilliant, the paper is coarse and the letter-press disfigured by many typographic mistakes. But it possesses elements of success.

THIS is going the round of the press:—

"It is not generally known that a royal edition of the Daily Telegraph is prepared and issued daily, for the Queen's special sight. This has been the case ever since the death of the Prince Consort, on which oc-occasion the Telegraph obituary notice so pleased Her Majesty that she ordered a copy of the paper to be sent to each of her palaces daily. Since then twenty-five copies of the newspaper have been issued on the best of paper, in truly royal style; so that if Her Majesty takes a fancy to glance down the columns of this widely-circulated daily, she has the privilege of knowing that she reads an edition expressly prepared for herself."

That is a most interesting revelation in the unwritten history of our "Fourth Estate." We cannot express our appreciation better than by adding something from our own stores.

The death of the Prince Consort was indeed an occasion for the exhibition of literary power. Every newspaper must contain an obituary notice, and on such a subject the best pens were employed. As it was understood that these notices—at any rate the best ones—would come to the notice of the Sovereign, the pens naturally did their best. There was virtually a competition between the various journals in regard to the treatment of the topic of the hour. So far as we may trust our recollection, if the Daily Telegraph was the most eloquent and pathetic, the Spectator was the most powerful and incisive. The article in the latter journal was the composition of an old Indian, Mr. Meredith Townsend, wellknown in this country as the editor of the Friend of India, of Serampore, since defunct. After the suppression of the Mutinies, that gentleman had finally left India but not to retire from active life. He purchased the Spectator, purposing, with the help of Mr. Richard Dix Hutton as editorial associate, to revive the glories of its conduct during the régime of the late Mr. Rintoul. Having been the most brilliant and most successful journalist in India, recognised as such by the great Dalhousie, he was naturally ambitious of earning distinction similar in the superior field of Great Britain. It was by his notice of the Prince Consort that he first made his mark there in propria persona. The article as usual was anonymous, but enquiry was made from Court for the name of the writer and Mr. Townsend received the royal thanks. It richly deserved that acknowledgment. It was worthy of the highest praise. It delineated with rare discrimination and sympathy the difficult character of the Prince and described with vivid truth his function in the state—and the delicate and important part he played in England—thus anticipating the more elaborate characterization of Sir Arthur Helps and the voluminous labours of Sir Martin. If sorrow for the dead admits of any alleviation it can be alleviated by only such testimonies to the worth of the departed. We dare say the Spectator is equally read with the Daily Telegraph, and we believe more respected.

THE venerable Raja Sir T. Mulhava Rao is down with paralysis. He had been reported to be sinking fast. His distant friends and acquaintances have visited him. We hope with them that he may get over the shock. We are glad to learn that he is better, though slightly. It is however doubtful whether he can recover or be himself again. His age is against him.

A BENGALI—Narendra Kumar Mitra—a B.A. of the Calcutta University, has won exceptional honors at the last examination of the Thomason Civil Engineering College, Roorkee. This is the record of his success:—

"Higher certificate as Assistant Engineer. Council of India Prize of Rs. 1,000 as the most distinguished student of the year. Thomason prize of Rs. 250 as the best native student of the year. Sir P. Cautley's gold medal as the best mathematician of the year. General MacLagan's prize of a pistol for experimental science. Qualified in photography."

This is the third instance of a Bengali topping the successful examination list in that college. Narendra Kumar heads the 15 successful candidates of his year. He has won a pistol, but is he permitted to retain it? Does not the Arms Act stand in the way?

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—The attention of all sufferers is drawn to these well-known remedies, for they possess conspicuous advantages as a safe and reliable aid in all those emergencies to which travellers, emigrants and sailors are so especially liable. They have been largely patronized by wayfarers by land and sea, and, in fact, by all classes of the community, to their very great advantage. The Pills are beyond all doubt one of the most effective remedies ever discovered for cases of obstinate constipation, confirmed indigestion and colic, complaints which are engendered by exposure and irregular feeding. The Ointment will be found of the very greatest service in cases of piles, abscesses, erysipelas, and all kinds of local ulcerations.

THE MANIPUR DISASTER.

ON Monday, Calcutta was startled by terrible rumours. News more humiliating or painful had not come since Sir Louis Cavagnari was cut up at Cabul. It was stated that Mr. Quinton, the Chief Commissioner of Assam, accompanied by a number of officers, having proceeded to Manipur with a Gurkha escort of about 500 strong and on some mission in connection with the late revolution in that usually turbulent, though small and insignificant State, were attacked with terrible slaughter, and there was no knowing what had become of the Chief Commissioner himself and his staff. In September last, the reigning Maharaja, Sura Chandra Sing, a son of Maharaja Chunder Kirti Sing deceased, had been forcibly deposed by his four half-brothers, of whom the eldest Kula Chandra Sing is now the Ruler, and Tikendrajit Sing, the Heir Apparent, who is also the head of the army. The deposed Chief was offered his life and honour on condition of his signing his abdication and leaving the country instantly. He was glad to sign away his kingdom and leave Manipur with his family. Coming to Calcutta, he sought the help of the Viceroy. The Government, according to one version, "after a full and careful enquiry in the conditions and causes which contributed to recent developments in Manipur," decided to recognize the new Maharaja but at the same time to punish those who had been, chiefly instrumental in bringing about the revolution. The chief actor in this drama was this same Tikendrajit, ordinarily called "Koireng" or the Wanderer, who has been a restless spirit even from the time of Chunder Kirti Sing. It was to give effect to this decision that Mr. Quinton came to Manipur on 22nd March. At first he was well received. A Durbar was to be held on the 23rd at which it was proposed to arrest the Commander-in-Chief. In the meantime, whether from mere suspicions excited by the unusually strong escort accompanying Mr. Quinton, or the object of the mission somehow oozing out, the Manipuris took alarm and they fell upon the party in the night of the 23rd, the fighting being continued to the next day, when the English ammunition failing, the troops dispersed, after sustaining some slaughter, the extent of which is not yet clearly known.

This version is contradicted by subsequent information. A later telegram says that the Chief Commissioner ordered the capture of the Jubraj in his Palace. Accordingly, Colonel Skene got 200 men into the Palace enclosure when a serious engagement took place. The English force being removed, the Manipuris assumed the offensive and attacked the Residency. An armistice was arranged, and Mr. Quinton with Colonel Skene, Mr. Grimwood, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Cossins, and one bugler, went halfway to meet the Maharaja, when they were pushed inside the gate of the Palace, only the bugler escaping. The Residency was then fired upon and destroyed.—The Jubraj is Tikendrajit, our wellknown Senapati, "generalissimo," otherwise called the Commander-in-Chief.

The first attack thus came from the English force. Indeed, strange as it may seem, no secret was made of the object of Mr. Quinton's errand while negotiations were boldly entered into for having the Commander-in-Chief of the state surrendered to the English Government. We wonder how a bold attitude like this could be assumed in the absence of a force adequately strong or equipped to support it. The negotiations naturally failed, when a force of only 250 men was led by Colonel Skene to arrest the leader of the Manipur revolution in the Palace. It was an act of almost incredible temerity. The force was a mere handful which found themselves face to face with a force magnified by the light of the disaster to 6,000 Manipuris, Nagas, Kookies, and so forth. The Palace was also fortified with four guns, while the attacking force had no artillery. The force having been immediately withdrawn, the Manipuris turned their fire upon the Residency. The place being untenable, the Chief Commissioner tried to make terms, and under a truce went out with four other officers to meet the Commander-in-Chief when he and his companions were treacherously taken prisoner.

Early in this week, it was stated that there had been thirty-six hours fighting followed by the slaughter and dispersion of the Gurkhas who formed the English escort, the Chief Commissioner himself with his party being taken prisoners. The most painful part of the intelligence was the uncertainty about the fate of Mr. Quinton and his party, including, it was at first surmised, Mrs. Quinton, Lieutenant Quinton, Miss. Quinton, and Mrs. Grimwood. The report of three members of the Chief Commissioner's family having been of his party was happily soon enough contradicted by another telegram, while subsequent information arrived of Mrs. Grimwood having made her escape. So far so good, but still this agonizing uncertainty as to the fate of the Chief Commissioner has not up to date been removed. People speak of the wire at Kohima having been cut at both ends, as if that was the cause of our distressing information, whereas the evil is deeper, lying in the unfortunate situation—the peculiar nature of the calamity. Had the telegraph been maintained unbroken to Manipur, would the prisoners be permitted to communicate except in the interest of their captors? The party of the Chief Commissioner consisted of Mr. Cossins, Assistant-Secretary, Messrs. Gurdon and Woods, Assistant Commissioners, the Political Agent, Mr. Grimwood, and Mrs. Grimwood, Mr. Melville of the Telegraph Department, Mr. Mily, Colonel C. McD. Skene, Captain G. H. Butcher, Lieutenants Lugard and Chatterton, Surgeon Calvert, Lieutenant Simpson, Captain T. S. Boileau, and Lieutenant Brackenbury, with 470 men of the 42nd and 44th Gurkhas. At present only six Europeans are in peril, in the hands in the enemy. Poor Lieutenant Brackenbury was the only casualty. He died in harness as a hero or a Brackenbury, in the attack on the Palace.

The first information received in Calcutta was based upon the account given by two fugitives from Mr. Quinton's Gurkha escort who had escaped into Kohima. Since then more fugitives are flying into that out-post town, while not a few have died on the way and in the jungles from hardships and privation. To allay panic, the Assam Government has issued a telegram to all district officers to the following effect "To enable you to refute any incorrect or alarmist rumours, you are informed that the Chief Commissioner, Colonel Skene, of the 42nd Gurkhas, Mr. Grimwood, Political Agent, Mr. Cossins, Assistant Secretary, Mr. Simpson, of the 43rd Gurkhas, and Mr. Melville, Superintendent of Telegraphs, have been treacherously seized and detained at Manipur. There is no reason to doubt the safety of the captives. As far as is known, only two British officers are unaccounted for, all the others, including Mrs. Grimwood, having arrived at Silchar.

Our total loss is believed not to be large. There is absolutely no cause for anxiety on present information. Communicate this to sub-divisional officers."

In continuation of the above telegram another was immediately after issued announcing that all the Europeans were now accounted for, except Lieutenant Brackenbury, of the 44th Gurkhas, killed.

It appears from the story of the fugitives that the surprise of the party was a fate tempted by themselves. The Chief Commissioner and his party were, indeed, proceeding under a flag of truce during a cessation of hostilities to the Maharaja's Palace, when they were detained. But such a truce, under such circumstances, could be worth nothing. The worst of the thing is the uncertainty of their fate, but a hope is expressed that they may still be held as prisoners. A good many, with Mrs. Grimwood among the number, are stated to have retired under Captain Boileau who had been coming to their relief from Cachar, others fled to Tamu on the Burma side, and more than forty reached Kohima. Mr. Melville, Superintendent of Telegraphs, is also a prisoner at Manipur. The attack is described to have been sudden and unexpected, having been pre-arranged by the Jubaraj who was intended to be deported. Thousands of men, they say, seemed to spring up and attack the English party on all sides. That was of course the exaggeration of panic-stricken imagination. The insufficiency of ammunition and want of artillery were more serious drawbacks. But even these are not sufficient to account for the disaster. The true want of our party was leadership and counsel. In the absence of these, they were a spruce rabble of civil and military men and officers. The slightest difficulty was sufficient to demoralise them all.

Already, troops are in motion for Manipur from all sides. The Viceroy gave up his Kumaon tour and has hurried up to Simla. We believe Sir John Edgar is in readiness to start any moment should the need arise.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

AN EXAMPLE OF THE LATE MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS IN THE COUNTRY.

LOCAL Self-Government is exhibiting strange developments. It furnishes a series of excitements to our otherwise quiet and even ordinarily dull society. First comes the sharp contest over the elections. This is followed by an almost equally keen struggle for the Government nominations. The last stage is reached when the elected and nominated Commissioners hold their first meeting and there is a fresh trial of party-strength in the election of Chairman and Vice-Chairman. The incidents attending the first two stages are nearly alike—with the difference that while in one case appeals are made to a generally ignorant clientele, in the other the same sort of canvassing, conducted with similar arts and tactics, goes on with officers of Government. The results in both cases however are not dissimilar, at times. If the elections do not always send the best men, neither do the nominations. Both are carried by the same devices. Government officers sometimes lend themselves to party. If there is a great deal of misrepresentation and crimination and recrimination and blackening of fair reputations resorted to at the elections, the like things mark the progress of the nominations. The officers having anything to do with these appointments are inundated with a mass of correspondence, partly anonymous and of course libellous—pestered with interviews—bored, bullied, besieged into submission, influenced through mysterious agencies—in a word, canvassed in much the same ways as the vulgar voter.

All this long and wearisome struggle is waged with an eye to the final contest in which the parties are to measure their strength by electing the Executive Officers. These final elections have already been nearly completed in the newly constituted municipalities. Some of them have already been ratified by Government—others are awaiting confirmation. These elections used to pass unopposed before, the Government confirmation being regarded as only formal, but the case is otherwise now. They are exciting the keenest opposition at this time in our country.

The results of these elections are not unoften highly instructive. Sometimes the popular interest in these matters is touching. We may discuss the subject on some future day. In the meantime, we will offer our readers an account of a most hotly contested election as it reaches us.

It relates to the Rajpur Municipality. The tension of party-feeling here has been very severe for a long time past. Accordingly both the elections and the nominations elicited the greatest activity among the two parties into which the community here as elsewhere is divided. The object of one of the parties was to oust the Chairman of the last three years, Babu Nobin Chand Ghose, a Zemindar, while the Chairman's party strove equally hard to maintain their power for another term. To gain their respective ends, they had labored strenuously to have men of their own party returned to the Board, both by election and by Government appointment, with the result, apparently, of being about equally matched. A meeting of the Board thus constituted was held for the purpose of electing Chairman and Vice-Chairman. There was, as might be expected, a "tie" on the initial question of selecting a president for this meeting. Nothing came of it, and a reference was made to the Magistrate on the subject. The Magistrate's decision was that the late Chairman should preside at another meeting. Another meeting was accordingly called by Babu N. C. Ghose but one of the members who had at the first meeting been on his side having been, it is said, influenced to keep away from this meeting, he was apprehensive of being outnumbered, and to put off defeat as long as possible, an objection was taken to the meeting on an extremely flimsy ground. One of the nominated Commissioners was Babu Matilal Bhattacharjee. It appears there are two Matilal Bhattacharjees, both Masters of Arts, and both engaged in the profession of teaching. Upon this the technical plea was now taken that the meeting could not take place before the ambiguity of the Government nomination was cleared up. There was really not a shade of doubt. One gentleman only of the same name was present. This Babu Matilal Bhattacharjee, M.A., is a teacher of the Ripon Collegiate school at Howrah. The second Matilal, is a Professor of the Agra College, and is for years absent from his native town. This objection, besides, not having been taken at the first meeting had been practically waived and evidently it was now resorted to, much as the drowning man catches at a straw. The other party, however, were prepared to have the objection, such as it was, put to the vote, but the Chairman's partizans, conscious of being in a minority, had merely reserved this dodge as a second string to their bow, and Babu N. C. Ghose exercising his prerogative with a high hand, declared the meeting dissolved, pending identification by the Magistrate of the Government's own Bhattacharjee and went away with his party. The other party remained, and there being a quorum, elected another President, and though they were not furnished by the office clerks, evidently at the bidding of the late Chairman, even with writing materials, had them supplied from the neighbourhood and proceeded to the business for which the meeting had been convened. They elected Babu Annada Prasad Maitra, a Zemindar, as Chairman and Babu Kedar Nath Mazumdar as Vice-Chairman. A protest has of course been filed by the other party against the elections, and the Magistrate's decision is awaited with anxiety by both, and with no small interest by the outside public.

A PROTEST FROM LONDON.

To the Editor, Reis and Rayyet, Calcutta.

SIR,—Allow me to say a few words about the young Bengali Brahmin, whose private letter was published sometime ago in the Englishman and was severely criticised by you. In fact he wrote the letter more or less sarcastically which speaks highly of the English people and stirs the feelings of the young Indians to come to this country. The gentleman who so treacherously betrayed the secrets of his friend's letter, was himself willing to come to England and asked the Brahmin Bachecha to give him an idea of the English life; so the letter was written by the Bachecha less with any object of running down his countrymen and his dearest relatives, than to encourage his so-called gentleman friend, to cherish the idea of coming to England.

Now, Sir, I believe, you will agree with me when I say, that the gentleman who, however learned, could betray his friend's secrets, is not what we mean by the word "gentleman." Let me tell you that in England no one ever thinks of betraying his friend's secrets; while in India the "gentleman" in spite of his high education, I beg your pardon, Sir, high University degrees, could do so. From this, Sir, you can easily compare the two peoples, Indian and Englishmen. The so-called "gentleman" should have known better manners at least.—Yours, &c.

Public Paper.

VOLUNTEERS IN INDIA.

No. 65B, dated Fort William, the 7th January 1891.

From—The Secretary to the Government of India, Military Department,

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, General Dept.

His Excellency the Governor-General in Council has lately had under consideration the question of increasing the number of volunteers in India. In order to ascertain where such increase was most practicable, statistics have been called for from local Governments and Administrations, showing the numbers of European and Eurasian residents in the several districts and towns of India, as compared with the numbers of volunteers in those districts and towns. The result of this investigation will be found in copies of a statement which are herewith forwarded. The figures may not be absolutely correct, but they serve to show in some measure the increase in the number of volunteers which is possible.

2. Instructions have lately been given for the collection of statistics at the forthcoming census, from which reliable information may be expected as to the exact extent to which the increase in the volunteer force of India is practicable. Meanwhile, the information collected in the statement now sent, which is based partly on the census report of 1881 and partly on the statistics above mentioned, shows that in the districts under the control of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal there is a large number of European and Eurasian residents who are not members of the volunteer force, and I am to say that the Government of India cannot but think that many of these could be induced to join the force. This is particularly the case with the marginally-noted (Belair Light Horse, Calcutta Volunteers, Northern Bengal Volunteers, Orissa Volunteers, Chittagong Volunteers) corps, the strength of which is very small compared with the recruitable population of the locality, even after making every allowance for military men, youths, old men, and others who are unable to join the force. From the statement which was submitted with your letter No. 689, dated 25th April 1889, it also appears that there are over a hundred men at the marginally-noted (Burdwan 126, Howrah 223, 24-Pergunnahs 249,) places in Bengal fit to be volunteers, but who are not yet enrolled in the force.

3. I am to say that the Governor-General in Council would be glad if His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor would take such steps as he may think desirable to increase the strength of the above-named corps as much as possible, and to raise new corps and companies where none now exist. I am also to ask that, under the orders of Sir Charles Elliott, instructions may be issued impressing upon all officials the necessity for taking an active interest in this matter and of doing their utmost to further the volunteer movement, the matter being one to which the Government of India attaches the utmost importance.

4. The Government of India are aware that there is a certain number of residents who, on account of their age, the nature of their duties, or other causes, cannot join an active volunteer corps; and in order to meet the cases of such men, they lately sanctioned the formation of volunteer reserves on conditions which are within the ability of almost every eligible person to comply with. It seems highly desirable that some steps should be taken to induce all residents, who are unable or unwilling to join the active volunteer force, to enlist in the reserve. An extract from the Regulations for Volunteer Reserves is enclosed, which will show how easy are the obligations required of reservists. I am to request that this extract may be circulated as widely as possible in the territories under the control of the Lieutenant-Governor, with such instructions as His Honour may consider appropriate.

5. The Railway authorities have been separately addressed as regards railway volunteer corps and railway employes.

6. Finally, I am to say that the Government of India hope that the efforts that will now be made will result in a considerable augmentation of the auxiliary forces of India by the formation of new active or reserve volunteer corps or companies in the districts where none now exist, or by the increase in the strength of existing corps; and I am to request that a report may be furnished hereafter showing what success has attended the steps which may be taken in this direction.

Extract from the Volunteer Reserve Regulations (published in clause 51, India Army Circulars of 1889, and subsequent circulars), showing obligations required of Reservists.

Para. 10. Prior to enrolment in the reserves, it should be made clear to the applicant that his obligations will be as follows, and he will be required to sign a declaration in the following form:—

- 1st. The maintenance in good order and at all times in readiness for service (if in his possession) of rifle, ammunition, accoutrements, and uniform (if any).
- 2nd. The wearing of uniform (if any) only when on duty, and in compliance with regimental orders.
- 3rd. Attendance in uniform (if any) fully accoutred, whenever summoned by competent authority, save when prevented by duty to employer, sickness, or other unavoidable cause.
- 4th. Attendance at such drills and instructions as is necessary, in the opinion of competent authority, to ensure the proper use and care of the rifle, ammunition and other articles in possession of the reservist.
- 5th. Completion of the annual musketry course prescribed for reservists (para 40).
- 6th. Delivery of arms, ammunition, and uniform in good order (reasonable wear excepted) to the authority appointed to receive them on leaving the district or resigning his membership.
- 7th. To notify to the regimental authorities all changes of residence.

Drill and Musketry.

39. A knowledge of drill, other than such knowledge as is necessary to enable a reservist to qualify under the musketry course (para. 40), shall not be required of a reserve volunteer in order that he may obtain a certificate of efficiency, but commandants should encourage reservists to acquire a knowledge of drill, and should afford them such facilities as are possible of practising drill.

40. Towards qualifying as an efficient for the season, a reservist must execute the following musketry course:—

Yards.	Rounds.	Position.	Target.	Hits.
100	5	Standing ...	4 feet square ...	3
200	5	Kneeling ...	Do. ...	3
300	5	Lying down ...	Do. ...	3

The course may be performed at any period between the 1st April and 31st March.

41. Where a reserve corps is affiliated to an active volunteer corps, the reservists, if convenient for them, will practise firing and execute their annual course of musketry at the range of the active corps, but where this is inconvenient or impracticable, reservists, whether belonging to an affiliated corps or to a corps unconnected with any active corps, will go through their firing at any suitable ground appointed by the commandant of the corps, a qualified person deputed by the commandant being responsible that the reservist fires from correct distances and at proper-sized targets made either of wood or canvas, so as to be easily moved from place to place as necessary.

THE AGE OF CONSENT BILL IN THE VICEROY'S COUNCIL.

19th March 1891.

So much as regards the religious objection in the abstract. With reference to the particular rite of garbbadban, with which it is said that the Bill will interfere, it is abundantly clear from the papers before the Council that it is not universally observed in Bengal, or generally in other parts of India; that its neglect by Kulin Brahmins as a class, and its non-observance by many families who disapprove of it on account of its obscenity, has not been followed by exclusion from caste, or other ecclesiastical or social penalties; that its observance may be postponed on various secular grounds; and that the penance for its non-observance is of an exceedingly trifling character. I have not failed to remark that two learned Judges of the High Court of Calcutta, for both of whom I have a great respect, have pointed out that "the formal and outward penance may be simple, but the real efficacy of penance consists, according to the Hindoo scriptures, quite as much as according to reason and common sense, in real inward penitence and a resolution not to commit the sin again." I can quite understand that there may be men who place religious duty above all earthly laws, but these men are few; and I think Pundit Iswara Chandra Vidyasagar is nearer the truth when he says "the punishment which the Shastras prescribe for violation of the rule is of a spiritual character and is liable to be disregarded." Besides, when the neglect of this particular religious observance can be excused by the simple expedient of absence from home, it is difficult to see how any serious conflict of duty can arise in the minds even of the most orthodox.

I pass now to the only ground upon which my hon'ble friend appears now to base his opposition to the Bill, and that is, its inutility. I may observe at the outset that the utility of a measure of this kind depends to a very great extent on the support given to it by the more influential members of the community. If those respectable persons who object to the Bill because it is (they say) a measure of social reform, and all social reforms should emanate from the people themselves without legislative interference, would but consider how helpful an Act of this kind will be to them if they are really sincere in desiring an improvement in their marriage customs, they would welcome instead of opposing it, and would be as eager to point out to their countrymen the benefits likely to accrue from its observance as they are now zealous in suggesting the means by which it may be turned into an engine of oppression. I have no sympathy with the pseudo-social reformers who talk glibly on the subject, and do nothing. If they honestly believe their marriage customs are bad, let them follow the example of the Sardars of Rajputana, and amend them. If the Legislature is to wait for their action before undertaking a measure of protection of this kind, the necessity for which I think I have amply proved, the fate of child-wives in Bengal will never be ameliorated. My hon'ble friend says the Act will be a dead-letter; it is for him and those who support him to make it so, not by throwing difficulties in the way of prosecutions, but by lending their whole influence so to modify caste rules and domestic practices that prosecutions may become unnecessary. No one will be hurt by this Act who does not break it; no one, as I have shown, is compelled to break it by religious duty; for those who break it, who shall say that the punishment likely to be awarded is too severe?

My hon'ble friend has pointed out a way in which Hindu society can very materially assist the observance of the law. He says, speaking of Bengal,—

"Amongst people of the higher castes girls are generally married between the ages of nine and eleven. Amongst people of the lower castes marriageable age is still lower. The girls go immediately after marriage to their husbands' house and stay there for a week or so. Before they attain puberty they occasionally visit their husbands' house and make a stay for temporary periods. Whenever they visit their husbands' house, the general practice in Bengal is to allow the young couple to sleep together at night."

As my hon'ble friend justly observes, "this practice is certainly pernicious," and he considers it a "moral evil which would not in any appreciable degree be remedied by this Bill." But surely advantage might be taken of the passing of this Bill to restore the practice which formerly prevailed in Bengal, and which still prevails in the neighbouring provinces of Behar and Orissa, under which a girl is not sent to her husband's house until she is mature enough for cohabitation.

It remains for me to deal with certain specific proposals which have been made for the amendment of the Bill, and I may say at starting that the Select Committee were, not merely ready, but anxious, to consider favourably any amendments which, while not weakening the principle of the Bill, might tend to remove public apprehensions as to the possibly injurious administration of the law. The first of these proposed amendments was to substitute the attainment of puberty for the age-limit of twelve years, and it was argued, plausibly enough, that it would be easier to give proof of the former than of the latter criterion, while at the same time the protection of the law would be extended to a larger class. The majority of the Select Committee were unable to accept these arguments. No doubt there will be difficulty in many cases in procuring satisfactory evidence of age, but the temptation to manufacture evidence in regard to the physical condition of the girl will be infinitely greater. As His Highness the Maharaja of Jeypore has aptly pointed out—"though such a provision would serve to silence the clamour raised against the Bill, yet there would be this danger, that delinquents in their endeavours to defend themselves would, almost in every instance, try to take shelter under the exception contemplated." The majority of the Select Committee entirely agree with His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor in thinking that, apart from technical difficulties, "the objections to making it necessary to prove in Court the occurrence of the first indications of puberty are insuperable." We have the authority of the Bengal Government for holding that the signs of puberty are frequently brought on by artificial stimulation. In a letter to the Indian Mirror, Surgeon-Major Basu the Civil Surgeon of Mymensingh, states that "unaided menstruation is unfortunately a rare event in Bengal." How then is it possible to accept this test in preference to that of age?

No doubt the adoption of the age-limit of twelve years will not cover all the cases which it would be desirable to protect, but it will go a long way in that direction. If the statistics quoted by my hon'ble friend from Surgeon-Major Gupta's report are correct, it will cover 39 per cent. of the girls of India, and that is a great step in advance. Other authorities, however, Dr. Juggobundo Bose for example, justify the belief that the proportion will be much higher. In the absence of reliable statistics, we are constrained to fall back on what seems likely to be a generally acceptable limit. In many parts of India and among many classes, the practice is established, or is gaining ground, of not sending wives to live with their husbands until they are at least twelve years old, and thus, as the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces observes, "the theory of the law will, by the proposed amendment, be brought into harmony with the practice of the people on a point in which the morality of the people is in advance of the morality of the law." Moreover, we assimilate the law regarding rape to the general law which provides that consent to the commission of an offence shall be unavailing if given by a person who is under twelve years of age.

Another proposal has been made that no prosecution shall be allowed except at the instance of the child wife herself, or her natural guardian, or some blood relation. The adoption of this suggestion would undoubtedly reduce the law to a dead-letter, for it is to be feared that all the influence of the family would be used to screen the offender rather than to protect the victim.

Then it is said that the offence when committed by a husband against his wife, ought not to be classed as rape, and should be visited with a lighter punishment. I do not think it desirable that the gravity of the offence should be minimized in this way. I agree with Sir Meredyth Plowden, "that it is an offence affecting the wife not as wife, but as a human creature"; and I should greatly regret if this Council were to weaken the effect of the Bill by drawing a distinction in favour of brutality on the part of husbands. With regard to the amount of punishment to be inflicted, that is a matter for the consideration of the Courts, which will apportion it, within the limits laid down in the Bill, according to the circumstances of the case; and while, in some instances, a light penalty may be inflicted, it can scarcely be doubted that cases will occur in which the highest penalty awardable will not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the offence committed.

Although I cannot help thinking that the chances of this measure being misused if it becomes law have been exaggerated, I have no hesitation in commending to the acceptance of the Council the two additional safeguards against its possible misapplication which have been introduced by the Select Committee. The first, which limits the preliminary jurisdiction in such cases to District Magistrates and Chief Presidency Magistrates, has been adopted at the suggestion of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces; the second, which limits police investigation, if ordered under section 155 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to investigation by police officers of superior rank only, has the approval of the High Court at Calcutta. We have thus, I think, fenced round the administration of the Act with every reasonable precaution that could be adopted without entirely destroying its efficiency. As regards the publicity to be given to proceedings under it, the Magistrate has an absolute discretion, under section 352 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to exclude the public from his Court, if he thinks fit. In this and in all other matters the experienced officers to whom alone the investigation of cases between husband and wife will be entrusted may be relied upon to act with all the circumspection which the exercise of so delicate a jurisdiction may demand.

"One other point remains to be noticed. It has been said that, if the Bill is passed, women may be subjected against their will to medical examinations and thereby put to shame and disgrace. There is no ground for this apprehension. It has been laid down by the High Court at Calcutta, in the clearest terms, in the case of The Queen-Empress v. Gura Charan Dasadh, that no Court or Magistrate has any right to order the medical examination of a witness without her consent, and that such an examination is an illegal and unjustifiable assault, for which damages may be recovered. This objection, therefore, fails like the rest.

I have now, I think, gone through the main arguments for and against the Bill, and the result seems to be this. It is admitted that immature prostitution and premenstrual cohabitation, where they exist, are abhorrent alike to common humanity and the teachings of the Hindu religion, and ought to be put down by law; the Indian community at large, for all classes of whom we are legislating, approve of the measure, so far as it goes, though many would desire to carry it still further--and this is the only part of the criticism with which I have any sympathy; but because the operation of the law might in a few cases interfere with the performance of a rite which is at best of questionable obligation, and of merely partial and local observance, my hon'ble friend would deprive the Bill of its most powerful sanctions, and establish a ready means for the evasion of its penalties. I trust the Council, in the interests of the great class of Her Majesty's subjects who are the victims, not so much of an unreasoning regard for what may be believed to be religious duty, as of a callous disregard of any consideration but selfish passion, will set aside this plea on behalf of a practically infinitesimal minority of hyper-orthodox persons and pass the Bill in the form in which it has been reported by the Select Committee.

The Hon'ble the Raja of Bhinga said :--

My Lord, I wish to say a few words in support of this Bill. As far as the North-Western Provinces and Oudh are concerned, the Hindus are not particular at all about the performance of the Garbhadhan ceremony, nor is any objection raised by their caste people if they choose to marry their daughters after their attainment of the age of puberty. Our Shastras do not allow the Sudras to perform rites like Garbhadhan prescribed in the Sutras, and the Brahmins who assist them in the performance of such rites are called "Sudrayachi" or "beggars supported by the Sudras," and the Shastras strictly enjoin that they should be punished with excommunication. These rites are intended only for the twice-born, namely, the Brahmins, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas. They, having to undergo before marriage the ceremony of Upanayana or the investiture with the sacred thread, do not think the observance of Garbhadhan so essential. Hence, perhaps, arises the laxity in the practice.

Persons of high family, as a rule, seldom marry their daughters below the age of fourteen. Search for suitable husbands and the demand of large dowries stand in the way of early marriages. It has, therefore, become customary among the Kshatriyas or Rajputs that as soon as a girl is married she leaves her father's house for that of her husband; and that is one of the chief reasons, I believe, which actuated the Princes and Nobles of Rajputana to pass at a meeting a resolution to the effect that they should not marry their daughters below the age of fourteen and their sons below that of eighteen.

In my part of the country, girls rarely, if ever, attain the age of puberty before the completion of their twelfth year. But, when menstruation takes place earlier, it is generally brought on by objectionable means.

That there is a demand for sexual intercourse with children, and that consequently it is thought necessary to have recourse to an abominable and unnatural process in order to bring about the desired result, cannot be denied. Prostitutes ask for, and men willingly pay, very high prices for cohabitation with girls of immature age. Such cohabitation is known up-country by a particular name which, however, escapes my memory. The prostitutes on such occasions are presented not only with large sums of money, but with jewels, dress and other valuable articles as well. When men undergo trouble and expense to such an extent to satisfy their lust, how can one expect that they will restrain their desires when the above qualifications are found in girls lawfully married to them? That such an unnatural desire exists in men of this country is to be attributed greatly to the present state of society and to the influence of the works of the Hindu and Muhammadan poets of the degenerate period. Such works are, no doubt, the outcome of the past misrule and anarchy, when unbridled sensuality was the order of the day. In Hindi alone there are at least one hundred treatises on illicit love, called Nayakabhed, and all of them abound in the loathsome descriptions of the pleasures of cohabitation with girls of tender years. Such being the case, the sooner a stop is put to these gross outrages on humanity the better for the country. In the words of Vedavyas, "Paropkar," or doing good to others, is the fundamental principle of our religion : and the ancient bard Valmiki, in his Ramayana, makes one of our greatest sages, Visha Mitra, go so far as to lay it down that a ruler may perform acts in contravention of the express forms of religion when the protection of his subjects and the interests of humanity render the same necessary.

At the same time I submit some safeguards are very necessary. Parda system being strictly observed in the Provinces of Oudh and North-West, a Hindu or Muhammadan lady of family cannot even converse with an outsider. Therefore appearance before the Magistrate, exposure by the pleaders, and the examination by the male doctors will be viewed with horror and lead to deplorable consequences.

The Hon'ble Mr. Nugent said :—

"My Lord, I do not propose to give a silent vote on this very important measure, which has attracted so much attention not only in India but also in England, has elicited so many opinions of such varying and conflicting descriptions, and has, apparently, since its introduction in January by the Hon'ble Sir Andrew Scoble, constituted the chief topic of discussion and interest in the Native community throughout the country. Like the other members of your Excellency's Council, I have waded through the filthy floods of loathsome literature which have been so copiously poured forth, and can say with truth that never before have I had equally unpleasant and repulsive reading. It is difficult for a layman to arrive at a positive conclusion on a question of tangled Sanskrit texts, concerning the proper interpretation to be placed on which the most learned modern experts and eminent scholars are at hopeless variance. Nor is it easy to apportion the weight to be attached to the utterances of old world sages and mediæval doctors of medicine or divinity when those authorities differ, the more especially where doubt exists as to the purport of those utterances, and diversity of view prevails both as to the text and the commentary, their meaning and their value. The main point at issue between the Native opponents and supporters of the Bill would seem to be whether, according to the ancient Hindu religious law and its later commentators, the Indian scholiasts of centuries back, the consummation of marriage immediately after the first appearance of menses in his wife is prescribed as a binding religious duty on the husband—a duty of which the non-performance involves the commission of a deadly sin. On this subject much has been said and written, and the realistic details entered into by some of the keenest and most crude adversaries of the measure, specially as regards the rites attendant on what is described as a religious ceremony and the nature of the penance to be undergone by the ancestors of a husband who complies not with the alleged injunctions of the Hindu scriptures, can only be characterised as revolting. But, as far as I am competent to judge, the balance of argument and of fact is distinctly on the side of such eminent interpreters of the Sanskrit text and authorities on the ancient books as the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Telang, Dr. Bhandarkar and others who hold their views ; and the opinion, therefore, at which I have arrived is that it is not essential, according to his religion, that a Hindu husband should actually cohabit with his wife immediately after her first menstruation, whatever might then be her age, and whatever her physical fitness for sexual intercourse, and its results in the form of maternity. That pre-menstrual cohabitation is strictly forbidden seems certain : that intercourse by a husband with his wife immediately after the first appearance of the menses—which after all is about one of the earliest signs of approaching puberty—is enjoined as a duty or even is contemplated as a general rule, is not, I think, established. Indeed, it would be surprising if it were. The old Hindu lawgivers, like other legislators for nations in the earliest times, were wise men. In the injunctions they promulgated or codified they had ordinarily in view some substantial, tangible object more intimately connected with this world than with the world to come, though to render those injunctions the more binding and respected they imparted to them a religious sanction. In their commands concerning marriage the result at which they aimed was the growth of a large, strong and healthy population, able to establish towns, sufficient to develop the agricultural resources of the country, and well fitted, should the occasion arise, to speak with their enemies in the gate ; and this object they, being men of great wisdom and intelligence, knew they would be unlikely to attain by requiring boy-husbands to cohabit with immature child-wives—a union form which only could spring a progeny weak in body and feeble in mind. To the relatively modern glosses made by comparatively recent commentators of merely provincial influence and reputation on the texts of the early lawgivers no serious importance need, in my humble opinion, be attached. These commentators at least were not inspired : their writings are not sacred scriptures. It is, I think, in any case a question whether, if it could legitimately be held as absolutely certain that the ancient Hindu religious or social law did direct husbands to cohabit with immature child-wives, Government would not be morally bound to intervene now to prevent a sin against humanity and to put an end to an abominable practice worthy only of debased savages, which the evidence forthcoming shows to be unfortunately only too common in some parts of India, particularly in portions of Bengal. The British Government has not hitherto hesitated to prohibit acts in themselves wrongful and cruel even when the plea of religious sanction could be advanced on their behalf with greater validity than it can be in this instance ; and it would not now, I think and trust, shrink from putting its veto on other customs equally opposed to the instincts of all right-minded men whatever their race and whatever their creed, and even more harmful in their present and their future results, merely because noisy agitators protested that to stop such abominations would be to outrage their religion and to run counter to dubious dogmas propounded in prehistoric ages. But, as already observed, this question does not, I think, arise here. The Bill now under consideration does not as far as I am able to judge interfere with the Hindu or Muhammadan marriage law, and the theory that the teachings of the Hindu scriptures require the immediate consummation of marriage on the very first appearance of the menses is not established by the evidence. To the notice of those opponents of the measure who contend that the intervention of Government in such a matter is inadmissible may be commended the action of His Highness the Maharaja of Jeypore, a Rajput of high caste and pure descent, the enlightened ruler of one of the chief Indian principalities, who by a stroke of his pen has prohibited the marriage within his territories of Rajput girls before they have attained the age of fourteen years.

It is not necessary to dwell upon the misery, the unhappiness, the pain and the other evils which result from the pernicious practice which this Bill is designed to prevent. They are known to all. But it is contended that the proposed legislation is uncalled for, because the great majority of girls do not attain to puberty until they have passed the age of twelve and pre-menstrual intercourse is forbidden by the Hindu scriptures, because the number of cases of violation of immature girl-wives under that age by their husbands is exceedingly small, and because the existing law suffices to meet all requirements. To this the answer, I think, is that, though in other Indian provinces premenstrual cohabitation may be of very rare occurrence, in Bengal it is far from unfrequent ; that a considerable number of Indian girls do commence to menstruate before they reach twelve years although still imperfectly developed and physically unfit to live with their husbands, and that for them protection is needed ; that the number of instances in which serious and sometimes fatal injury is caused to a luckless child by enforced intercourse with her husband is unfortunately much larger than is stated by the opponents of the measure ; and that the occurrence of these cases is in itself sufficient proof that the law as it now stands is not adequate or sufficiently deterrent. Much stress is laid on the statements of a number of medical men, mainly Native, but some European, that in the course of their practice they have not met with cases in which girls have been injured by connection with their husbands. To this evidence I attach little value. This is precisely the class of cases in which no medical man would be called in to advise and prescribe. The maimed wife, if treated at all, would be treated by the women of the household and their female neighbours : the matter would be hushed up and kept secret ; and, if death did follow in instances where the girl was very small and the violence employed unusually great, the cause assigned would be fever, cholera or an accidental fall. A very different tale is told by the lady doctors in India in their memorial.

That a Bill on so delicate a subject as that dealt with in this measure should lead to much agitation and excite considerable opposition is inevitable, and it cannot be denied that the proposed legislation has in many quarters met with a hostile reception. It is satisfactory, however, to find that a large and influential volume of public opinion, notably in the Bombay Presidency, is in favour of the measure, and that of those persons really competent to judge the question on its merits a majority would appear to support the course pursued by Government. It may, I think, safely be assumed that at most, if not all, of what are described as "monster meetings" held to protest against the Bill, nine out of ten of those present had but the most vague and nebulous notions concerning either the provisions of the Bill or the effects it was likely to produce. They most probably were told with certain rhetorical embellishments not characterised by very strict regard for accuracy that Government was about to pass a law which would invade the sanctity of their homes and private life ; and forthwith, without further thought or discussion, they were prepared to vote as was desired or to sign any paper placed before them. When once, however, the Bill has become law, all agitation will, I anticipate, speedily subside ; the baseless clamour regarding religion being endangered will rapidly die out ; the beneficial and salutary character of the enactment, hedged round with safeguards as it now is, will be recognised ; and gradually a practice which no right-minded man can defend and every kindly-hearted woman must abhor will become as extinct as is sati or any other barbarous custom which has already been swept away by the progress of education and civilisation.

For these reasons, my Lord, I beg to support the Bill now before Your Excellency's Council.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE PICTURE.

YOU bid me frame for you in fancy-work,
Ideal loveliness of mind and form,
Such as a poet, some ambrosial hour,
Might draw upon the canvass of his heart,
Taking a living model, and thereto
Adding and rounding, chisel-like of pen.
—Well, boots it not to say if dream divine
Haunted the winding galleries of my thought ;
Or truth put down, point-blank, adornmentless,
Like fancy seen, because so like the truth ;
I cannot tell you—look, and you shall say ;
—There is a beauty, startling as the gush
Of sudden sunlight on an inland sea,
Girt round with many hills, that shines at once
Bright to the eye, electric to the heart ;
There is a timorous beauty, as a bud's,
Among the full-blown roses manifold.
Not such is hers ; 't is rather like the light,
The pale and tender light of summer eve—
Not golden and not amber—not of night,
Far less of day ; rose melting into pearl,
Mere just tinged between the sun and stars.
Not such is hers ; the white moss-rose, I think
Were less dissimilar ; for she takes the heart
More as of right than does your good-girl bud,
Not quite by storm, like the inviting red
On the ripe charms that bend the heavy stalk,
But with a half-way course betwixt the twain.
And you may miss the light ; you may not mark
That gentle blossom mine, its own green leaves
Do so enwrap it and its moss enswathe.
But see the light I speak of, and broad day
Will make you long for eventide again ;
And the moon's delicate tracery woofed across
White sails of vapor boats will have no charm.
But cast your eye upon my white moss-rose,
And ne'er a queenly bloom or peasant bud
Shall be her peer within comparison.
There are who take you with a storm of words,
Of sport or sentiment ; and two and fro
Bandy your laughter or some heavier thing.
There are who open all the heart at once,
Light found, light lost—'t is scarcely worth one's while
To ask what 's given with so liberal grace.
There are who fence them in with many thorns
Of giggling shyness ; when your finger 's pressed
You find you 've scrambled for a foolish thing.
Not worth your gilly wearing when it 's worn
Not such is she ; she has no storm of words.

Pelting like hail-drops till you hide your face ;
No bread-and-butter sentiment has she
For a fourth cup of gossip round the urn—
But she is outward cold and calm of eye,
Pale-browed, low-voiced, and round her as she moves
There is an atmosphere of gracefulness,
Inseparable as fragrance from the rose,
Or gentle chimings from a running water.
Once and again most heedlessly you gaze
On the white marble of her lineaments,
And on her half-proud eye, and turn away ;
Once and again you see the many shafts
Of vulgar flattery or of common saws,
Slip on the polished ice of her disdain—
And ask yourself, perhaps, " Has she a heart ? "
But a few months, and now through all your dreams
There is a still sweet face, a low sweet voice,
An eye, deep-calm as some rock-cinctured bay,
A gentle form, a footstep that you know,
Which makes strange tunes go moving through your brain.

And there are times when silent actions speak
Of quiet principle ; as bells of foam
Clustered in silence where the current works,
Show the deep meaning of the under-tide.
And there are times when strongly-fixed reserve
Betrays some casual lesson, learned in ways
Too high and holy for a lightsome strain.
And there are times when something passes o'er
The brow of snow, a flash of rosy light ;
Win, if you can, that alabaster vase,
There is a lamp of precious oil within !
Others more startling and more beautiful,
None half so gentle, so expansive none ;
Others more rich in gew-gaw words of course,
None half so dear in womanly reserve ;
Not cold, but pure ; not proud, but taught to love
That the heart's treasure is a holy thing ;
Not loving many, not of many loved,
Yet loving well, and loved beyond compare ;
A light too gentle, save for purged eye
Of some young poet lapped in dreams divine ;
A flower too delicate for vulgar scent,
Leading a purer life within its sheath,
Fed without noise, on silver drops of heaven !

Holloway's Ointment.—Sores, Wounds, Ulcerations, and other diseases affecting the skin, are capable of speedy amendment by this cooling and healing ointment, which has called forth the loudest praise from persons who had suffered for years from bad legs, bad breasts, piles, abscesses, and chronic ulcers. None but those who have experienced the soothing effect of it can form an idea of the comfort it bestows by restraining inflammation and allaying pain. Whenever Holloway's Ointment has been once used it has established its own worth, and again been eagerly sought for as the easiest and safest remedy for all such complaints. In neuralgia, rheumatism and gout, the same application, properly used, gives wonderful relief.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

CALIFORNIA has passed the Anti-Chinese Bill providing for the issue of certificates of residence to the Chinese now settled in the State and for the exclusion of all others. For this great national crime of the Golden State, the author of the Heathen Chinese is not a little responsible.

WE learn from the last Overland Mail that

"The official gazette Iran, published at Teheran, announces that Muza Mahom Khan, late Ambassador in London, is deprived of his titles, honours, and rank."

Such is the insecurity of office under a personal despotism!

MOHSIN Khan, the Persian Ambassador, who is the doyen of the diplomatic body at Constantinople, has tendered his resignation, which has been accepted by the Shah. We wonder if this Khan's step is connected with that Khan's disgrace.

RECENTLY, there was a Greek dinner in the city of New York. Here is a description:

"The table was covered with cloth of silver, in the centre of which was a marble basin lined with sea shells and aquatic plants, and with little goldfish swimming about round a tiny fountain that flashed in the centre. The marble basin was garlanded with smilax and roses. The decorations were carried out entirely in pink and silver. Each of the twenty guests found by his plate, or hers, a wreath of brown ivy leaves, tied with a cluster of pink roses. The walls of the dining room were completely hidden by strands of smilax, which fell from the cornices and met the leaves of tall palms placed round the wainscot. From the ceiling over the table hung strands of smilax tied with pink roses. The ladies all wore Greek dresses, and the strains of the lyre and mandolin were heard during the dinner."

And what for the eating? Where are the creature comforts? There are decorations in plenty for the dining room, where is the dinner? Smilax and rose do not butter parsnips, any more than soft words. As for the goldfish swimming in the marble basin, three dozen of these will scarcely make a mouthful of the Whiteman either side the water.

PERTINENT to the present Anglo-Indian outcry against "Babu English," a correspondent of the Mirror quotes "a few sentences from some printed Circulars, issued by an eminent Civilian, within the last few months," to wit,

(1) "There is a considerable margin for households, requiring more than one page a Schedule for its enumeration."

(2) "He should not only see that every house is numbered, but that their serial order is the most convenient for the enumerator."

(3) "Supervisors have been directed to report if any wedding parties are likely to come to or leave, any village in his circle on the night of the Census day."

(4) "A reader as well as an abstracter is necessary for it."

The writer asks, "What name would Messrs. Rowe and Webb give to the English of this Civilian?" Why, Civilian English, of course. Let the Census Commissioner look to it.

TO draw out others, Mr. Eardley Norton subscribed Rs. 500 for a memorial to the late Mr. Bradlaugh. But as the other subscriptions would not exceed Rs. 180, he would none of it. He has withdrawn his offer, saying, "I decline to continue a connection with a movement so ridiculous," with expressions of contempt for native good will and patriotism. The Knight Memorial Fund is much in the same condition. Up to date, it is, we believe, no more than Rs. 2,000.

THE progress of female education in Bombay has caused to be felt the want of a suitable place for female resort, whether for instruction or amusement. And according to the characteristic of Primum in Indis, no sooner is the want felt than there is some one to supply it. We learn with great pleasure that Mr. Muncherjee M. Bhowmaji is engaged on the preliminaries for building a Hall for the use of the gentler sex by way of a memorial of his lamented young sister.

HERE is a centenarian and no mistake! Mr. Jehangir Chinai of Poona has just died at the ripe old age of 102. Mr. Chinai's has not been a very eventful life; but he has done something in his day which deserves to be chronicled in a permanent form.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Spectator tells a good story. A short time ago a letter was received at Lincoln by post addressed "à sa Grandeur Monseigneur l'Eveque de Lincoln." The Lincoln Post Office had not evidently passed in French and returned the letter to the London Office with the remark "Cannot be found in Lincoln." The General Post Office sent the letter back to Lincoln with the inscription, "This is for the Bishop of Lincoln." Luckily, the Post officers of Lincoln were all true-born Britons, or else the incident would have formed another instance of Babu ineptitude.

THE Calcutta University has this year passed in the Entrance Examination 330 students in the 1st, 958 in the second and 863 in the third division, or a total of only 2,151. It is a poor result compared with past years. In the Preliminary Scientific L.M.S., we find 25 names: in the First L.M.S., 7; and in the Second L.M.S., 13.

As the result of the Examination of February last, the Board of Examiners have let loose on the community no less than 262 Mooktears.

THE yearly examination of candidates for the fourth grade of Accountants, Public Works Department, will begin at the Civil Engineering College, Seebpore, on Monday, the 1st June 1891.

As a memento of the visit of the Lieutenant-Governor to the Purulia Municipality last year, Raja Nilmoni Sing Deo, Zemindar of Pachet, has made a gift of Rs. 5,000 to the municipality to be expended in the improvement of the water supply of the town. We are glad to see the old Chief still in the land of the living. He is a true Raja and no mistake. It is a pity European officials fail to appreciate and refuse to respect those who are not ready to demean themselves before them.

THE Gazette of India, of April 4, announces the temporary appointment of Brigadier-General H. Collett, C.B., Commanding the Assam District, as officiating Chief Commissioner of Assam in addition to his military duties.

MR. Crawford of Bombay fame is not idle at home. Having lost character, he feels himself under no obligation to preserve decency. His corruption was left by the kindness of his judges involved in some friendly doubt. That cloud he is resolved to scatter away. He will throw the responsibility of his impecuniosity and consequent lapse to his superiors and circumstances. He is said to have prepared a claim for a large sum of money, spent in the reception of the Duke of Edinburgh in 1870 for the entertainment and flower-show in the Victoria Gardens.

MR. Henry Tate, the sugar refinery man, offered his collection of modern pictures valued at £75,000 for an "English Luxembourg." He has again come forward with £80,000 for the building—an Art Gallery at South Kensington.

THE new Law Member, Sir Alexander Miller, has arrived at Simla and taken up his duties.

A EUROPEAN Governess in a family at Simla turned Mahomedan adopting native dress, eloped with a native tailor to Koorkee and has settled in the Chamai Daiwaza in Meerut.

THE Lord Bishop of Calcutta and Metropolitan in India and the Island of Ceylon has gone on leave, and the Ven'ble Francis Rodon Michell, Archdeacon of the Diocese of Calcutta and Bishop's Commissary, has taken over charge of the Diocese.

THE Government of India have ruled that "From and after the 1st day of January, 1894, all vessels carrying emigrants to the Colonies must be furnished with separate tanks not exceeding in capacity 5,000 gallons each, and no compartment which forms part of the hull of the vessel will be recognized as a receptacle for the storage of water for the use of emigrants."

In the meantime, the existing practice of allowing water to be stored under certain conditions in after-compartments of the vessels, will be allowed, provided such compartments are so fitted that they can be properly examined by the Marine Surveyor and are certified to be water-tight.

SOME interesting reminiscences of the late Duke of Bedford have been published. He was thought to be a screw, and people are now surprised to be told that he spent two millions in improvements on his property without raising rents. He had been one of the poorest gentlemen in England and became one of the richest. He used to boast having lived upon all incomes, from £200 to £2,00,000 a year, and what is better "he could do so again." A most witty man, he was a delightful companion. Notwithstanding that he was his own manager, he did not talk shop, we take it.

THE case of Khetter Chunder Mitter against the Police for illegal arrest, assault, &c., &c., and that against him by the Revd. K. S. Macdonald for trespass into and disturbance at the General Assembly's Institution, arising out of the Scoble Consent law, were disposed of by the Northern Division Magistrate on Thursday. He dismissed the case against the Police, whereupon the case against the Gabardhan Baboo was withdrawn by the Revd. gentleman. The Magistrate was of opinion that if the complaining Babu had not committed trespass, the action of the police, in placing their hands on him, amounted to wrongful restraint and assault. But the question was whether complainant had committed a trespass or not. There was no evidence to prove that he went to the meeting with the fixed intention of annoying or assaulting any body. The conduct of complainant however in interrupting the lecturer Babu Kally Churn Banerjee, after he had been called to order by the Chairman Sir Andrew Scoble, amounted to trespass, as he caused annoyance to all the decent people present. Finally the police had a right to arrest complainant, on the authority of Mr. Macdonald who held possession of the hall.

THE prosecution by and against the Brahmos has been dropped. The contending parties have expressed regret to each other and are friends again.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

A NOTIFICATION in the Calcutta Gazette of the week cancels the notification under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1890, of the 6th January 1891. The curious reader must refer to the Gazette of January itself to know what it means. This announcement is, however, followed by another notification extending the provisions of the Act (XI of 1890), except section 6, sub-section 1, and section 7, with effect from the 8th day of April 1891, to the Town and the Suburbs of Calcutta as defined respectively by section 3 of Act IV. (B.C.) of 1866, and by the notifications published under section 1 of Act II. (B.C.) of 1866. We must repeat, it would have been more useful if the notifications said what they are intended to mean.

THE temple of Jugannath at Pooree is in urgent need of repairs. The local municipality has served a notice on the Rani of Pooree as the superintending authority of the temple, threatening to close the damaged portion against the public. That is a threat to the entire Hindu world. Realizing the situation, Babu Hari Bullub Bose, Government Pleader, Cuttack, held a meeting at his house to devise measures to avert the calamity. There were present Rai Bahadar Nundkishore Dass, Assistant Superintendent, Tributary Mehals; Babus M. L. Dass, M.A., B.L., Vakil, High Court, practising at Cuttack; Bollorain Mullick, B.L., Sub-Judge; Lal Behari Ghose, B.L., Vakil, Cuttack and Janaki Nath Bose, M.A., B.L., Vakil, Cuttack. They decided, "in all humility" to "urge upon the Hindu community the absolute necessity of maintaining such an institution, which as a relic of Hindu civilization, of Hindu art, of Hindu civility, is simply unrivalled." It was resolved, therefore, to call a public meeting of the Hindu inhabitants of the Province of Orissa and to appeal to the Hindu public for funds and to appoint a committee to receive subscriptions and to commence the repairs as soon as possible.

THE Indian Spectator records the death in England of General Macdonald, retired officer of the Madras Education Department. He was Inspector of Schools and acted as Director of Public Instruction. He delivered an excellent University address. He was an upright man, we are told. That he was a friend of the people we can readily believe. How in an old settled Province a son of Mars came to poke his nose into the business of Minerva, we could never understand. Captain Holroyd is the only other interloper, but then that is in a frontier Province where clergymen may mount up the pulpit armed.

SURAT has lost one of its respected citizens. Rao Bahadar Juggivandas Khusaldas was rather a remarkable man. He began as a common mohoror or karkoon and ended as Hazur Deputy Collector and Rao Bahadar. And all this success was attained by hard work without sacrifice of honesty. His integrity was above suspicion, and all parties reposed perfect confidence in the impartiality of his decisions. They who try to be just without fear or favour, without love or hate, in absolute oblivion of selfish regards,—such men alone know how hard is the struggle—such alone truly appreciate the nobleness of such a character as the deceased. What wonder, he was held in respect by both Government and the people. In politics and social matters, Khusaldas was a liberal conservative.

A MORE earnest citizen or more persistent politician does not exist among the English-speaking dons—the professoriate we mean—than Mr. Goldwin Smith. He is nothing if not political. He is political even as a professor. In the chair of History he is a pamphleteer rather than a historian. He certainly treats of the Past with special reference to the Present. Whether he stays at home or strays abroad, he plunges heart and soul into the question of the hour that divides his neighbours, not without casting back furtive glances at the scarcely cast off domicile in the distance. If he is by education and training—by enlightenment that is—a citizen of Greater Britain, and by lot a Canadian, he is withal a thorough Englishman. Though a Liberal of Liberals, he is an out and out Unionist, and, of course, a fierce anti-Gladstonian. Ever ready for controversy, he is a formidable warrior carrying heavy armamentaria but using them with singular nimbleness and dexterity. He has a tranchant incisive pen which he uses not only against all comers but also against all bearing anything approaching an inimical standard. Hence he is looked upon as a sort of Ishmael, though few care to provoke him. He never lost an opportunity for a thrust against Lord Beaconsfield. Of late years, he has been a thorn in the side of his former chief, Mr. Gladstone. It is time enough for another adventure. And now the turn comes of the head of the Ministry whose Irish policy he has so valiantly supported.

By the papers received by last mail, we find that Mr. Goldwin Smith has in propria persona attacked the Marquis of Salisbury in the Toronto Mail. He cannot pardon the Marquis for telegraphing his Lordship's congratulations to Sir John Macdonald on the latter's late success in the Canadian elections. According to Mr. Smith, the English Premier had no business to go out of his way to express his delight at the retention of the Macdonald ministry. It was a departure from that attitude of neutrality in Colonial politics which was proper to the Government at Home. This seems over-refining. It is a matter of individual judgment and taste. Mr. Smith contends that the Marquis of Salisbury by his action identifies himself with the Canadian Conservatives. And no harm, to our mind, if so. If he does not exactly identify himself, he certainly sympathizes with them. And no wiring was necessary to tell the world on which side his sympathies lay. Was the formal disclosure—the complimentary avowal—such a sin? It could not possibly prejudice any party. As to the question of right, it ought to be remembered that the British Premier simply accepted with courtesy Canada's own choice.

THE British Consul at Bogota has made a valuable contribution to the Leprosy Question, in the shape of a report on the treatment of it by the state to which he is accredited. This is his description of Agua di Dios, the leper village in Colombia:—"Situated at about fourteen hundred feet above the sea level, with a dry sandy soil, and a temperature of 82 to 85 deg. Fahrenheit, this spot has been chosen for the lazaretto by the Government on account of its ancient reputation for the cure of leprosy. Some 520 sufferers from this terrible visitation dwell here and form about one third of the population; but the most remarkable fact regarding the settlement is that lepers and healthy persons are described as living on terms of perfect intimacy, there being no specific leper quarter, though every house in the village stands apart in a garden." According to that, cities of magnificent distances, like Madras and Allahabad and indeed almost all White Towns in India, have no reason to be in the least anxious. The report is even more specific. The Consul states that "there is no case on record of the disease having been contracted here by contagion. Even where lepers have married healthy persons, the husband or wife has never been known to take it from the other. On the other hand, the fact is admitted that children born of such unions are generally afflicted." This evidence goes to show that the disease cannot spread by the intercourse of lepers of either sex within themselves. It is transmissible by sexual intercourse only, and that to the offspring.

ADMIRAL Hornby is hors de combat, and if tomorrow England is invaded, his country will not receive the benefit of the services of its greatest sailor. Not in fight, however, has he been disabled, but in freak—an old man's youthful freak! a general officer's subalternish dissipation. He met with a carriage accident, we were told. But that does not sufficiently describe the enormity of his offence rather than misfortune. He fell from a dog-cart. But he had no business to fall from a dog-cart. No use to tell us that the dog-cart is an uncertain, unreliable vehicle. All the more reason for his avoiding that disreputable trap—that rowdy apparatus. He had no business with a dog-cart. A gentleman might ride, or he must use a respectable conveyance—not a canine or feline trap. He might just as well go to town in a bullock hackery or a prisoner's van with "V. R." inscribed! A man ought to lose caste for such low tastes. His life ought to be refused by the Assurance companies. If it is worth while to live, this doggy piece of vehicled furniture ought to be interdicted instantly. Our view is of course scorned by the recklessness of the age, but a succession of mishaps may yet bring the generation back to reason. All are not yet gone mad, and we rejoice to notice the following wise paragraph in the Army and Navy Gazette :—

"How many people—young, middle-aged, and old—have been killed or maimed by their trust in the deadly dog-cart? A young fellow may escape the consequences of a pitch out on his head from a stumble, a chuck-out from a collision, or a smash from a runaway; but if any one who sets a value on life, bones, or sound skin, mounts the trap when he has passed 40, he must be prepared for 'accidents.' Here we have those who know of what use and importance Admiral Hornby may be to Queen and country, in the utmost anxiety on account of the injuries he received the other day, which were mainly due to the nature of the vehicle he was in. There is nothing like your quadrige for safety, and why so sensible and prudent a man took to the dog-cart we cannot conceive and very much regret."

Just so. But such is the infatuation of the times that—great Judges may be seen from time to time galloping through the Maidan perched on the precarious throne of a dog-cart.

THERE seems to be a prodigious appetite in the European, above all the British, soul, for "gossip." This is proved by the avidity with which the literature of anecdote is consumed. The most trumpery records of the garrulity of age find ready purchasers. Since the publication of old Crabbe Robinson's posthumous Diary, reminiscences of lawyers, whether briefless or briefful, tolerably seasoned with bad bar jokes, sell well. Thus the success of Sergeant Ballantine was as great in literature as at the Old Bailey. Who shall say that it was as deserved? His book was downright trash. Yet it ran through edition after edition. Mr. Montagu Williams, the eminent Queen's Counsel, has just come out in the same line with his Leaves of a Life. From some extracts we have seen, it seems to be a rather more honest effort at book-making than those of the anecdotalists of his profession. There is something like a literary texture at least in his publication.

To Indian readers, on this side in especial, the most interesting part of the book is the glimpses afforded in it of Sergeant Ballantine, the white elephant imported from England for the defence of the Gackwar Mulhar Rao, as well of Mr. Douglas Straight, now an honoured Judge of the Allahabad High Court and a brilliant member of European society in India, then a barrister in England who enlivened his Circuit with his animated conversation. Mr. Straight had been a candidate for parliamentary honours. He had wooed his free and independent constituency and had won. It was not without a hard struggle that he had succeeded in that difficult courtship. Nor did his anxieties cease with his election. His failed rival petitioned against him, and he had to undergo the annoyances and anxieties of a judicial inquiry whether he should be unseated for bribery. Mr. Williams was his friend and counsel and has given a graphic account of it. We will here introduce the best portions.

"Considerable amusement was caused while evidence was being given as to the 'Dun Cow' supper. In cross-examination by Mr.

Giffard, a witness was asked whether the company had drunk the health of Mr. Straight. A reply having been given in the affirmative, the further question was put to him as to whether the health of the Queen had not also been drunk. The witness said that he could not remember, and upon being pressed as to whether the 'Church and State' had not been drunk he replied that he did not know what was meant by the question. Upon this the Sergeant observed: 'You are a consistent Conservative;' at which the occupants of the public gallery again laughed."

Mr. Sergeant Ballantine was the leading counsel on the opposite side. Although a friend of Mr. Straights, he prosecuted the inquiry with great energy, without sparing his brother-barrister in the least. These licensed libellers, confounders of the simple and insulters of all, have such a habit of imputing baseness to the most honourable, and Ballantine in his blandest manner figured Straight so crooked that the good gentleman became furious.

"We found it almost impossible, during Ballantine's address, to keep the sitting Member quiet. From his seat underneath the Counsel he kept tuning round to me and vowing the most dreadful vengeance against Ballantine, observing that he certainly had not expected this from the Sergeant who had been his father's oldest friend. He, of course, also indulged in the usual threat that he would never speak to Ballantine as long as he lived. Altogether Giffard and I had the greatest difficulty in suppressing this hot-headed young gentleman."

We hope the gentleman, no longer a hot-headed, youngman, in remembrance of his own wrong, never permits the bullying by professional gladiators which is the great blot in European judicature.

To finish the story :—

"The Sergeant ended his reply at about one o'clock. The good-natured old Judge, looking at the sitting Member with a twinkle in his eye, said that, as he did not wish anybody to pass a sleepless night, he would not adjourn the case until the following morning, but would give his decision at four o'clock that afternoon."

"The intervening hours were very anxious ones for me, for I felt as much interest in the issue as though I had been personally concerned. At four o'clock the Court reassembled, and from the good-tempered expression on Baron Channell's face, as he took his seat upon the Bench, I felt convinced that all was well. His Lordship summed up with considerable force, and in an exhaustive way. Having disposed of most of the allegations, he proceeded: 'And now we come to the 'Dun Cow' supper.' A kind of cold shiver ran through us all, for this was the rock on which we feared the vessel might split. However, after giving a strange ruling of his own as to what constituted an agent, he observed, with regard to the supper itself, that though he did not think it sufficient to unseat the respondent, it would undoubtedly have been far better had it never taken place. In the end he found, firstly, that Mr. Straight was duly elected; secondly, that there was no reason to believe that at the last election any considerable bribery or corruption took place; and, thirdly, that the petitioners should bear the costs."

The judgment was received by the spectators with a shout of joy. The Straight party immediately celebrated their triumph at the nearest hotel in a great eating and drinking.

THE Veddas of Ceylon have for a long time attracted the notice of intelligent travellers. The Prince of Wales was given the opportunity of an acquaintance with this primitive people. The other day, M. Deschamps read an interesting paper on them before the Geographical Society of Paris. The following summary of it is given :—

"The Veddas ('hunters') of Ceylon, who are said to be descended from the Yakkas ('demons') of Ceylon, the original inhabitants of the island, live in a belt of forest on the eastern border of the Central Provinces, but as a distinct race they are now rapidly disappearing. They dwell in villages of huts made from branches and bark, but in the rainy season some take shelter in caves. Their weapons are the bow and hatchet, and they never speak unless it is absolutely necessary. They do not know how to laugh. Their language is meagre and their manner of speaking brusque. Although surrounded by polygamous and polyandrous peoples, they remain monogamists, and attach great importance to the baptism of their children. They have no chief or social system, and their religion is a belief in demons, with which the forest is supposed to be filled. A Vedda betrays no emotion; anger astonishes and laughter exasperates him. His favourite recreation is dancing. The villagers meet to dance the evil spirit away from a sick person. Doctors and medicines they have none. The men are small, but strongly if badly made. Their hair is coarse and black, their eyes fierce and bright, their brows straight and wide, their noses broad. The colour of their skin is a maroon tint, the women are small and unattractive."

In fact, the Veddas are

A stoic of the woods—a man without a tear.

Herem, however, he is not singular. In all ages and in all parts of the world many savage tribes have been distinguished for intrepidity. To us Hindus, the Vedda is specially interesting as the Rakshas of Valmiki's muse. It is highly probable that the Ramayana, like most of the national epics of the world, has a historic foundation. The geography of the Poem is accurate, and now the ethnography is cleared up. What were Yakkhas in the island were Rakshases on the Continent. We even suspect that at one time in India Yakkha and Rakshas were convertible terms. There is no inherent difference in Sanskrit literature between the two. Ravana was a great conquering chief of the Ceylon aborigines—the Veddās—possibly after their conversion to Buddhism.

AN important Indian has passed away in Raja Sir T. Madhav Row. Last Saturday, he sank under the attack of paralysis which had laid him down. He struggled for a time but finally succumbed. For some time he had retired from active life. He was a man of rare good fortune; he had a career for his abilities. Gifted with statecraft, it was given him to administer three important native states—Travancore, Indore and Baroda. If he was not exceptionally brilliant, he did his duties to the satisfaction of the Paramount Power. In his retirement, he was not idle. He could not bear to be forgotten. Accordingly, he had his say on every important public question, and, in the absence of any such, on topics of his own starting or things in general. At first he was content to be brief unto aphoristic, but with advancing age and its infirmities he lapsed into the prolix and verbose. At length the pen dropped. He had interested himself in the National Congress only to find out his mistake. He had the courage to secede publicly, and consequently lost much of his popularity with the patriots of the day. He gave no less offence to the reformers, headed by his own kinsman Raghunath Rao Bahadoor, by his pronounced orthodoxy towards the end of his life. He was an accomplished man fond of letters and science, and wielded a terse and powerful pen. Take him all in all, he was one of our greatest men. He leaves a large family but well provided for. His eldest son is Chief Secretary to the Mysore Government, the second is a Deputy Collector in Madura. The third and the youngest attended on him, ministering to his comfort. He leaves besides three daughters and a number of grand-and greatgrand children.

MR. Inglis, Officiating Magistrate of the 24 Pergunnahs, has, we hear, submitted to the Commissioner of the Division an extraordinary report on the disputed identity of the nominated Municipal Commissionership in the Rajpur Municipality. He says that he has ascertained from his predecessor Mr. Bolton, and Babu Bankim Chunder Chatterjee, Deputy Magistrate, that the object of the Government appointment is the Agra man and not his namesake on the spot. Surely, if this be true, the very sanity of the district staff in going beyond the limits of their own Province into the territory of another Local Government, in quest of a Municipal member, may well be called in question. Indeed, what with popular factions, and what with official vagaries of this kind, Local Self-Government cannot have a pleasant outlook. We wonder if the designation and residence of the nominee are not to be found in the records of any of the three offices concerned in making the appointment.

UNDER News and Our Comments, we have given from the Calcutta Gazette some of the results of the examinations of the Calcutta University. Today's Gazette of India publishes more results. In all, 174 candidates have succeeded in the B. A. Examination, Honors in the same examination have been obtained by 20 in English in the Second Division, none passing in the First. In Persian there are 2 in the First and 2 in the Second. In History 2 in the First and 1 in the Second. In Physics and Chemistry 1 in the First and 16 in the Second. In Mathematics, none in the First and 7 in the Second. In Sanskrit 2 in the First and 17 in the Second. In Philosophy only 8 in the Second Division.

The results of the First Examination in Arts are—31 in the First Division, 188 in the Second and 542 in the Third.

THE Indian Planter's Gazette boasts a Home Correspondent who, in his turn, is evidently conscious of his eminence. He is a gentleman of the genus "exquisite," indulging in tastes far above the common. He barely condescends to write English for friendship—fortified by a cheque. All the same, he is good John the Bull and no mistake. He detests foreigners, and Continental music he can not tolerate—except at fancy prices. He announces with glee the new crusade against the street Bohemians who lend picturesqueness and imperial importance to London. His ideal of music may be of the most exalted, but we of the town of the Tom-Tom and the Chhi Chhi Band cannot be expected to appreciate the sublimity that dwells in his soul. He writes:—

"Mr. Jacoby, the energetic and honourable member for Mid-Derby, is on the sloop. He has fixed his sun-defying eye on the 'nasty old organ-grinder.' He has moved for a return to show that the itinerant Italian enjoys more privileges in London than in any other capital of this terraqueous globe. He thinks the foreign noise-merchant ought to be subject to local option. Like Mr. Jacoby, I detest the street musician. The 'Queen of My Heart' doth murder my morning sleep, and the 'Mikado' waltzes round the square with the tail end of my sentences, as I sit at my industrious desk, my oak spotted, and the knocker tied, as Macaulay said, Montgomery's, or was it Rogers'?—was with a white kid glove all for your sake. My Pegasus was once a trooper's mount, I think, in some ante-natal existence. Nothing makes my steed so restive as En Revenant de la Revue. But I would not abolish the organ-grinder quand même. Every time I pass through Drury Lane, or any squalid quarter of this London, and see the whole of the otherwise joyless population turning out into the streets, men, women, and little children, and moving in rhythmic motion as, shall we say? in the Pyrrhic dances of old, alley, court, or street, from end to end, in motion, the dismality of life rocked to sleep in a hundred weary brains by the cradling movement, I make a new resolve not to curse the strolling music men. Nor would I even confine them to the quartier in which they are welcome. They will leave Belgravia at any time, only too willingly, for a few coppers. They are always lazy enough to prefer to be paid to go rather than paid to remain and play. It is only right and just that they should thus levy tribute on the rich for the amusement of the poor. But I would venture on a suggestion to my good friend, the enemy with the hurdy-gurdy. When he comes my way let him knock at the door and politely state that he is about to play for twenty minutes just outside the house or receive six pence. I will always pay the forfeit. The harmony of silence will reign in my neighbourhood, and the benefactor of Drury Lane and kindred slums may reserve all the vigour of his muscles—or lungs—for his eager but poorer patrons."

How modestly this "gentleman of the press" identifies himself with the wealthy and makes himself out one of the élite of Belgravia! It is easy to be rich with the pen, however: it is different to be free with the purse. We are entitled to doubt, therefore, whether the poor Italian, even if he succeeded in mollifying this imperial Briton of the quill with his abject submission, would receive the proffered—we mean the advertised in India—six pence.

SERIOUS complications are apprehended in the North-Western Frontier—in the Miranzai country. There were rumours that the Mamazai, Akhel, Alishezaï and Akhel, numbering in all about 12,000 fighting men, were combining to prevent the making of the post on the Samana, and had held a jirga and sworn to use every means in their power to stop the work. It is unfortunate there are indications to justify the rumours. News was received on the night of the 4th April at Kohat that the working parties on the Samana Range had been attacked and that the 29th Punjab Infantry and a wing of the 3rd Sikhs, who kept on firing from 3 P.M. till dusk, had nine men killed and seven missing. A later telegram reported such an attack on the working parties all along the line from Islat to Gulistan.

THE MANIPUR MASSACRE.

News from Manipur is of an extremely painful character. Our worst fears have been realised, and a sad fate has overtaken Mr. Quinton and his party. The delay in the receipt of this news had indeed somewhat prepared the public mind for the worst, and so far it has broken the force of the shock which would otherwise be more stunning. But the event is appalling in all conscience, and has scarcely had a parallel in the past. The victims are Mr. Quinton, Colonel Skene, Mr. Grimwood, Mr. Cossins, Lieutenant Simpson and Mr. Melville. Of course, Brackenbury had met a gallant death before.

The only relieving feature of the catastrophe is the news telegraphed by the Head Clerk of the Political Agency that they died in action. There is no knowing, however, how far this version may be relied upon. On the one hand, it is the report of an eyewitness and of a man evidently in a better position to give accurate information than the refugees and spies who bring the horrible story of the prisoners being treacherously murdered by the order of the Senapati. Again, Mr. Grimwood, who is generally and not unnaturally believed to have had great influence with the Senapati, being one of the party, it would seem improbable that even his presence should fail to avert such a catastrophe. On the other hand, there are circumstantial accounts given by the Gurkha refugees of the mutilation to which the prisoners are alleged to have been subjected before they were beheaded. Then there is the Regent's own account of the Manipuris having become uncontrollable at some alleged injury to their temples. The Regent's letter, however, does not refer to any armistice or flag of truce—a significant, not to say suspicious omission. For ourselves, we do not pin our faith on the account of either the Agency Baboo or that of the Regent. The former is not a free agent, and will probably never be one in regard to Manipur politics, hoping as he does to serve in that state, until at any rate the Regent is disposed of. The latter is directly interested in deceiving. The Regent is on his trial—a trial the issue whereof may involve not his throne only but his very life also. The Manipuris are not an overscrupulous people. They are just civilised enough to have lost the truth for which the aboriginal barbarians of India are famous. In the situation in which the Regent is placed, he is not likely to stick at anything. In throwing the responsibility of the massacre on his people, he has, we are afraid, been both pusillanimous as well as false, without doing himself any good. Certainly, without good evidence, we are not prepared to believe that his people were out of hand. Their loyalty to their Chiefs and to their Blood Royal, we know. The Czar is not more profoundly venerated nor more implicitly obeyed by the Don Cossack than is their Raja or Chief of the Raj family by the Manipuri and the Manipuri Nagas or Lushais. They would lay their heads in cool blood if the Raja or Chief commanded the sacrifice even in freak. Such is the theory of duty in all the old frontier kingdoms. And such is still a good deal the practice. The truth is, the Raja is deemed a god incarnate and the members of his family are supposed to enjoy the divine afflatus. They all are privileged to make Brahmans of the hill savages who apply for such conversion. The highest Brahmans among them are those who become disciples of the Raja and are invested with the dhoti by him. Indeed, the Raja as a living divinity whose power is visible, is really held in greater veneration and awe than the unseen gods who are at best represented by rude stocks and stones. Under the circumstance, the idea of the Manipuris going out of hand seems to us ridiculous. Nor was there any cause for such a strange departure. The desecration of temple is a frivolous pretext. We know what sort of temples and gods they have and how they regard them. And such as they are, the British and their sepoy were the last persons in the world to treat them with wantonness. It is more likely that the prisoners were sacrificed in an ebullition of savage triumph and recklessness of the Senapati, the real master of the situation. We suspect he was exasperated chiefly with the Political Agent whom he had regarded as his friend. After the friend had helped him in packing the Maharaja off to British India, he was not prepared to find him a party to his destruction. But enough of this painful suggestion, which, in the absence of true information, is a mere speculation. Whatever, however, the exact truth about the manner of the sad death of the English captives, their loss is a heavy calamity, and heavily the Manipuris shall pay for it.

The author of the whole evil, Koirang or the Senapati, has already paid for his savagery with his life. The brightest episode in this melancholy business is the chivalrous conduct of Lieutenant Grant. Directly the news of the precarious situation of affairs at Manipur reached Mandalay, he at once obtained permission of General Stewart to make a rush with a small force of less than 100 Rifles to the relief of the English captives. A message was soon after sent to countermand his expedition, as it was reported at Shillong that the Manipuris were too strong in numbers for a small party like Grant's to make any impression on them. The messenger, however, failed to overtake him, and the dashing young officer, at the head of his forlorn hope, reached Thobal, within 10 miles of Manipur, fighting the whole way. Here he occupied a mud fort which the Manipuris attacked in the night. The fighting lasted for three hours, till the Manipuris, failing to take the fort, retreated, losing the Senapati and two Generals, killed together with ten of their soldiers. Lieutenant Grant's position, however, soon became serious from want of ammunition, but he was happily soon relieved by Captain Presgrave, who pressed forward from Langaton. There is another report, however, of the Maharaja himself having killed the Senapati for his dastardly assassination of the English captives. This is another point of uncertainty about which one must be careful how he forms an opinion. The lenity which has been shown to the other English prisoners would, however, lend some support to the friendly attitude claimed by the Maharaja. The following captives have been released:—

42nd Regiment, 13 Sepoys and 14 followers; 43rd Gurkhas, 15 Sepoys and two followers; 44th Gurkhas, 21 Sepoys, five followers and nine syces; British Agency, 12 employés; the Chief Commissioner's establishment, 18 employés including the head clerk, Mr. H. D. Banerjee, and a signaller; Mr. Williams, of the Postal Department, and 32 followers, besides the Post Master, Babu A. Banerjee, and a signaller.

Baboo Russick Lal Kundu, Head Clerk, Political Agency, and Chandra Singh, Manipuri, Interpreter to the Agency, are detained to assist the Durbar in its English correspondence. They are safe.

THE VICEROY EN ROUTE FROM CALCUTTA TO SIMLA.

THE Viceroy's short stay at Allahabad was the occasion of some interesting social ceremonies, and we need hardly say His Excellency went through them in his usual cordial and thorough-going manner. The first was the unveiling in the Convocation Hall of the University of the portrait of Sir Alfred Lyall, the founder and first Chancellor of that institution. Lord Lansdowne was invited to perform the function on behalf of the subscribers to the portrait by the Raja of Bhinga, who took the opportunity to pay a brief but thoroughly warm tribute of praise to the varied eminent services of Sir Alfred, to which the foundation of the University was, as it were, a fitting crown. Raja Siva Prasad considered Sir Alfred Lyall's greatest service to the North-Western Provinces to be his recognition of the rights of Zemindars at a time when they were threatened with extinction. This act of benevolence alone, said he, ought to immortalise his name in these provinces. In responding to his call, the Viceroy made a highly appreciative speech. Sir Alfred began and ended his career in the North-Western Provinces, and although a considerable portion of his official life was spent outside the limits of these provinces, he might, said the Viceroy, fairly be counted as a North-Western Province's man from the "fact that at its commencement he gave nine years to them and at its end he rose to fill the place now occupied with such conspicuous success by His Honor the present Lieutenant-Governor." He gave the North-West a University, a Legislature and a Rent Law, while his public works and his interest in the development of the railway have since borne the happiest results. But Sir Alfred's distinction is by no means adequately measured by his success as an official. His claims rest on higher ground. He will be known to the world for achievements in scholarship even after his official career is forgotten. Lord Lansdowne paid a glowing compliment to his learning in the following words:—

"Of his brilliant and attractive personal qualities and attainments I hesitate to speak in the presence of those who know him so well. He was, above all things, a student, and a thorough student, from the day of his arrival in India until the day when he left it. Probably no Indian administrator has ever been at more pains to understand the country which he helped to govern. He was one of those who are not content with knowing the surface of human affairs, but who seek rather to search out the sources of events and the great principles which underlie them. His knowledge was consequently exceptional in its extent, and in its thoroughness, it gave him an exceptional insight into the life and character of the people of India and that sympathy with their feelings without which no Indian statesman can hope for success. To culture of this kind Sir Alfred Lyall added a remarkable literary ability which gave a charm to everything which proceeded from his pen. There can be little doubt that, had he preferred such pursuits to those of an official life, he would have risen to the highest rank amongst modern writers of the English language. It was once said of him, in reference to the conspicuous gallantry which he displayed upon a memorable occasion at the time of the Mutiny, that, had he chosen the profession of arms, he would have probably become a great soldier. It may certainly be said of him that had he chosen the profession of letters, he would, either as a writer of prose or verse, have made his mark in it."

In the afternoon His Excellency opened the water works. These are at last a fait accompli, after nearly a quarter of a century has elapsed since their first inception. As early as the year 1865 was the project first undertaken, but there were insuperable difficulties in the way, chief of which was the inadequacy of the resources of the Municipality. At last Sir Auckland Colvin, on assuming the reins of Government, threw himself into the scheme with all his heart. A loan was offered to the Municipality, the services of an excellent Engineer were lent, and a guarantee for the use of a large quantity of water obtained from the military authorities of the cantonment. With these advantages secured to the Municipal Committee by the Government, was combined another of no small importance. They were lucky to have, until of late, in Mr. Porter a Chairman of great tact and energy, whose intervention contributed in no small measure to the speedy realisation of the scheme. Lastly, they entrusted the work to a good firm of contractors, Messrs. Wilsh, Lovett and Company who have shown great promptitude in bringing it to a completion. The total cost of the water supply is nearly 16 lacs of rupees, the length of the pipes laid being 30 miles and the amount of supply available for daily distribution being two million gallons. The supply is taken from the Jumna instead of the Ganges, as originally intended, there being insuperable difficulties in utilising the latter stream from its wandering nature. The success of the scheme is now complete, and it must always be a noble monument of the energy and beneficence of the present Ruler of the Provinces.

The Viceroy left Allahabad on the following day for Philibit, where he opened the new section of the Rohilkhand and Kumaon Railway. The Viceroy's speech on this occasion was, as it were, a complement of his recent great speech at Chhatisgurh, and, taken together, they embody a complete presentment of the subject of main and feeder Railway lines. The peroration in which Lord Lansdowne paid a graceful compliment to the Engineer, was very happily conceived. His Lordship said:—

"Upon such an occasion the Chief Engineer of the line is the real hero of the hour. The Lieutenant Governor and the Viceroy may come in for an odd cheer, but the name which really brings down the house is invariably that of the Chief Engineer, and the hour is very properly his hour more than that of any other person concerned. He has fought his way for months, or more probably for years, through obstacles and obstructions of every kind, moral and material, before he has been allowed to break ground. He has probably had to scale the cliffs and precipices of Downing Street; to smooth the asperities of the Local Government, and to wade successfully through the quicksands of the Public Works Department. He is able to find, while he is pursuing his object, that just as some of our Indian rivers alter their course, and move out a few miles to the right or to the left when we are about to bridge them, so the Government of the day has changed its policy, leaving his bridge, so to speak, high and dry, and adopting an altogether new and unexpected course. When these difficulties have been overcome, the struggle with Nature begins, and the line has to be carried out, mile by mile, no matter what amount of physical obstacles are in the way, no matter how unhealthy the country or how disadvantageous the conditions under which the work is carried out. At last, when the battle has been fought and won, he comes forward to receive the thanks which are due to him, and no one can be surprised if they are cordially, nay enthusiastically, bestowed. Although Mr. Izat is not here to receive our congratulations, I trust that they will reach him, and that he will know that we have not forgotten him to-day. I will, therefore, gentlemen, in proposing the toast which I am now about to give you, ask you to drink Mr. Izat's health with it, and to wish him a very speedy and complete recovery from the unfortunate illness which has prevented him from joining us this morning. It remains for me now only to wish success to the new line and to the Rohilkhand and Kumaon Company in the enterprise which they have undertaken, and to join with the toast the name of Mr. Izat."

After such a candid acknowledgment and graphic description of the various causes which tend to retard the construction of a great and costly public work, no one need cavil at the delay which has attended the progress of the particular enterprise.

Lord Lansdowne has approved himself equally well as a doer and a sayer. He is not a dilettanti official consciously attitudinising and cracking mots and rounding off a measure with an epigram. He has no ostentation; he seems averse to public speaking; still when the occasion comes, he acquits himself with a success that would shame practised literary men. He has advanced his reputation during the late season in the plains.

THE AGE OF CONSENT

WITH NOTES BY DR. JOGENDRANATH BHATTACHARJEE.

SIR,—Though the bill has become law and the subject of our discussion has lost some of its interest in consequence, I hope you will not grudge me a little space just to enable me to answer Dr. Bhattacharjee's objections formulated in your issue of March 14.

I entirely dispute with Dr. Bhattacharjee's position that the Rikis do not encourage the begetting of more than one child. V.S. 106-107, Ch. IX, Manu, cited by the Dr., do not at all support his view (1). They relate to an entirely different subject from that

(1) The theory propounded by "Huan" has been already examined so fully that I do not see the utility of taking up the discussion again. This fresh oversight made by him proves beyond doubt that I cannot possibly hope to satisfy him, and, though I intend to lay challenge in this instance, I cannot very sincerely trust that the continuation of this controversy will lead to any useful result.

"Huan's" charges with me as to the interpretation I have put on V.S. 106-107, chapter IX, of Manu's Code. In these texts the great Lawgiver says that the first son is begotten as a matter of duty, and that the younger sons are begotten of lust only. These and other similar texts, too numerous to be cited, clearly show that the Shastris do not make it positively obligatory on their followers to beget too many children. The doctrine which gives such importance to the eldest son may not be agreeable to those who are the younger children of their parents. But the sages are so explicit on the point that there is no room whatever for maintaining the opposite view. If our Lawgivers had deemed it necessary to encourage the increasing of population, they would surely have laid down that there was great religious merit in begetting a large number of children. But there is not a single text of begetting children, and were never intended to bear the interpretation the Dr. has put on them. Manu was in search of a plausible reason to support his doctrine of primogeniture, and he was only too glad to pounce upon the one formulated in the utterances under consideration. The argument that since by the birth of the first son the father's debt to the pitribh (2) is discharged therefore that son is entitled to the entire property, need not necessarily discourage the begetting of more than one child. The Bible enjoins its followers to multiply, and yet it is in Christian countries that primogeniture flourishes and that from very early times too. (3) The reason why Manu favoured primogeniture appears from verse 108 following. He was anxious to secure that brothers should live in amity, peace and good-fellowship, for unity is strength. That Manu strongly encourages the begetting of as many children as possible, is clear from verse (4) 4, Ch. IX, where he lays down that the husband who fails to have intercourse with his wife during her ritu is blameworthy. Mark the word ritu. That shews that the legislator had an eye solely to the possibility of impregnation and not to the gratification of the wife.

We read in the Mahabharat that one son is no son even as one eye is no eye. Then again, every treatise on adoption advises the two-sonned man not to give in adoption.

I am going to quote a new verse from Manu in support of my position that the Rishis intended that marriage should be consummated at the very earliest opportunity. The verse is unmistakably express in its wording. It lays down that he who marries a girl who has begun to menstruate shall not be liable to pay any sulka to the girl's father, because the father, by failing to give his daughter in marriage before menstruation and thus preventing her from bearing children, forfeits his control (guardianship) over her. (Verse 93, Ch. IX.)

As for Medhatithi laying down that consummation of marriage is not proper on the first occurrence of a certain event within the first year after marriage, I think all that it is necessary for me to say is that he may very well be left out of consideration in discussing the rationality of the doctrine of the spiritual importance of sons and of the origin of the at least apparent injunction that marriage is to be consummated ordinarily on the first occurrence of a certain event. I may add that there is absolutely no foundation in the Shastras for Medhatithi's strange commentary on the point.

within the four corners of our Shasters which can be taken to support such a doctrine. On the contrary, it is positively laid down that, for spiritual purposes, one son is quite sufficient. There are some texts according to which it is desirable to have two sons. But neither the shloka of the Mahabharat referred to in "Hindu's" letter, nor any other text supports the position that our Shasters enjoin the begetting of as many sons as possible. It may be that in ancient times the population of the country was much smaller than it is now. But the solicitude evinced in our holy Codes of Law for providing for the maintenance of wives and children by the pater familias, clearly shows that the country was not in those times actually overflowing with milk and honey as we are apt to suppose. In fact, the data afforded by our legal literature amply justify the conclusion that the struggle for existence was at least as hard in ancient times as it is now. And if such was the case, then it must be admitted that the sages had very good reasons not to encourage the over-increasing of population. Our correspondent "Hindu" may say that, as an orthodox exegete, I have no right to pry into the motives and objects of our legislators. Whatever weight such an objection might have, it would, if put forward against my position, come with very bad grace from "Hindu" whose main contention is at best a conjecture of the very same kind.

(2) The reason given by Manu for the doctrine of primogeniture shows that, according to him, one son is quite sufficient for spiritual purposes, and that the begetting of too many sons is not enjoined. I never relied upon what Manu has said about the heirship of the eldest son, to prove my own position or to disprove that of "Hindu." I drew my conclusion from the reason of the law, and not from the law itself.

(3) The Bible positively enjoins its followers to multiply. But our Shasters do not contain any such injunction. On the contrary, it is expressly declared by our Rishis that one son is sufficient for spiritual purposes. In European countries, succession usually takes place by primogeniture. But their law on the subject is based on the Feudal System, and has nothing to do with the religious considerations on which Manu's recommendation of the claims of the eldest son is based.

(4) There are no doubt texts which enjoin that the husband must approach his wife at Ritu. But all the leading authorities of the several Schools agree in laying down that the injunction is not binding after the birth of one male child. The law is so laid down also in a text of the Kurma Puran cited with approval in the Udvaha Tutwa.

There is another thing in regard to Medhatithi's direction that may be pointed out with advantage. It is that even if Medhatithi were to be followed, marriage would in a great many cases have to be consummated with girls under 12. For example, a girl may be married at 10 and menstruate soon after, in which case marriage will require to be consummated soon after she is 11. I therefore fail to see how Medhatithi can be cited in support of the 12 years' rule. (5)

I had almost forgot to mention that I have been most unfairly charged by the learned Dr. with having begged the question at issue. I thought I was only quoting the learned Dr. himself when I said that the Rishis directed consummation of marriage ordinarily on the first occurrence of a certain event in the wife.

VOLUNTEERS IN INDIA.

GENERAL DEPARTMENT. MISCELLANEOUS---Cir. No. 4.

Calcutta, the 19th February 1891.

From W. Maude, Esq., Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal,

To the Secretary to the Board of Revenue, Miscellaneous Revenue Department (Commissioners have been informed direct); the Secretary to the Board of Revenue, Land Revenue Department (Commissioners have been informed direct); the Commissioners of Divisions; the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta; the Sanitary Commissioner, Bengal; the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, Bengal; the Inspector-General of Police, Lower Provinces; the Inspector-General of Jails, Lower Provinces; the Inspector-General of Registration, Lower Provinces; the Director of Public Instruction; the Port Officer, Calcutta; the Protector of Emigrants; the Superintendent of Emigration, Calcutta; the Embarkation Agent, Goalundo; the Conservator of Forests; the Meteorological Reporter, Bengal; the Accountant-General; and the Director of the Department of Land Records and Agriculture, Bengal.

SIR,—In forwarding the enclosed copy of a letter (No. 65B, dated the 7th January 1891, published in Reis & Rayyet of April 4, 1891,) from the Government of India, in the Military Department, and its enclosure, on the subject of increasing the number of Volunteers in India, I am directed to say that the Lieutenant Governor trusts that, in view of the great importance attached to the subject by the Government of India, you will do all you can to promote the Volunteer movement. Sir Charles Elliott freely admits that, while the Volunteers of Bengal are second to none in quality, they could be considerably increased in numbers, and is most anxious to secure a substantial addition to the force.

2. I am to request that you will be so good as to consider the subject, and to report in the month of July next, after suitable enquiry, what measures you consider advisable for the purpose.

GENERAL DEPARTMENT. MISCELLANEOUS---NO. 6.

Calcutta, the 26th March 1891.

From C. E. Buckland, Esq., Offg. Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal,

To the Secretary to the Board of Revenue, Land Revenue Department. Secretary to the Board of Revenue, Miscellaneous Revenue Department; Commissioners of Divisions; Commissioner of Police, Calcutta; Sanitary Commissioner, Bengal; Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, Bengal; Inspector-General of Police, Lower Provinces; Inspector-General of Jails, Lower Provinces; Inspector-General of Registration, Lower Provinces; Director of Public Instruction; Port Officer, Calcutta; Protector of Emigrants, and Superintendent of Emigration, Calcutta; Embarkation Agent, Goalundo; Conservator of Forests; Meteorological Reporter, Bengal; Accountant-General; Director of the Department of Land Records and Agriculture.

* Commissioners have been addressed direct.

SIR,—In continuation of this Department's circular letter No. 4, dated 19th February 1891, on the subject of increasing the number

(5) It appears that "Hindu" has not taken the trouble to follow the drift of my reasoning. I never meant that Medhatithi's commentary contained any direct authority for the position that consummation could not be proper in any case, on a child-wife of less than 12 years. I cited Medhatithi only in order to show that the rule as to approaching the wife at Ritu is subject to such exceptions as are warranted by other texts and by the dictates of reason and common sense. The text of Kurma Puran referred to above points also to the same conclusion.

of Volunteers in India, I am directed by the Lieutenant-Governor to address you again with a view to explaining the course which it appears to His Honour advisable to adopt for the purpose of stimulating the Volunteer movement in Bengal.

2. Sir Charles Elliott has recently had the opportunity of conferring on this question with several of the officers in command of Volunteer Corps, and of ascertaining the means by which a considerable degree of success has been attained in the North-Western Provinces. It has been brought to his notice that the grant of certain concessions to the Active Volunteers would have a beneficial effect in conducing to the efficiency, and therefore to the attractiveness, of the existing corps: and these points have been accordingly laid before the Government of India. But, while His Honour attaches great importance to this branch of the question, he is most desirous (as he has already stated) to obtain an increase in the numbers of the Active Volunteers and Reservists throughout Bengal. If the Civil Officers will take personal interest in the movement and thoroughly understand the objects and His Honour's wishes, he believes that this desirable result can be secured. He wishes also to remind all officers of the views of the Government of India on this subject, as expressed in the letter of the Secretary in the Military Department, No. 65B, dated 7th January 1891.

3. It is unnecessary to dwell on the advantages of an Active Volunteer force. The object of the Volunteer Reserve scheme is, briefly, to render available in an emergency every European and Eurasian capable of bearing arms, who is not already a member of the Active force. In the North-Western Provinces substantial progress has been made in most districts in enrolling members of the Reserve, and the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces has called on the Civil Officers within his jurisdiction to make further efforts so as to ensure the enrolment of all save those who, from physical infirmity or other good reasons, are unable to join the organization. Sir Charles Elliott would be glad to see similar efforts initiated and sustained throughout Bengal. He is aware that for the most part the inhabitants belong to less martial races than those of Upper India, and that to some extent an opinion prevails that there is not the same need for Volunteer forces in Bengal as elsewhere. He would ask you to counteract this view: the necessity for a state of preparedness for times of danger and difficulty exists in these provinces as in other parts of India: and the policy of the Government of India which aims at a large increase of the Volunteer forces has nowhere excluded Bengal from its purview.

4. It appears to the Lieutenant-Governor that the first step towards securing the enrolment of all eligible persons is that the Collector should prepare for each district, and the Head of each Department for all offices subordinate to himself at his head quarters, a nominal roll in the annexed form of all European and Eurasian adults, showing (in column 4) whether they are members of a Volunteer force or (in column 5) whether they are Reservists: and (in column 6) whether they have not as yet joined either organization. These lists should be amended as changes occur, and should be kept up to date in each district office and in each separate Department. In respect to the entries of the official residents, little trouble should be experienced. The income-tax and census returns should assist in the preparation of the lists of non-official residents. Heads of Departments are requested to lend their influence to assist the Collectors in recruiting among the departmental officers in the mofussil.

5. While these lists are under preparation, and when they have been prepared, every opportunity should be taken to persuade all eligible persons to join the Active Volunteers, and to those who are unable to join the Active force the objects of the Reserve scheme should be fully explained. I am to request that you will use your best efforts to induce all those who have not yet enrolled themselves to join either the Active Volunteer force or the Reserve. If the objects of the latter, and the simple conditions attaching to it, are properly represented, there are, it is believed, but few residents who would decline to join one or other branch of the organization for mutual defence. Reservists need not be required to wear uniform or to attend drill, but to shoot a small number of shots annually, to keep their rifle and ammunition carefully and in readiness, and to be prepared to join the Active Volunteers whenever a serious emergency occurs. His Honour trusts that you will distinctly understand (1) that the first object should be to introduce men to join a force of Active Volunteers whenever possible, (2) that the Reserve should not compete with the Active Volunteer force or deprive it of men who would otherwise be willing to join it, but (3) that it is most desirable to induce all European and Eurasian adults to join a Reserve force rather than remain unenrolled in any force.

6. In cases in which a resident declines or is unfit to join, a brief statement of the reasons, where intimated, should be entered in the column (7) of remarks.

His Honor thinks, if the easy character of the conditions, and the importance of the organization in their own interests is fully explained, that no reasonable man will decline to be amenable to persuasion.

7. The lists should be prepared for each District or Department in duplicate as soon as possible. One copy of the list should be forwarded to this office with your remarks.

8. In Circular No. 4, dated 19th February 1891, you were desired to report in the month of July next what measures you considered advisable for the promotion of the Volunteer movement. The present communication is not intended to supersede that circular, but it will serve to show you more fully the attention which is now being accorded to the whole subject. The return now asked for should be submitted along with your reply to the earlier circular in July.

A BRITISH HUSBAND'S PRIVILEGES.

On March 19th, before the Court of Appeal consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and Lord Justice Fry, a return was made to the writ of habeas corpus, granted on the previous Tuesday directed to Mr. E. H. Jackson, requiring him to bring up his wife (who up to that time had been detained in a house at Blackburn) to the Court to give her an opportunity of stating her case. Mr. Jackson, who was represented by counsel, himself appeared, and Mrs. Jackson was also present.

Counsel engaged in the case were: For Mrs. Jackson's relatives, Mr. Finlay, Q. C., and Mr. Forbes Lankester; for Mr. Jackson, Mr. Henn Collins, Q. C., Mr. T. Terrell, and Mr. Malcolm Douglas.

The principal facts will appear from the following from the argument:--

Mr. Collins then submitted that the affidavits showed that Mr. Jackson had no access to his wife, and that he had exercised the right which a husband had at common law, if he desired to secure the possession and society of his wife.

The Lord Chancellor---Do you say he has a right to take possession of his wife and imprison her?

Mr. Collins---Not to imprison her, but to confine her so as to prevent her from eloping.

The Lord Chancellor---What do you mean by eloping?

Mr. Collins---I mean going away with the view to absent herself from his society. I do not use the word in its popular sense.

The Lord Chancellor---Going away and continuing away from him?

Mr. Collins---Yes.

The learned counsel then went on to contend that the law in the matter was correctly laid down by Mr. Justice Coleridge in Cochrane's case, where it was stated that a husband had a right to obtain possession of his wife by stratagem, and if she announced her intention of going away again, he had a right to detain her. Lord Mansfield had cited the law to the effect that a man might beat his wife, but not in a violent and cruel manner. It was also laid down in the reign of Charles II. that the wife is subject to her husband. Yet he may not put her to death. (Laughter). And neither may he beat her, and she may swear the peace against him and neither may he starve her.

The Lord Chancellor---I wonder if it would be a good return to habeas corpus if a person were confined in a prison to say that he had a free run of it, and was not confined to one cell.

Mr. Collins thought not. A husband had a right to confine his wife to a house to prevent her escaping, but not to imprison her. Their lordships called it imprisonment.

The Lord Chancellor---I won't call it a prison. Suppose you have a large place surrounded by four walls, and you confine a person within that, would that be imprisonment?

Mr. Collins---Yes, in law, but not in fact. (Laughter).

The Lord Chancellor---You think that "stone walls do not a prison make?"

Mr. Collins---Yes. "Nor iron bars a cage." (Laughter).

The Master of the Rolls---She would be imprisoned, I suppose, if she were tied to a bedpost, or locked in a room.

Mr. Collins---Yes.

The Lord Chancellor---Suppose we, upon these facts which are in the return, should come to the conclusion that this was imprisonment?

Mr. Collins---Then I am afraid that I should be wrong. My position is that, imprisonment not being justifiable, confinement is justifiable. I say that the detention of the lady in her husband's house, with a free right to go anywhere she likes within that house, and also taking her out for drives, is not imprisonment.

The Lord Chancellor---Must you establish, as a condition precedent to the exercise of the husband's power, that the wife is making undue use of her liberty?

Mr. Collins---Yes; it is only reconcilable with the law to attribute it to the special facts of the case.

Mr. Collins then proceeded to cite instances in which he contended that the authority of the husband over the wife had been upheld. In one of these cases, it was stated that a husband was responsible for seeing that his wife kept "in the path of duty."

The Lord Chancellor---That is one of several figurative expressions which have occurred in what you have been reading, and I don't altogether follow them. For instance, "the path of duty." What is "the path of duty?" Is it a divergence from some supposed standard, say the Apostolical order that a wife should obey her husband; and do you argue that if she does not do so, he may imprison her?

Mr. Collins---No; the Court, I imagine, has to lay down its definition of what that duty is.

Lord Esher---But according to your argument the husband may take the law into his own hands without coming to the Court.

The Lord Chancellor said it had undoubtedly been held that a husband had a right to enforce his right to his wife against other parties by writ of habeas corpus, as for such purposes the law assumed that the proper place for the wife was her husband's home.

Mr. Collins proceeding argued that a man had a right to use necessary violence, in endeavouring to obtain possession of his wife, when Lord Esher interposed, saying that it had been clearly shown by the affidavits that a lawyer's clerk had assisted Mr. Jackson by dragging Mrs. Jackson into the carriage by the shoulders in such a manner that for decorum's sake the husband had to assist her.

The Lord Chancellor said he should call attention to the insult which the lady had received later on.

Mr. Collins went on to say that a husband had a right in a view of the disobedience of his wife to his lawful commands "to confine, but not to imprison her."

The Lord Chancellor---What does that mean?

Mr. Collins---I think it must mean reasonable restraint, in order to enforce the marital right as against actual punitive imprisonment.

Lord Esher---Suppose that a wife wanted to go to Marshal and Snelgrove's to buy dresses, and her husband thought it extravagant, would he be entitled to lock her up to prevent her "wasting his estate?"

Mr. Collins thought, under the authorities he had cited, that that right would exist.

The Lord Chancellor---But supposing she went, would he be entitled to punish her by locking her up until she promised not to do so again, or in any other way?

Mr. Collins---I will not say that, but he might bind her by vows.

Lord Esher said, looking at the matter in another way, if the husband had, instead of seizing his wife at the church door, applied for a habeas corpus against the relatives with whom she was stopping of her own free will, the court would never have granted it; then, according to Mr. Collins's argument, he might have seized his wife by violence; so that the husband would show himself more powerful than the law.

Mr. Collins said this might have occurred, but then the man would have had a right to his wife, and would not have been hampered by certain considerations which would have hampered the court. Counsel went on to quote a case in which it had been held that the wife of a man who had ill-treated or threatened to ill-treat her, could not have prohibition against him at common law because she was, to translate the old law Latin, "under the rod of her husband."

Lord Esher---Then he could beat her to any extent.

Mr. Collins---Under the old Roman law a husband might slay his wife if she drank wine.

Lord Esher---Then an English wife is worse off than a dog?

Mr. Collins---That, my lord, is a moot point, which I am not at present prepared to discuss. (Laughter). The learned counsel then proceeded to explain that married to Mrs. Jackson under peculiar circumstances, Mr. Jackson went to New Zealand almost directly after the ceremony. He returned in consequence of letters written by his wife, but when he got home he found that access to her was denied him by the persons in whose house she was living. He was, therefore, obliged to get an order from the Court for the restitution of conjugal rights, and the lady refused to obey that order.

The Lord Chancellor said that did not seem to justify the husband in violently carrying her away to a house. Arrived there she from fear of being drugged went without food for a long time, and it was also in the affidavits that Mr. Jackson pulled her bonnet off and threw it into the fire.

Mr. Collins---She says so.

The Lord Chancellor---But it is not denied.

The Lord Chancellor---We think that we must see this lady herself, for so far as we can at present see there has been no direct communication between her and her solicitor, this being attributable to external influences. We must satisfy ourselves that the lady is a perfectly free agent in what she is at present doing.

Mrs. Jackson was then escorted to the Judges' room, and their lordships left the bench.

On their returning into Court,

The Lord Chancellor said that in this case the Court had satisfied themselves by hearing what Mrs. Jackson herself had to say, that in the refusal to go to her husband's house, and on her resistance to continue in it, she was acting entirely of her own free will, and had not been forced, or compelled, or even induced by any one else to refuse to continue in her husband's house. He confessed that the propositions that had been laid down in the course of the arguments were such as it was with reluctance he could suppose had ever formed part of the English law. In former years it had been boldly maintained by learned counsel that slavery was a part of the law of England, but if any one were to put forward such a proposition as that now, it would be received with something like ridicule. In the same way whatever quaint and even absurd dicta might be contained in the old books as to the right of the husband over his wife, he should scarcely have expected to hear them seriously put forward in a court of justice in the present day. Some phrases had been cited, which it was said justified a husband in using physical violence towards his wife, which were totally inconsistent with the rights of free human creatures. He only mentioned this, because it appeared to him that the authorities upon the subject were, every one of them, tainted with that sort of notion of the absolute dominion of the husband over the wife, which lay at the foundation of the earlier cases, so that the question of law, as far as the question had ever been raised, had been raised in an abstract form, and was unaccompanied with circumstances by which qualifications might be introduced into an abstract proposition laid down. He believed that the first and only case that had ever occurred, which decided that the husband had the right of the custody of his wife's person was Cochrane's case. But no case whatever had been cited to establish the legal proposition that the husband had complete dominion over his wife's person. He did not mean to say there might not be cases in which the husband would not be justified in interfering with his wife by physical force, as for instance, if she was going to throw herself out of the window, or going downstairs for the purpose of eloping with some person, and was thus about to stain her husband's honour. If the proposition of law laid down in the authorities was limited to that extent, he thought that it would be justified. But here the husband in his return to the writ merely set forth that having been married to the lady, and going to New Zealand, he was refused access to her by her relations on his return, and that he had seized her by physical force and taken her to his house. That was the return that was put forward to justify the admitted imprisonment of this lady. He did not think that he was able to take upon himself to express with sufficiently precise language the difference that existed between confinement and imprisonment, but if there was any distinction between them at all he should say that on the facts of this case there had been imprisonment, and not merely confinement. He did not find in the return anything that could justify the husband in restraining the liberty of his wife. The proposition of law put forward was that where a wife had fully absented herself from her husband, and the husband had a right to seize possession of her by force and to detain her in his house until she should restore him his conjugal rights. He was certainly not prepared to assent to any such proposition, because the legislature had expressly deprived the Matrimonial courts of the power to imprison a wife for refusing to restore her husband his conjugal rights. The consequence of the contention on the part of Mr. Jackson was that the Matrimonial Court, having no power to punish the wife, except by attachment for contempt, in which case she would be imprisoned in a lawful prison, the husband had a right to take her into custody and to imprison her in his own house. He was of opinion that no such rights existed at law, and he was personally of opinion that no such rights had ever existed at law. He was prepared to say that no English subject had a right to imprison another English subject, whether she was his wife or not, provided they were zui juris and of responsible age. But the facts went further in this case, was it nothing that a lady coming from church on a Sunday afternoon had been seized by force by a number of men and thus subjected to insult, and was it nothing that when her husband got her into his house he should tear her bonnet off her head and throw it into the fire? He admitted that the latter assertion rested upon the statement of the wife, but it had not been contradicted. He regarded, with something like indignation, the facts which had been set forth in this case, and the absence of anything like the sense of delicacy and respect which was due to a wife whom the husband had sworn to love and cherish. Doubtless the earlier parts of the story as told by the husband did not throw discredit upon him, but those parts rested upon his affidavit alone, and he refused to discuss them because he did not know how far to trust them, seeing that the lady had not been allowed to answer them. The result in his judgment was that there was no power by law which authorised the husband to act as he had done, and that the facts shown amply warranted the lady in fearing violence. The return to the writ was therefore bad and the lady must be restored to her freedom, and must be at complete liberty to choose her own place of residence.

The Master of the Rolls, in concurring, said that the proposition of law sought to be established by the husband would render an English wife the abject slave of her husband, who would own her as a property and as a chattel which he might dispose of in any way he chose. There was no ground for supposing that it had ever been the law of England that a husband was entitled to beat his wife with a stick no thicker than his thumb.

Lord Justice Fry concurred.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LOVE AT THE GRAVE.

BY MISS PHOEBE CAREY.

REMEMBRANCE of nature's prime,
And herald of the autumn near,
The last month of the summer-time,
Of leaves and flowers, is with us here.

More than the eloquent lip can preach
To every heart that hopes and fears,
What solemn lessons does it teach
Of the quick passage of our years.

To me it brings the thoughts of one
Who, in the summer's fading bloom,
From the fond arms of love went down
To the dim silence of the tomb.

How often since has spring's soft shower
Revived the life in nature's breast,
And the sweet herb and tender flower
Have been renewed above her rest.

How many summer-times have told
To mortal hearts their rapid flight,
Since first this heap of yellow mould
Shut out her beauty from my sight.

Since first, to her who perished true,
My sad feet near her pillow trod,
And year by year the pathway grew
Deeper and deeper in the sod.

Now the neglected roses tell
Of no kind hand to tend them nigh;
O God! I have not kept so well
My faith as in the years gone by.

But here today my step returns,
And kneeling where these willows wave,
And the bright flame of sunrise burns
Down through the pale leaves to thy grave!—

I cry, forgive, that I could prove,
Forgetful of thy memory—
Forgive me, that a human love
Once came between my soul and thee!

For this unfaithful heart that yearned
For living love its life to cheer,
Broken and bleeding has returned
To stifle down its crying here!

For thine on earth was love to me
Which time could shake not nor estrange;
And, lost one! where the angels be
I know affection cannot change.

RESOLVES.

BY MISS PHOEBE CAREY.

I have said I would not meet him; have I said the words in vain?
Sunset burns along the hill-tops, and I'm waiting here again.
But my promise is not broken, though I stand where once we met;
When I hear his coming footsteps, I can fly him even yet.

We have stood here oft when evening deepened slowly o'er the plain,
But I must not, dare not, meet him in the shadows here again;
For I could not turn away and leave that pleading look and tone,
And the sorrow of his parting would be bitter as my own.

In the dim and distant ether the first star is shining through,
And another, and another I trembles softly in the blue:
Should I linger but one moment in the shadows where I stand,
I shall see the vine-leaves parted, with a quick, impatient hand.

But I will not wait his coming! he will surely come once more.
Though I said I would not meet him, I have told him so before
And he knows the stars of evening see me standing here again—
O, he surely will not leave me now to watch and wait in vain!

'Tis the hour, the time, of meeting! in one moment 't will be past;
And last night he stood beside me; was that blessed time the last?
I could better bear my sorrow, could I live that parting o'er;
O, I wish I had not told him that I would not come once more!

Could that have been the night-wind moved the branches thus apart?
Did I hear a coming footstep, or the beating of my heart?
No! I hear him, I can see him, and my weak resolves are vain;
I will fly, but to his bosom, and to leave it not again!

THE SPRING OF ACTION.

In Love must all things centre:—to this end
Man bath his being:—duty rests in love.
Deeds freely done alone have praise above,
Nor baser springs must with right action blend.
If force, or fear, or lust of pleasure lend
A reason for our doings, then they move
From a wrong source, and shall all worthless prove,
For to our own mean selves alone they tend.
God loveth us:—would that our souls could soar
Above the fetters of this mortal clay,
More fully love, more perfectly obey,
And thus this glorious image wear once more;
For every thought of love man's heart can frame,
Softens the curse that by man's sinning came.

EARLY in the morning of May 10, will come off the transit of Mercury. The last was in November 1881 and there will be another in 1894.

THE Chinese Government is said to have prohibited the slandering of Missionaries.

At the Devon Assizes, a plaintiff characterized the conduct of the defendant as "very unchristianlike." Lord Chief Justice Coleridge is reported to have stopped him saying "You must not say that. We don't know anything about Christianity here; we are lawyers."

IN Palestine, in 1841 the Jews numbered only 8,000. In 1883, they grew to 23,000. Now they are censused at 70,000. This is a brisk rate of immigration. The Jews are doing their best to realise prophecy. But there is many a slip between the cup and the lip.

THE pre-Victorian gold coin has ceased to be legal tender.

MR. Eardley Norton who withdrew his subscription of Rs. 500 from the Madras Bradlaugh Memorial Fund, is willing to be out of pocket to that extent and will "be quite ready to assist Mrs. Bonner (Mr. Bradlaugh's daughter) if she will permit my love and reverence of her father's memory to send her my quota direct." Why does not Mr. Norton send his quota to the President of the National Secular Society which has appealed for subscriptions to provide for Mrs. Bonner and to liquidate the liabilities of the deceased which exceed £4,586, the value of his personal estate?

THE Appendix to the Calcutta Gazette of Wednesday publishes the preliminary Jury Lists—Common and Special—for the High Court. They will be closed on the 9th April. Any person who deems himself for any reason wrongly included should immediately address the Clerk of the Crown. The Shrievalty being an ancient institution, the Sheriff or the Clerk of the Crown does not easily tolerate changes. The office of the Municipal Commissioners is still described as that of the Justices who have these fifteen years ceased to administer the municipal affairs of the city. It is curious to find the famous Baboo Surendranath Banerjee described as only an inhabitant. Surely, he could not possibly be less than that. And is it come to this that the great Surrender Nut is huddled in the same boat with all the Smiths, Browns, and Robinsons of vulgar Baboodom? For shame! The Indian Association ought to hasten to the rescue of its Chief. There are not a few other anomalies and curiosities. While a Rai Bahadur is allowed his title, the sons of a living Raja are ignored as Kumars. It will be news to many that Baboos Dwijendra Nath Tagore and Jotindra Nath Tagore, of Dwarka Nath Tagore's Street, have reverted to Hinduism.

THE three Subdivisions of Darjeeling, Kurseong and Teesta of the Forest charge hitherto known as the Darjeeling Division, have been broken up into three separate Forest Divisions.

A FULL Bench of the Bombay High Court—Mr. Justice Telang dissenting—have held that a member of an undivided Hindoo family could not sue his uncles for a partition of the joint property during the life time of his father. Under the Dayabhag School in Bengal, of course that particular situation does not arise. Otherwise, under the Calcutta High Court, partition has become the rule with hardly any exception.

THE Indian Daily News of Thursday publishes a letter from a Bengali correspondent who, in apparently his true name, writes on "Our Happy New Year." He wishes to "be allowed to convey his heart-felt good wishes to the editor and his humble readers on the occasion of the rolling of our New Year." We wonder whether the poor editor or any of his humble readers understands "the occasion," and really doubt whether either of them will be thankful for the "good wishes" howsoever "heart-felt." Mr. Mitra scarcely makes his case clear when he adds "We have seen another year,"—which is that?—"and we rejoice to congratulate our common brethren on the extension of another year"—the same as the one mentioned above, or any other? Is it the past year or the new year?—"in their happy lives?" All this may be beautifully vague, but our compatriot has a practical purpose to serve. "This is the proper time," he says, "for us to encourage one another to meet the year with national rejoicings and thanksgivings." But nothing can be done in this land without Government—not even the encouraging of one another, specially the "common people." Here then is the specific proposal for carrying out the great object. "The Government should set apart our happy New Year's day as a holiday." Just so! And the letter concludes with the terse remark, "Sorry that other nations have, but we have not, such good holidays for the present." Who can help being moved by such a wail of Oriental patriotism?

A GERMAN has censused the paper mills in the world at 3,985, turning out annually 1,994,000,000lbs of paper. Half of this weight is employed in printing, the newspapers alone requiring 600,000,000lbs., shewing an increase of 200,000,000lbs in the last decade. He has further calculated that on an average an Englishman uses annually 11½lbs. of paper, an American 10lbs., a German 8lbs., a Frenchman 7½lbs., an Italian or an Australian 3¼lbs., a Spaniard 1½lbs., a Russian 1¼lbs., and a Mexican 2lbs.

STATISTICS is the rage of the day. Notwithstanding the warning voice of Scripture history, the nations of Christendom are continually counting and recounting their numbers over and over again. This periodical counting has been established as a state institution. We in India have just passed through the decennial process and are now moralising on the results. Meanwhile, a philosophical wag in Europe has been gravely ridiculing the counting mania. We refer to Dr. Adametz, a Swiss scholar, who has been taking a census of the population of a cheese!

"The microscopic examination of one 'gramm' of a fresh Emmenthaler cheese, such as is sold in England under the name of Gruyère, contained no fewer than 90,000 so-called microbes. This prodigious encampment, after seventy days, proved to have increased to a tribe of 800,000. Another sort of cheese contained within a single 'gramm' board and lodging for about two million microbes, while in a 'gramm' cut from the rind of the same cheese Dr. Adametz found about five million of these inhabitants! A piece of cheese upon our tables, of a few pounds' weight, may consequently contain more microbe inhabitants than there are human inhabitants in the whole world."

ENDLESS are the directions and departments in which the favorite method is being utilised. Thus we have what may be called a mnemonic census. A French savant has been studying the subject of Memory in its relation to climate, race, age, profession and occupation, health, weather, &c. The following is the result of the enquiries:—

"The inferior races of mankind, such as Negroes, the Chinese, etc., have more memory than those of a higher type of civilization.

Primitive races which were unacquainted with the art of writing had a wonderful memory, and were for ages in the habit of handing down, from one generation to another, hymns as voluminous as the Bible.

Prompters and professors of declamation know that women have more memory than men. French women will learn a foreign language quicker than their husbands.

Youths have more memory than adults. It is well developed in children, attains its maximum about the fourteenth or fifteenth year, and then decreases.

Feeble individuals of a lymphatic temperament have more memory than the strong. Students who obtain the prize for memory and recitation chiefly belong to the former class.

Parisian students have also less memory than those who come from the provinces. At the École Normale and other schools the pupils who have the best memory are not the most intelligent.

The memory is more developed among the peasantry than among the citizens, and among the clergy than among the laity.

From a physiological point of view, memory is diminished by over-feeding, by physical exercise, and by education, in this sense, that the illiterate have potentially more memory than those who know how to read and write.

We remember, moreover, better in the morning than in the evening, in the summer than in the winter, and better in warm than in cold climates."

THE result of the B. L. Examination of the Calcutta University is out. Eight candidates have passed in the First Division and 126 in the Second. Syed Ali Belgrami, Director of Mines, H. H. the Nazim's Dominions, from the Patna College, tops the list and has won the gold medal. The Syud left Hyderabad on the 28th December on 3 months' leave. He had therefore only two months to prepare himself for the examination. Under the circumstances, the result is highly creditable to his docility and previous attainments. He was already a B. A. of our University. He is an accomplished Sanskrit scholar, and set papers in that language for the M. A. examination of the Madras University. The Syud is a Bengal man, being the son of the late Syud Zainooddeen Hossein Khan Bahadar, Deputy Magistrate. Another Belgrami, a trusted servant of the Nazim's Government, Syud Hossein, Director of Public Instruction, is also a graduate of the Calcutta University. They are worthy brothers and worthy sons of a worthy father—an honor to Islam and to their country.

THE price-lists of staple food-crops in the local areas of Bengal, prepared under Sec. 39 (1) of the Bengal Tenancy Act, VIII of 1885, for the period from 1st October to 31st December 1890, are, with the approval of the Board of Revenue, published in the Calcutta Gazette of April 15.

MR. BAINES, a foundation member of the Graphic Newspaper Company, died and his few shares were put to market. They are £10 each £7 being paid and drew dividends ranging from 25 to 104 per cent. No wonder, the lots were eagerly competed for and fetched prices ranging round £36 per share, or a premium over 500 per cent.

MISS Lydia Thompson, the burlesque actress, when last in England, overheard at the Lyceum, during a performance, the following dialogue between two well-dressed Yankee ladies: "Quite too nice, isn't he?" said one, referring to Mr. Irving. "Yes," said the other, "but I guess he's rather weak about the knees." "Oh," was the reply, "that's only his pathos."

WHO will now say that Madras is benighted? The Municipal Commissioners of the City have ordered the burning of their street lamps from 6 P. M. to 3 A. M. instead of till midnight.

A SUB-MAGISTRATE in the Vizagapatam district fined a man Rs. 30 for being in possession of half a dram of illicit arrack. The District Magistrate found him not a dealer but a consumer who had in ignorance of the law had brought across the boundary for his own consumption the cheap intoxicant, and being of opinion that the sentence was excessive, sent up the case for the orders of the High Court. That Court reduced the fine to one rupee.

MOULVI SAMIULLA KHAN has been raised to the District and Sessions Judgeship of Rae Bareilly in the dominion of the Lieutenant-Governor of the N.-W. P. The appointment, according to "Observer," evidently a Hindu, in the Indian Union, has excited indignation rather than satisfaction. He wonders "What once Mr. Mahmud failed to get has been given to Moulvi Samiulla!" and enquires

"Is there anything in the merits of the gentleman that has compelled His Honor to give him the post, or has the Government thought it necessary to alter the policy that debarred the children of the soil from the position and emoluments which they deserved, or is it a mere desire to do a kind act to an old friend, or lastly is it done to an over anxiety to please a particular community?"

The answer is supplied by himself.

"Those who have carefully studied His Honor's policy, as pursued in the past, and know also the merits of Moulvi Samiulla Khan, will be unwilling, to the last degree, to answer the first two questions in the affirmative. The cause may be found in either or both of the interrogatories that follow. But what of the people? A gentleman who does not know English, and consequently can with great difficulty, and in many cases, may not at all, follow the judgments of his English knowing subordinates, one who in his whole life never exercised the powers and functions of even a third class magistrate, has been invested with jurisdiction that extends over no less than the lives of individuals! What has become of His Honor's own observations that District Magistrates of standing and experience only should be appointed Sessions Judges. It is impossible for me to give you an adequate idea of the feelings of sorrow and pain with which this appointment has been received both by the European and the educated native communities."

YESTERDAY, the Englishman published the following disquieting telegram:—

"BENARES, APRIL 15.—Great excitement prevails owing to a riot in the city over the Runjee Temple case. It was supposed that the matter would have been discussed at the Municipal Meeting this morning, and a large crowd assembled at the Town Hall to hear the result. Finding, however, that the temple case was not for consideration at this meeting the crowd dispersed, but proceeded to the site of the temple, as a rumour had got abroad that it had been demolished. The temple was, however, found to be intact, but by this time the mob had become riotous and dug up the water-works pipes from the temple site to the distributing station, and also destroyed the small pumping engine on the river bank. Raja Shiwa Prosad and Babu Sita Ram's houses were attacked as well as the city telegraph office, the wires being cut. At Rajghat station the mob wrecked the place, plundering the cash chest of about three thousand rupees. Immediately on receiving news the Magistrate, the District Superintendent of Police, and the Commissioner proceeded to the scene of the disturbance, with a strong force of the East Lancashire and the 12th Native Infantry Regiment. Two Companies of the former were also despatched by special train to guard the Dufferin Bridge, and other parties were sent to guard the Bank of Bengal, the Post Office, and Cantonment stations. The troops will remain in the city all night. Every precaution has been taken by the civil and military authorities.

Everything passed off quietly last night, most of the troops being withdrawn from the city about 11 o'clock. The Volunteers who turned out promptly were also dismissed to their homes. The Magistrate remained at the Town Hall all night in case of further trouble.

All is quiet to-day. About 120 rioters were arrested last evening, and more arrests are being made to-day. The Lieutenant-Governor was informed by telegram, last night, of the occurrence."

The number of arrests has come up to 500.

AT the instance of Sir J. W. Pease, the House of Commons has adopted the following resolution:—

"That this House is of opinion that the system by which the Indian opium revenue is raised is morally indefensible, and would urge upon the Indian Government that they should cease to grant licenses for the cultivation of the poppy and sale of opium in British India, except to supply the legitimate demand for medical purposes, and should, at the same time, take measures to arrest the transit of Malwa opium through British territory."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

GENERAL Azimuddin Khan Bahadar, President of the Rampur Council of Regency, has been assassinated. On Monday night, when driving home in a dog-cart, he was assailed by bullets from unseen hands, and he died an hour after. The assassins are yet at large.

AN American glorying in the name of Jules le Grande landed in India and made for the interior. Loafing about from place to place, he strayed far into the heart of Central India. At length he struck ground in a native state at Ajaigarh. Here the rolling stone not only came to a halt but had a chance of gathering moss. He got employed in the Engineering Department of the Maharaja on a pay of Rs. 25, not counting perquisites, we suppose. He was not alone in this world but had a woman in his keeping. His bold and adventuring spirit could not idle away in that position of such small remuneration. He looked for wider fields. There was at the same place Raj Rani, a woman of independent circumstances living by herself, and he turned his eye on her—money. One midnight sounds proceeded from her house, and some neighbours proceeding thither found her to expire. The Nazim was promptly there and an enquiry was held. The woman had fifteen wounds, the head was nearly severed and the right hand cut off. Under the bed were found a bag, a bottle of chloroform, a paper cone and rag for administering it, and other articles. In the courtyard, there were a scabbard and a bamboo ladder against the wall. These were traced to the American who had in his house a sword to fit the scabbard, and clothes stained with blood. Being of the privileged paleness, he was made over to the Political Agent for the Bundelkhand. The accused however was willing to be tried by Colonel Wilson and a jury at least half of which were Englishmen instead of by a High Court. So the Political Agent and a jury of three British officers and two natives tried the American for murder of the native woman. After a trial of 33 days, the jury found him guilty and the Political Agent sentenced him to be hanged. The prisoner's defence was that the whole was a trumped up affair, got up by the Nazim who bore him ill feeling.

News of a distressing kind comes from Bombay. The coming man will not come. Her Amla mater's most promising son promised in vain. Poor Lakshman Ramchandra Vaidya is no more. He was one of the most brilliant of the brilliant Elphinstone College band. He passed M. A. with Honours, obtained successively the Bhagwandas Sanskrit scholarship and the Senior Dakshina Fellowship, and afterwards the degree of L.L.B. His proficiency in Sanskrit was prodigious. He early for some time officiated as Professor of Sanskrit at the Elphinstone College. The other day he passed with great credit the examination for Advocates. Of his great attainments in Sanskrit he has left the best proof in his scholarly edition of Bhāmīni Vāda with Sanskrit Notes and an English translation and Introduction and, above all, his comprehensive Standard Sanskrit-English Dictionary.

THE London correspondent of the Statesman under date the 27th March, thus gives the history of the London postal Express Delivery Service :—

"On Monday night Mr. Raikes' turn came. This gentleman is now by common consent voted about the worst Postmaster General who ever presided at St. Martins-le-Grand. His multifarious staff has, almost since he took the office, been in a state of chronic, though suppressed, mutiny and discontent; he has turned a deaf ear to suggested reforms, till forced by the pressure of public opinion to adopt them; and in fact he has altogether mismanaged the Post Office by attempting, it seems, to run it on the autocratic lines of those numerous limited liability companies with which his name is associated as director. The cup of his iniquity was filled to overflowing by his treatment of the Express Delivery question. He had declined to organise a postal service for the speedy delivery of letters and parcels by special messengers; private enterprise thereupon stepped in and created an organisation for this purpose, whose rapid success was a fair measure of the great need of an express system. The Postmaster General then discovered that this new service was infringing the Post Office monopoly of letter-carrying. He was in the position of the dog in the manger; he would not take the matter in hand himself, and he sought to hinder private enterprise from doing it. However, the new service was so convenient that a regular outcry greeted the proposal to stop it. Mr. Raikes was fairly riddled with questions and complaints. Mr. Cobb, Dr. Cameron and other members pilloried him night after night, the papers began to have leaders on the subject hostile to the right honourable gentleman, and finally Mr. Raikes has had to give in and start an Express Delivery service, which came into operation this week. It remains to be seen whether the system worked by the Post Office will be as efficient and popular as the private organisation it supplants. If American experience goes for anything, this is one of those things which are best left to private initiative."

The tendency of the day is to encourage the interference of the state in all matters. But the state is at least an unwieldy machinery. Perhaps the administration difficulty, much more than abstract reasoning, will in the future decide the question. As for the manners of the present martinet commanding the host at St. Martins-le-Grand, we can only pity the officers condemned to servitude under him. This General is apparently a worse monster than the late renowned adjutant-general of the Department. O for an Anthony Trollope to exasperate him into propriety!

EVERYTHING has its use, and the utilization of sewage in our days is the grandest illustration of the truth. Akin to that use by which the dirtiest refuse is made to yield the most savoury results, is the advantageous employment of time under duress, whether from sickness or under authority of law. How fruitful such confinement may be made, may be seen in the following excerpt from one of G. A. S.'s weekly contribution to the press. Says he :—

"The record of the studious prisoner who during his seclusion taught himself half-a-dozen languages with the sole assistance of 'Cassell's Popular Educator' has been beaten by the Fenian convict Fitzharris, alias 'Skin-the-Goat,' who, according to one of his brother 'Invincibles' just released from durance vile, is looking very old, but is keeping up his spirits by composing comic songs. But there were strong men before Agamemnon. Dickens, in the 'Sketches by Boz,' mentions a cabinman who relieved the tedium of a month's solitary confinement in Coldbath Fields by lying on his back all day and singing comic songs. The story was probably a true one: for Dickens was an intimate friend of Lieut.-Col. Chesterton, the governor of the gaol in question, which is now happily defunct."

Greater things by far have been done in dungeons or in duress vile. We will notice what is to us the most interesting. It is not commonly known that the foundation of that Sanskrit scholarship for which Germany is pre-eminent among the nations was laid in a prison.

A PRETTY scene was enacted in Rajshaye by way of afterpiece to the drama of Agitation on the Scoble Bill. The ostensible occasion was the anniversary of the local Dharma Sabha. Accordingly, on the 26th March, the hall of the Society at Rampore Beaulah was crowded with Hindus, the chief of whom were several lawyers and law agents, merchants, landlords, professors of the college, and other Government officials. Raja Sashi Sekhaheswar Roy, who is an inhabitant of the District, and a patron of the Sabha, returned from Calcutta on purpose for the meeting and addressed it. He was all moderation, but the audience would not listen to it. He counselled peace, but the assembly of court practitioners, college professors, Government officials, landholders, dealers, and so forth were for war and nothing short of it. He represented to them that as loyal subjects it was their duty to accept with respect and resignation the decision of the representative of their Sovereign. He was interrupted with cries "We do not want to stop the agitation!" Yes, that is the word, and the word given has been religiously got by rote, though not we hope exactly by heart—that is in the idiomatic rather than the idiomatic sense. The good Raja expressed his embarrassment between two—apples of discord. There is no questioning at the meeting, nevertheless his ever-restless Rajaship was to the fore to answer all and sundry. For, it is reported :—

"The Raja replied that he did not know whether he should be more glad or sorry to find his audience more patriotic than religious, as it was against the Hindoo character to entertain sīd for anything earthly. If, however, his countrymen were determined to go on with the agitation, he would in that case advise them to proceed calmly, loyally, and at the same time systematically."

Again :—

"He would also remind them of the excellent advice given by the Viceroy on the occasion of the passing of the Bill, that even in their agitation they should be honest. Before the conclusion of his speech, the Raja stated, for the consideration of the meeting and of all other Dharma Sabhas of Bengal, that it was in contemplation to send a few representatives of Hindoo society to England with a view of laying this and other grievances of the Hindoos before the highest authority in the British Empire. A Maharaja, some Rajas, a few respectable Zemindars, and even some Brahman Pundits of the orthodox class, have expressed their willingness to join this important mission."

That is an astute Plan of Campaign, to be pursued "calmly" and "systematically," with the protecting "loyally" thrown in as a go-between. Such agitation for any practical purpose, is more sīd of course, and, on the Raja's own showing, unHindu.

THE insolence of speech indulged in in private by native Government servants towards the powers that be, specially since the agitation against the Age of Consent Bill, is not the least of the evils which the country owes to the Garbhadhanist press. A short residence in any state of Continental Europe would soon improve the manners as well as politics of our patriotic publicists and their disciples, whether in the receipt of Government pay or not. A slight anecdote like a feather shows the direction of the wind. We learn that "A cobbler's boy was lately waiting outside the Palace to see his Majesty come forth for his afternoon airing. Finding the delay tedious he suddenly exclaimed, 'The booby isn't coming; I shall go.' A policeman at once caught him by the collar and shouted, 'Whom do you mean by the booby, sirrah?' 'Why, my friend Mical,' whined the boy, 'he was to have met me here, but he is not come!' The policeman had to let him go, upon which the boy retreated twenty paces, put his thumb to his nose, spread out his fingers, and yelled, 'And whom did you mean by the booby?'"

That was smart in the boy, no doubt. But it was lucky for the little dare-devil that he was not caught.

BABOO Bhoobun Mohan Sen, within a month of his appointment as Chairman of the Fureedpore Municipality, has resigned, reasons not given. At Baraset, Rai Khetter Nath Chatterjee Bahadar, the well-known engineer, retired, has been elected Chairman. There is a petition set on foot to procure cancellation of the election on the ground of illegality of procedure. It is a pity. Whatever may be urged against him—and this journal has never spared him and perhaps done him injustice—Babu Khetter has undoubtedly served the village of his birth and home, Goostia, and done good to Baraset generally, and he ought to have a chance of serving the subdivisional capital as the head of the local corporation. His fitness cannot be disputed. There is no fear of extravagance and waste in his administration. The danger, if at all, might be in an opposite direction.

THEY are all in sackcloth and ashes. The Hindoo Patriot having as the noisiest of the Goburdhan prints so long pressed its opinion and advice on the Government on the subject of Hindu marriage without success, may well feel humbled. A sense of diffidence is gradually stealing upon these confident exponents of Hindu institutions, in spite of themselves. The Hindoo Patriot is the only member of the Garbhadhanist press with any pretensions to Pandit lore, and it has begun to study the subject of Hindu marriage anew. It has begun at the beginning, with an inquiry into "Hindu Betrothal." We congratulate our contemporary on this excellent disposition. Herein at any rate the conductors follow the Rishis, Western as well as Eastern, who teach, Better late than never. There can be no harm at least in shutting the stable door, though the steed has been spirited away. The journal writes:—

"We have always been opposed to widow re-marriages. We would be the last to detract from the learning and character of the renowned Pandit Iswara Chandra Vidyasagar. He was certainly actuated by the noblest feelings for the suffering widows. But Hindu society has been wisely deaf to his arguments. Our own partiality for orthodoxy in reference to that question is due as well to our journalistic relations with the bulk of our Hindu countrymen as to clearer ideas regarding the essential principles of the religious portion in marriage."

The Hindoo Patriot has not in these its latter days been accustomed to hold forth such language. That journal has at least the equivocal merit of being free from personality, except that of others. For that matter it is personal to nastiness—personal to a parasite insinuating itself like a worm into the wardrobe of its betters, descending from the noble pointed cap—as in its ignorance of genteel habiliments it calls it—down into the recesses of the inexpressibles. Its own personality it fights shy of—instinctively—nursing it as a dead secret. There is no secret in society, but there is a difficulty—a question of identity in the connection. Who's who? Which's which? nobody on the establishment knows. Each of some half a dozen men of different ages goes about in the world claiming the honour that once used to be accorded to the editor of the oldest English journal under Hindu conduct. But who is the "We" of the paper the conductors themselves could not say. One theory is, that the Hindoo Patriot goes by commission. Another is, that there is an ostensible editor to answer charges of libel and give personal satisfaction, receiving whippings from offended parties, the real Simon Pure staying behind. Then the latter has a literary staff, to the members of which, himself being in feeble health, he is often compelled to leave matters without due supervision. It is evident enough from the laxity which reigns in every department. We do not now-a-days read the paper, but happening to take up a recent number, we are amazed at the crude and faulty work which is allowed to pass in a respectable establishment. If some of the cheap native press—and some papers really are cheap, notwithstanding the pretence to a higher rate of subscription—are hiedous, both grammatically and typographically, who wonders? They know no better and can afford no better. No such excuse exists for the sole organ of the large landholders. Our own paper is very far from perfection to be sure, and of late we are conscious of many slips. But we would rather shut up shop than bring out week after week such press "revises" rather than finished sheets. The number under notice of our contemporary has errors of all kinds—slips of writers and lapses of printer—strewn about

Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks
In Vallambrosa where th' Etrurian shades
High o'er-arched imbower.

The article from which we quote is no exception; nay, the passage quoted itself is not free. Under the circumstances, how are we to determine the personality that suddenly challenges notice as the editor of the Hindoo Patriot? Nor is it idle curiosity that impels us to know. Considering the nature of the avowal and its bearing on our society, it is important to know. We dismiss in limine the unfledged literary chickens from consideration. Is it the man of Mathura, who is known to be the political and statistical contributor? Can it be the whipping boy, after all, who takes advantage of his Chief's infirmity, to assert himself? Or, is it the old King himself—the Raja himself and no dummy of a Roy Bahadoor? Who is it that says, "We have always been opposed to widow re-marriages"?

We confess we are unable to make sure. The "old man eloquent" has—for good reasons, doubtless—so resolutely kept himself in the background, has so often denied the soft impeachment, that he was editor of the Hindoo Patriot, that it is difficult to believe that he would, abandoning the prudence of so many years, commit himself to the avowal. On the other hand, the idea of the ostensible Hindoo Patriot confiding to a world not at all solicitous to be enlightened, the history of his personal opinion on the subject of widow marriage and other social questions, is highly amusing. We give up the inquiry in despair. One thing we know. Whatever may be the case of the dubious personality of the journal—the unknown quantity represented by the editorial "we"—the Hindoo Patriot as a paper has not always been opposed to widow marriage. Indeed, we wonder what the venerable Pandit Vidyasagar who still lives will say to the statement now made by our contemporary. The Brahman who was the first and true Hindoo Patriot, Hurris Chunder Mookerjee, valiantly supported Vidyasagar. He fought many a battle in the cause with the then older native English paper, the Hindu Intelligencer, conducted by Kashi-prasad Ghosh, a famous man in his time, who as the champion of orthodoxy set his face against innovation. The late Kristodas Pal, who owed his connection with the Hindoo Patriot to Vidyasagar, and was besides the protégé of Judge Hurro Chunder Ghose, a gentleman who mildly favoured the cause of reform, was not likely to write a word against widow marriage.

THE Lieutenant-Governor leaves for the hills on the 1st of May next.

THE ASSASSINATION IN RAMPORE.

THE most shocking news of the week is the report of the assassination of General Azimooddeen Khan Bahadur, the Vice-President of the Council of Regency of the state of Rampore in Rohilkhand.

It is said that whilst he was driving a dog-cart on Monday night last, he was shot at on the road, and he fell down and died soon after. The assassin's name is not mentioned, but probably it is known to the authorities; perhaps not. Rewards have been advertised for the arrest of the culprit or culprits, and this itself goes to shew that the murderer has made his escape. The deceased was the ruler de facto of Rampore, and by no means a successful ruler. He had begun well. In the time of Nawab Kulb Ali Khan, he bore a high character. But then he was not tried as afterwards. Then he was, by title as by office, General Azimooddeen, and a nominal chief of the military department he was, for the most part. In the succeeding period, he rose in importance as minister, until latterly he became all in all. It was then that a change came o'er the spirit of his dream. From time to time, reports came to us of his growing unpopularity. He was accused of imperious demeanour and high-handed proceedings.

His position was far from a bed of roses. Considerable management is necessary to keep matters straight in a Rohilla state. He managed progressively to alienate the people. At last, in an evil hour, he adopted European habits of life. This was the final blow to the heart of a proud Mussulman population deeply attached to the faith and institutions of Islam and their own traditions. The people did not conceal their dislike and rage at the change. On his side, basking in the sunshine of British favour and support, he did not care to conciliate them. Some years ago, in the life time of the late chief, Nawab Kulb Ali Khan, his Prime Minister, Mahomed Osman Khan, was assassinated, in a mosque, where he had gone to say his prayers, because he had made himself obnoxious to the people by his overbearing conduct towards them. General Azimooddeen should not have forgotten that the population of Rampore were of a peculiar disposition and impatient of high-handed proceedings on the part of the authorities, and he should not have treated them with contempt, simply because he considered himself very strong for them.

The state is now under the protection of the Government of India, as the Nawab is a minor and a ward of Government, and we hope that the chief may not have to suffer in any way, for this untoward occurrence.

THE GAZETTE ON MANIPUR AND THE LATEST INFORMATION.

AN extraordinary Gazette of India has been issued, in which the Government pay their last tribute of mournful respect to the victims of the Manipur catastrophe. The official view is that the Manipuris are guilty of foul play. It is stated that the Government have received confirmation which leaves no room for doubt of the news of the cruel and treacherous murder at Manipur on the night of the 24th ultimo of Mr. W. Quinton and the officers who accompanied him under a flag of truce from the Residency to the Palace of the Regent—as the present Maharaja, in view apparently of eventualities in British policy, is awkwardly called. These officers were Lieutenant-Colonel Skene, Mr. Grimwood, Lieutenant Simpson and Mr. Cossins. Messrs. Melville and O'Brien did not compose the Chief Commissioner's party, but they met the same fate a short while after, at a place 24 miles from Manipur on the Kohima road. What immediate offence, if any, provoked the infatuated Palace party to commit such an act of madness is not, however, quite clear. The story of desecration of temples is, as we expected, abandoned. A different account resting on the authority of the released troops is somewhat more plausible. It is said that the troops which were sent to arrest the Jubraj—otherwise called by his former title of Senapati or generalissimo—in his Palace killed in the fighting, probably by mistake, rather than, we hope, from recklessness; some women and children of his family, and that this may partially account for the ferocity which he displayed towards the captives. This is just possible and, if true, it is had enough. Still British lives are not a bagatelle to be sacrificed to the chivalrous indignation of a Manipuri minister or Crown Prince. The Manipuris are not such a wild people that they do not know their responsibility for murdering British officers of such consequence under such circumstances. We are not disposed, therefore, to pin our faith on this genesis of the outrage. We are afraid the truth has not yet appeared. We regret to see signs of a disposition to conceal the truth about the whole Manipur affair. The most reliable circumstantial information on the subject yet published is that given by Captain Boileau. From this account it would appear that, although the object of Mr. Quinton's mission was kept a profound secret from the Military Officers, there were circumstances enough to arouse alarm. A small detachment with baggage and coolies were left at Sengmai, one march from Manipur town, and an officer was warned that, after a darbar that day, the party would have to return to Sengmai with 80 men. The Chief Commissioner was met four miles from Manipur by the Jubraj with two regiments, and he is reported to have been friendly, and troops lined the road into Manipur at 10 O'clock. So far apparently there was no suspicion in the air. The darbar was ordered at 12, to which the Raja came but without the Jubraj. At this the Chief Commissioner was offended and he refused to see the Raja who left at 3 O'clock, after waiting three hours. According to Captain Boileau, the Manipuris first showed alarm at the disposition of troops about the darbar. But they could not have observed unmoved the entry of the British in such force. The darbar was again ordered at 8 A.M. on the next day, the 23rd, and for a third time at 1 O'clock the same day, with the same result as to the attendance of the Jubraj. The last darbar the Raja also did not attend, and it was now that Manipuri troops were marched into the Raja's Palace and reports of an attack on the Residency were for the first time heard. The night of the 23rd, however, passed off quietly. It was on the next morning that, under the orders of Colonel Skene, Lieutenant Brackenbury and Captain Butcher with 100 men in all marched out to surround the Jubraj's Palace and arrest him, Lieutenant Lugard with 50 men being also directed to support the movement. The attack was a fiasco. The handful were outnumbered by the enemy and were, as reported already, seriously handicapped by want of ammunition. Later on, some more troops on the same small scale, and Colonel Skene himself at the head of some 80 men joined them, without improving the helpless situation of affairs. In the meantime, the Manipuris had commenced a counter-movement. They began to fire upon the Residency and continued firing till the English attack had to be recalled, and the position of those in the Residency was found to be untenable. A letter was sent by the Chief Commissioner to the Raja to which the reply was that an unconditional surrender would alone be granted. Colonel Skene was opposed to such a course. There was a discussion about abandoning the Residency, when as a dernier ressort negotiations were again appealed to. Messrs. Grimwood and Simpson went out and carried on a conversation across the moat and returned saying that the Jubraj would meet the Chief Commissioner, if he would go over to the gateway of the Palace. The Chief Commissioner—who appears to have lost his head from the outset—too easily yielded and, calling Mr. Cossins, went with Messrs. Grimwood and Simpson, Colonel Skene following soon after. The party remained talking for more than an hour—apparently standing. Probably, as another account says, Mr. Grimwood had high words with the Jubraj who cut him down, and as Mr. Quinton after this refused to treat, he too was cut down. Meanwhile, the position of the Residency became more and more critical, but it was still maintained. The garrison, among whom was Mrs. Grimwood, clung to the fond hope that the Chief Commissioner's party might yet return. All such hope at last gave way when the night was far advanced and the shells of the enemy left no choice but flight. The retreat commenced after 1 A.M. The retreating party had constant fighting on the road until they were met by Captain Cowley on the road. Mrs. Grimwood's conduct, both at the Residency while under the enemy's fire and in the way, is the brightest episode in what is otherwise a sad and unfortunate story from beginning to end. She bore herself very bravely at the Residency, thereby sustaining the spirits of the garrison under most adverse circumstances, while if it were not for her knowledge of the country and her skilful guidance out of Manipur, their escape from the hands of the Manipuris hanging on their steps would have been impossible.

Presumably, the Manipuris were goaded to exasperation by the bullying and insults or something else not yet known to which they were subjected, and this must go some way to lighten the burden of their guilt. It is conceivable that these fatalists were tempted to their fate by the actual weakness of the English forces. We speak with hesitation, as a full and thoroughly connected account is not yet forthcoming. The exact nature of Mr. Quinton's instructions is not known. Telegrams are sometimes misleading as the one reporting the death of Koireng. But there is no denying the enormity of the crime which has been committed. Whatever palliating circumstances there might be, the opportunity for urging them with effect has passed away. The stupid miscreants had everything to gain by holding the captives as hostages. They might command the most advantageous terms possible under the circumstances of the case. But their savage butchery places them beyond all claims to quarter. A terrible penalty will have to be paid. The Government have taken the necessary steps to exact full and signal retribution for the atrocious outrage. Troops are converging on Manipur from Burma, Cachar and Kohima.

OPIUM :

OR THE CRAZE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND THE coups OF THE HUMANITARIANS.

Those who expect a great deal from Parliamentary intervention in Indian affairs must by this be rudely shaken out of their dream. The anti-opium resolution just passed is startling in all conscience. We wonder if the Parliamentary majority that triumphantly carried Sir Joseph Pease's motion for the abolition of the opium traffic really expect the Government of India to treat the motion with any serious feelings. It cannot but be a dead letter, and the House of Commons has gratuitously courted its own disgrace. In fact such a sudden measure of philanthropic reform cannot be carried into effect without bringing the administration into a stand-still. The opium traffic may be objectionable on principle. The administration of the department may be guilty of some great abuses. But nevertheless it is an institution of sufficient age to entitle it to considerate treatment at the hands of practical politicians. But ardent humanitarianism sticks at no practical considerations. And the opium revenue must go at its bidding, whether the thing is at all practicable or not.

The House of Commons, we mean the majority that Sir Joseph Pease and the Anti-Opium Society have been able by their long crusade against opium to command on the present occasion, might well have been more moderate in their expectations, if they only knew the fate of a similar resolution carried by themselves not long ago against the excise policy of the Government of India. That policy was condemned and the Government of India were roundly accused of sacrificing the morals of the people to a sordid greed of revenue. The Resolution was passed at the instance of a majority of the same character as now. But has it so far made any difference in the ways of the administration? No such thing. On the contrary, beyond eliciting a strong and voluminous rejoinder from the Government it has done nothing. The every-day administration holds the even tenor of its way, and our excise is managed now very much as it has been before. We do not say that the Excise Resolution passed by the Commons was not a well-intentioned measure. We have denounced the excise system as bitterly as any. For the motives and high character of the gentlemen who voted for either of the two Resolutions one cannot but feel the highest respect. But the reform of such administrative abuses is hardly brought about except by enlisting the sympathy of the responsible Government. They must be conciliated and not outraged. For the rest the Government may well be credited with good honest intentions in these matters like their critics. There are practical difficulties which with all their advantages they may really be unable to cope with. These difficulties lie sometimes in the very constitution of things. Excise for instance has for about a century puzzled the ingenuity of the highest Revenue officers to solve its intricacies. A general and sweeping condemnation of a system must therefore fail of its mark, while moderate criticisms directed against particular details would stand a better chance of success.

As to the opium question, the resolution under consideration is more unwise than its predecessor. The excise resolution did not propose to abolish but merely to regulate the traffic in liquor. The English people are above such an absurdity, but in regard to opium their attitude is different. In fact, it is the attitude which we may be sure a Parliament in India and with a veritable Indian majority in that Parliament would assume on the question of the liquor traffic. If the Congress had its sanguine dreams realized and we had a House of Indian Representatives sitting at Calcutta, would it at all be an improbability for such a House to work itself up to a fit of sentimental zeal for temperance and vote away all wineries and distilleries from the country? They would treat opium with more consideration as a thing which has held its ground among Orientals, much as Alcohol among Westerners. But their zeal against the one would be as infructuous as the zeal of Sir Joseph Pease's party against opium. It is simply impossible for our Government to do without the revenue opium gives. In these days of fickle exchange, any considerable sacrifice of existing resources is out of the question. Next to Land Revenue, the opium is the main stay of our finances. How supremely absurd must now appear any proposal for sweeping it away with one stroke of the pen!

THE PAL CHOWDHURIS OF RANAGHAT . UNDER A BAN.

LOCAL SELF GOVERNMENT AT STAKE

Now that Gobardhan has been hunted out of the land of the living and all the beating of breasts and wringing of hands and gnashing of teeth and tearing of hair have failed to secure him a fresh lease of life, Babu Surendra Nath Pal Chowdhuri should no longer be in sackcloth and ashes. He had better leave the Sanatan Dharma to shift itself as best it can, and take care of number one. Patriots there are enough and to spare--for patriotism is the last refuge of scoundrels, the Leviathan of literature being my authority. Having more time than they know what to do with, they are ready to go to heaven or to the place never mentioned to ears polite--if they have not already been there--in search of that Promethian fire that might "relume the light" of their deceased darling. But who is there to save his great house from the combined hostility of powers mundane and celestial, but himself? The stars of the Pal Chowdhuris are evidently not on the ascendant. They have long since been overtaken by clouds and storms--and are just now only a wreck of their former self. But the fly in the ointment is that they are no longer in the good graces of the powers that be. In graceless compliance with the wishes of a still more graceless magistrate, the Government is determined to place them under a ban. The fiat has gone forth that they must be excluded from the honorary offices of the state. Babu Jogesh Chunder Pal Chowdhuri—whose like is not to be found in the whole District—whom the Government exceptionally, though by no means adequately, honored by vesting him with powers of a 2nd class independent magistrate, has been called upon to resign his seat on the bench. The Magistrate was for his removal but the Divisional Commissioner has thought fit to give him the option of resignation. If there is one Honorary Magistrate more than another who discharges his duties with an amount of ability and zeal that can only be equalled by his conscientiousness, it is this gentleman of sterling worth both of head and heart. As a magistrate and the chairman of the Ranaghat municipality, he has indeed achieved an impossibility. Though not seeking the approbation of any one but his own internal monitor, he has won the golden opinion of all sorts of people—nay, he has cast a spell on the public mind that nothing can break. They don't miss even his cousin Surendra Nath. But popular or unpopular, the Government will have none of him. A publican, a pickpocket and a pander, a boor, a blackguard and a blockhead may deal out justice without compromising the credit of the Government, but not Babu Jogesh, however rare a specimen of humanity he may be. But what atrocious crime of his has drawn upon his devoted head the displeasure of the deities? His offence is that he is the son of his father. He is a Zemindar that would, unlike a neighbouring municipality, hold his own. It is more possible for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a landholder, who will not be dispossessed of an inch of his "paternal acre," to avoid getting into a quarrel. He can certainly afford not to be an aggressor. But should one smite him on his right cheek, you can't expect him to be more Christian than a Christian and turn to him the other also. And once in quarrel, he must "bear it that the opposed may beware of him," or his prestige is at stake. But to the point. Babu Jogesh was mulcted in the sum of Rs. 500 in a criminal case brought against him and his cousin Surendra by a rival Zemindar. Though he and Babu Surendra did not get any scent of the fracas either at the time of its occurrence or beforehand, not to speak of taking any active part in it, he was convicted. This conviction (by the way a good Homer may sometimes nod—but not an Indian Judge, as you know perhaps too well) has all but cost him his magistracy and bids fair to be an awful spring of woes unnumbered to him and his family. Whoever be the keeper of gubernatorial conscience, the scruples of our Government do not seem to obey any known law. It can swallow a camel and yet strain at a gnat. Blessed are they who pickpocket and lie with their neighbours' wives—for honors will be showered on them. Blessed are they who bamboozle and barter away their honor for a mess of pottage, for theirs is the grace of the gods. Woe unto them that are direct and honest, for they shall be in danger of hell fire even in this world.

Not that Jogesh cares two straws for the so-called honors. No one knows better than he that honors have in these days been so much dishonored, that sterling worth, unhonored, is honored the most. Let honors be sought by those whom they level up; but why should those whom they level down cast a longing, lingering look on them.

The sadder part of the story has yet to be told. It is a strange Government, this of ours. It will not only make Babu Jogesh disgorge his magistracy but—if the people take into their head to recognise his devoted public spirit by conferring on him the highest honor in their gift, I mean the Lord Mayoralty—it will stand in the way. It wants the people to join in boycotting the Babu. Bad enough, sad enough, and disgraceful enough as the statement may be, it is nonetheless a fact. The Magistrate actually wrote to his subservient Deputy to take care that the ogre might not be re-elected to the chair.

But the opponents were utterly discomfited. They did not even formally put forward their candidate. Making a virtue of necessity—and with such grace as they could command, good, bad or indifferent—they proposed their very lieu vuide to the chair. But matters have not ended there. Instigated by the Deputy, the Magistrate has let fly the last but not the least arrow from his quiver. The Government has been asked not to approve the resolution electing the Babu to the chair. It has been on the wind for the last two months, that should the Ranaghat people rechoose Babu Jogesh to be their Lord Mayor, the Government would not sanction the proceedings. But the people would thrust upon him the chairmanship, and would take no refusal. Their representatives went so far as to give him a distinct pledge, that they would re-elect him as often as the Government would withhold its sanction. I can answer you, Mr. Editor, that they would stick to their resolution even to the supersession of the municipality. Will you, Sir, in the interests of self-government which you succeeded, by extraordinary exertions and against fearful odds, in procuring for the metropolis, wield your powerful pen and dissuade the Government from surrendering its judgment hoodwinked to the fascination of the name of a Magistrate or a Commissioner? As the head of the family, Surendra Nath has, of course, come in for a larger share of indignities than his cousin. He is one of the few Bengali Honorary Magistrates in the mofussil that is vested with powers of a Magistrate of the 1st class and can try cases singly. But considering the treatment accorded to him by some churlish Magistrates and snobbish Deputies, he might have been the meanest of Her Majesty's subjects. He has for the third time been asked, and that very recently, to vacate his seat on the Bench, ostensibly on the ground of his protracted absence from home but really because he is a veritable Dr. Fell whom the Government does not like, it knows not why. But bully him into throwing up his magistracy, the Government can never. From his tenacity of magisterial life, a cat may take a lesson.

One can't always have his wits about him. Even an old bird is sometimes caught with chaff. With all his astuteness, Surendra Nath has been made a fool of by the cunning Kayastha Huzurling of Ranaghat. He was asked by the latter gentleman as to whether he was willing to be nominated a commissioner. He did not know that it was a mere blind, and replied in the affirmative. It is passing strange that it did not occur to him that the Deputy did not, indeed he could not, mean to submit his name to the Government with whom he is no longer a persona grata. He only wanted to enjoy the humiliation which his dupe would feel when the list of nominated aldermen was published in the Gazette, his name being nowhere. The people of Ranaghat have so sorely taken to heart the unworthy conduct of the Deputy, that they intend making one of their civic fathers resign, so that their darling may be returned in his place. But my letter has already grown to an inordinate length and I must stop.

ONE BEHIND THE SCENES.

Ranaghat, April 14, 1891.

P. S. Since writing the above, I learn that Baboo Jogesh has resigned his Honorary Magistracy.

THE MOORSHEEDABAD DEED OF SETTLEMENT

The following Act of the Governor-General of India in Council received the assent of His Excellency the Governor-General on the 21st March, 1891.

Act No. XV of 1891.

An Act to confirm and give effect to an Indenture between the Secretary of State and the Nawab Bahadur of Moorsheedabad, Amir-ul-Omrah.

Whereas it is expedient to confirm and give effect to the indenture which is set forth in the schedule to this Act and which was made the twelfth day of March, 1891, between the Secretary of State for India in Council of the one part and Intisham-ul-Mulk Rais-ud Dowlah Amir-ul-Omrah Nawab Sir Syud Hussan Ali Khan Bahadur Mohabat Jung, G.C.I.E., Nawab Bahadur of Moorsheedabad, eldest son of His late Highness Moontazin-ul-Mulk Mohsen-ud-Dowlah Fureedoon Jah Syud Monsoor Ali Khan Bahadur, Nusrat Jung, late Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa of the other part; It is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. (1) This Act may be called the Moorsheedabad Act, 1891; and

(2) It shall come into force at once.

2. The said indenture is hereby confirmed.

3. (1) The Governor General in Council, by notification in the Gazette of India, may in his discretion, on the written request of the Nawab Bahadur of Moorsheedabad for the time being, add, in such form as the Governor General in Council may think fit, to the schedules of immoveable property which are annexed to the said indenture any additional immoveable property which may be acquired from time to time for the maintenance of the position and dignity of the Nawab Bahadur of Moorsheedabad for the time being.

(2) No such notification as is referred to in sub-section (1) shall be made without such previous publication as would be necessary under section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1887, in the case of a rule to be made under an enactment to which that section applies.

(3) The publication in the Gazette of India of such a notification, as having been made by the Governor General in Council, shall, subject to any further order of the Governor General in Council, be conclusive proof with respect to the subject-matter of the notification.

4. No right to any immoveable property mentioned in any of the schedules to the said indenture, or in any addition which under the last foregoing section may from time to time be made to those schedules or any of them, shall, if the right has not accrued before the passing of this Act, be acquired by any person by adverse possession or assertion of title unless such adverse possession or assertion of title is found to have existed for sixty years.

5. All property, moveable and immoveable, mentioned in the said indenture, or in any of the schedules thereto or in any addition which under section 3 may from time to time be made to those schedules or any of them, shall descend and, subject to the provisions of the said indenture, be enjoyed for ever by the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad for the time being.

6. The said indenture shall for all the purposes of all enactments for the time being in force be admissible in evidence and have in all other respects the same effect as if it had been duly stamped and registered in such manner as those enactments, or any of them, or any rule or order under any of them, may require.

THE SCHEDULE.

(See preamble and following sections.)

HER MAJESTY'S SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL, TO

NAWAB SIR SYUD HUSSAN ALI BAHADOOR.

THIS INDENTURE made the twelfth day of March 1891 between the Secretary of State for India in Council (hereinafter called "the Secretary of State") of the one part and Ihtisham-ul-Mulk Raisud Dowlah Amir-ul-Omrah Nawab Sir Syud Hussan Ali Khan Bahadur Mohabut Jung, G.C.I.E., Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad (hereafter called "the said Nawab Bahadur") eldest son of His late Highness Moontazim ul Mulk Mohsen ud Dowlah Fureedoon Jah Syud Monsoor Ali Khan Bahadur Nusrut Jung late Nawab Nazim of Bengal Behar and Orissa (who is hereinafter referred to as "the said Nawab Nazim") of the other part. Whereas the said Nawab Nazim in the year 1838 being then a minor of about the age of ten years succeeded by hereditary descent to the honours and dignities of the Nizamut and Subahdary of Bengal Behar and Orissa and was thereupon declared in and by a proclamation issued and published by and under the authority of the Governor General of India in Council for the time being to be the Nawab Nazim and Subahdar of the Provinces of Bengal Behar and Orissa and to have assumed and to exercise the authority dignities and privileges of the said office and dignity under the style and the title of Moontazim ul Mulk Mohsen ud Dowlah Fureedoon Jah Syud Monsoor Ali Khan Bahadur Nusrut Jung. And whereas the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal Behar and Orissa and their families have under and by virtue of certain treaties and engagements with the British Government received out of the revenues of the Provinces of Bengal Behar and Orissa certain allowances and stipends including the personal stipend of the Nawab Nazim hereinafter mentioned. And whereas under various arrangements and in course of the administration of the allowances and stipends secured as aforesaid to the said Nawabs Nazim and their families certain funds known as "Nizamut Deposit Fund" the "Munnee Begum Fund" and the "Moorshedabad Agency Fund" were created and formed the accumulations of which applicable to the support of the title and dignity of the said Nawabs Nazim and their families aggregated at the date of the Indenture of the 1st day of November 1880 hereinafter mentioned about the sum of one crore of rupees. And whereas certain questions and differences arose between the said Nawab Nazim and the Government of India upon several matters concerning the position and affairs of himself and the members and dependents of his family known as the Nizamut family. And whereas with a view to the settlement of such questions and differences the said Nawab Nazim in the year 1869 with the sanction of the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council left Moorshedabad the usual place of residence of the said Nawab Nazim and proceeded to England where he remained and resided until the period hereinafter mentioned and where he preferred in person to Her Majesty's Government several complaints and claims arising out of the said questions and differences. And whereas in the year 1873 the Government of India passed an Act (namely Act No. XVII of 1873) called the "Nawab Nazim's Debts Act 1873" whereby after reciting inter alia that with respect to certain jewels and immoveable property it was disputed whether they belonged absolutely to the said Nawab Nazim or were held by the Government of India for the purpose of upholding the dignity of the Nawab Nazim for the time being and that litigation had consequently arisen between the creditors of the said Nawab Nazim and the Government of India and reciting that the Government of India was desirous of settling the said dispute as to the said jewels and immoveable property it was enacted (inter alia) that the Commissioners thereby directed to be appointed should ascertain what jewels and immoveable property were held by the Government of India for the purpose of upholding the dignity of the Nawab Nazim for the time and should certify the particulars of such jewels and property and that their finding thereon should be binding and conclusive on all persons whomsoever. And whereas by the said Act the said Commissioners were also directed to ascertain and certify the amount due and owing in respect of the debts and liabilities incurred by the said Nawab Nazim in India. And whereas the Government of India subsequently in discharge and in satisfaction of the debts of the said Nawab Nazim which were ascertained and certified as aforesaid by the Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the said Act paid the sum of Rs. 16,85,461-7-5½. And whereas the money required for the purposes of such payment was provided out of the said Nawab Nazim's personal stipend. And whereas the said Nawab Nazim preferred certain claims against the said Secretary of State in respect of the arrears of his said personal stipend and of other pecuniary claims against the Government of India and in respect of certain jewels and other moneys and property claimed by the said Nawab Nazim on various accounts connected with the Nizamut and otherwise. And whereas by Indenture dated the 1st day of November 1880 it was agreed between the said Secretary of State and the said Nawab Nazim that the said Nawab Nazim should be paid and should accept and he was paid and accepted the sum of ten lakhs of rupees in full satisfaction and discharge of all his personal claims of what nature or kind soever against the Government of India whether connected with or arising out of the Nizamut or otherwise the said sum being made up of the following particulars namely---

	Rs.
Out of the balance of personal stipend to 31 October 1880	7,53,642
Balance of advance of Rs. 4,00,000 from deposit fund made in 1869 to permit of the said Nawab Nazim proceeding to England	1,50,000
Value of jewels	96,358
TOTAL	10,00,000

And whereas by the report and certificate of the Commissioners appointed under the said Nawab Nazim's Debts Act 1873 bearing date the 13th day of December 1875 the said Commissioners certified and declared that the immoveable property and jewels respectively specified in the schedules annexed to their said report and certificate and numbered respectively I II and V were State property as therein defined and they annexed to such report and certificate a schedule numbered IV showing the rentals payable for the land and buildings included in the said schedules I and II to their said report and the names of the persons to whom such rentals were paid. And whereas by and with the previous sanction of the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council certain of the immoveable properties and jewels specified in schedules I V and VI of the said report and certificate of the said Commissioners have already been sold or are directed to be sold for the purposes hereinafter specified and the remainder of the immoveable properties specified in the said schedules I and II to the said report of the said Commissioners are the properties mentioned and specified in schedules Nos. I and II attached to these presents. And whereas the said Nawab Nazim returned from England to India in the month of October 1881 and died at Moorshedabad on the 5th day of November 1884 leaving the said Nawab Bahadur his eldest son surviving him. And whereas it is not considered by the Secretary of State necessary or desirable to maintain any longer the office title position dignities allowances and privileges of Nawab Nazim of Bengal Behar and Orissa. And whereas by a Sanad of His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India dated the 17th February 1882 the title of Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad has been granted to the said Nawab Bahadur. And whereas by a notification of the Government of India dated the 20th July 1887 the further title of Amir-ul-Omrah has been also granted by His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General of India to the said Nawab Bahadur. And whereas the said titles of Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir ul Omrah carry with them the precedence rank dignity and privileges of the premier noble of the Provinces of Bengal Behar and Orissa and are descendible to the lineal heirs male of the said Nawab Bahadur according to the custom of primogeniture the eldest male of the eldest branch being preferred. And whereas it has been agreed between the Secretary of State and the said Nawab Bahadur that such provision shall be made for the maintenance and support of the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul Omrah for the time being and for the maintenance of the honour and dignity of his station as is hereinafter contained and that in consideration thereof the said Nawab Bahadur shall for him, his heirs and successors in the said station relinquish all claim to the said position and dignity of Nawab Nazim of Bengal Behar and Orissa in manner hereinafter appearing and execute such release in respect of the stipend pay allowances properties privileges and rights thereof or appertaining thereto as is hereinafter contained. And whereas it has been agreed between the Secretary of State and the said Nawab Bahadur that the provision to be made as aforesaid for the support and maintenance of the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah and for the maintenance of the honour and dignity of his station shall comprise and consist of the following particulars namely:--

1st---An annual payment of Rs. 2,30,000 from the revenues of the Government of British India to be made to the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad for the time being in manner hereinafter mentioned.

2nd---The income of the immoveable properties mentioned and specified in the said 1st and 2nd Schedules to these presents.

3rd---The income of the immoveable properties mentioned in the 3rd Schedule to these presents as purchased with the sale proceeds of the jewels mentioned and specified in Schedules V and VI to the said report and certificate of the said Commissioners and all properties that may in future be purchased with the sale proceeds of the said jewels.

4th---The income of properties purchased with the sale proceeds of such of the immoveable properties mentioned and specified in the 1st, 2nd and 3rd Schedules to these presents as may at any time with the sanction of His Excellency the Governor General in Council be disposed of.

And whereas various members of the family of the said late Nawab Nazim other than the said Nawab Bahadur are as such in receipt of or entitled to certain stipends allowances and pay respectively payable to them by the Government of India and it is not intended by these presents to affect or interfere with such stipends allowances or pay respectively. Now THIS INDENTURE WITNESSETH that in pursuance of the said agreement between the Secretary of State and the said Nawab Bahadur and in consideration of the premises and of the conferring of the titles of Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah as hereinbefore appears and of the provision hereinafter made or expressed and intended so to be for the support and maintenance of himself and his successors in the position and station of Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah and for the maintenance of the honour and dignity of the said station and saving and without prejudice to any of the said provisions the said Nawab Bahadur hath for himself his heirs and successors relinquished and released and doth hereby for ever relinquish and release all claims and demands to the rank dignity and position of Nawab Nazim and Subahdar of Bengal Behar and Orissa and to the title of Nawab Nazim and the authority dignity stipend pay allowances privileges and rights thereof or in any wise thereunto annexed or appertaining or therewith enjoyed and doth hereby release and discharge the Secretary of State his successors and assigns and the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council and each and every of their servants and agents respectively of and from all actions claims and demands whatsoever that could be brought or made by him or his heirs or successors for or in respect of the said title position authority dignity stipend pay allowances privileges and rights as aforesaid and for and in respect of any act deed matter or thing whatsoever done, or omitted by the Secretary of State or the Viceroy and Governor General of India in Council or any of their servants or agents acting officially in relation to or affecting the interests or claims of the said Nawab Nazim. And THIS INDENTURE FURTHER WITNESSETH that in further pursuance of the said agreement and for the considerations aforesaid the Secretary of State for himself and his successors doth hereby covenant with the said Nawab Bahadur and each one of his lineal heirs male who shall succeed in the manner above recited to the title of Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah that the Secretary of State and his successors shall and will for the due maintenance and support of the said titles of Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah and the position and station thereto attaching and of the honour and dignity thereof pay or cause to be paid annually for ever from the revenues of the Government of India unto the said Nawab Bahadur and his lineal heirs male in perpetuity the sum of rupees two lakhs and thirty thousand by equal monthly instalments of rupees nineteen thousand one hundred and sixty-six ten annas and eight pies by monthly instalments on or before the 5th day of each and every succeeding month from the Treasury of the Government of India at Berhampore and it is hereby further agreed and declared by and between the Secretary of State and the said Nawab Bahadur that the several immoveable properties mentioned and specified in the 1st and 2nd Schedules to these presents and also the immoveable property mentioned and specified in the 3rd Schedule thereto (being the immoveable property that has been purchased with the sale proceeds of certain of the jewels mentioned and specified in the V and VI Schedules to the said report and certificate) and also all other the immoveable properties that shall hereafter be purchased with the sale proceeds of any of the said jewels mentioned and specified in the said last mentioned schedules and further all the properties purchased with the sale proceeds of such of the immoveable properties mentioned and specified in the 1st 2nd and 3rd Schedules to these presents as may at any time with the sanction of His Excellency the Governor General in Council be disposed of shall henceforth and for ever be held and enjoyed by the said Nawab Bahadur and such one among his lineal heirs male as may be successively entitled to hold the said titles in perpetuity with and subject to the incidents powers limitations and conditions as to inalienability and otherwise herein-after contained that is to say---

1st---The said Nawab Bahadur shall not nor shall any of his successors in the said titles sell mortgage devise or alienate the said properties respectively or any of them otherwise than by lease or demise for a term not exceeding 21 years and under a rent without bonus or salamee.

2nd---It shall be lawful for the Secretary of State and his successors from time to time if any default shall be made in payment of the Government revenue or rates or taxes payable to Government in respect of any of the said immoveable properties to empower the officer in charge of the Treasury at Berhampore or other proper officer to deduct from and retain out of the said monthly sum of Rs. 19,166-10-8 herein before covenanted to be paid the amount of any Government revenue or rates or taxes aforesaid payable in respect of the said immoveable properties or any of them.

3rd---The said Nawab Bahadur and such of his lineal heirs male as shall in succession be entitled to hold the said titles shall maintain and keep in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear and the effects of time fire and earthquake and injury done by public enemies or by overwhelming force excepted) all the messuages tenements houses and buildings now standing or being upon any of the said immoveable properties mentioned and described in the said 1st and 2nd Schedules to these presents respectively (save and except the messuages tenements houses and buildings mentioned and specified in Schedule 2B hereto which the said Nawab Bahadur and his heirs male successors as aforesaid respectively shall be under no obligation to maintain or repair) and also all the messuages tenements houses and buildings hereafter to be purchased with the sale proceeds of any of the said jewels mentioned and specified in the said V and VI Schedules to the report and certificate aforesaid and of any of the immoveable properties mentioned and specified in the 1st 2nd and 3rd Schedules to these presents or that may be erected or built upon any land so to be purchased but it shall be lawful for the said Nawab Bahadur and his heirs male aforesaid successors to the said position and station of Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah from time to time at his or their will and pleasure and discretion to pull down and remove all or any of the said messuages tenements houses and buildings mentioned and specified in the Schedule 2B hereto which are no longer required and to sell and dispose of the materials thereof and apply and dispose of the said materials or the sale proceeds thereof for his or their own use and benefit and in such manner as he or they shall think fit.

In case the said Nawab Bahadur or any of his lineal heirs male successors to the titles shall at any time in contravention of the terms of these presents attempt to sell mortgage devise or alienate (otherwise than by such lease or demise as aforesaid) any of the immoveable properties aforesaid or shall by a course of extravagance or by waste or mismanagement of their said immoveable properties in the opinion of the Secretary of State for the time being disable himself from duly maintaining the dignity of the said position and station then and from time to time whenever and as often as the same shall happen it shall be lawful for the Secretary of State for the time being at his discretion to enter into and upon the said immoveable properties and to hold and take possession thereof and receive and take the rents issues and profits thereof and also to take and retain the said monthly sum of Rs. 19,166-10-8 payable from the Government Treasury at Berhampore as hereinbefore mentioned for such period during the lifetime of Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah so acting as aforesaid as to the said Secretary of State shall seem necessary or expedient and the net rents issues and profits of the said immoveable properties and the said monthly sum of Rs. 19,166-10-8 shall be received and taken by the Secretary of State as aforesaid shall be applied for the benefit of the said Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah for the time being for the maintenance of the position and dignity of the said Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah for the time being in such manner as the Secretary of State in his discretion shall think proper PROVIDED ALWAYS and it is hereby agreed and declared between and by the said parties to these presents that nothing herein contained shall apply to or affect any property moveable or immoveable of the said Nawab Bahadur his heirs representatives or assigns not being property included in any of the Schedules to these presents or not being property purchased with the sale proceeds of the jewels or lands hereinbefore mentioned or not being property mentioned in the next following proviso. Provided further that all furniture equipages boats horses camels and elephants in or about the Palace and the Imambara and belonging to the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad and Amir-ul-Omrah for the time being at the time of his decease shall be the property of and shall be enjoyed by his successor as such. In witness whereof the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

"SUFFICIENT UNTO THE DAY IS THE EVIL THEREOF."

BY THE REV. MR. CHRISTIE, OF EDINBURGH.

OH, by that gracious rule,
Were we but wise to steer,
On the wide sea of thought,
What moments trouble fraught
Were spared us here.

But we, perverse and blind,
As covetous of pain,
Not only seek for more
Yet hidden—but live o'er
The past again.

This life is called brief,
Man, on the earth but crawls
His threescore years and ten,
And best fourscore—and then
The ripe fruit falls.

Yet, betwixt birth and death,
Were but the life of man
By his thoughts measured,
To what an age would spread
That little span.

There are who 're born and die,
Eat, sleep, walk, rest between,
Talk, act by clock-work too,
So pass in order due
Over the scene.

With these the past is past,
The future nothing yet ;
And so from day to day
They breathe, till called to pay
The last great debt.

Their life in truth is brief,
A speck, a point of time :
Whether in good old age
Endeth their pilgrimage,
Or in its prime.

But other some there are,
I call them not more wise,
With whom the restless mind
Still lingereth behind,
Or forward flies.

With these things pass away,
But past things are not dead,
In the heart's treasury,
Deep, hidden deep, they lie
Unwithered.

And there the soul retires,
From the dull things that are,
To mingle oft and long
With the time-hallowed throng
Of those that were.

Then into life start on
The scenes long vanished ;
Then we behold again
The forms that long have lain
Among the dead.

We feel their grasp of love,
We meet their beaming eye,
We hear their voice—ah, no !
'T was our own murmuring low
Unconsciously.

The years shift on and on,
Years rapidly pass by,
And now still watch we keep,
As in disturbed sleep
The sick doth lie.

We gaze on some pale face,
Seen by the dim watch-light,
Shuddering, we gaze and pray,
And weep, and wish away
The long, long night.

And yet minutest things,
That mark time's heavy tread,
Are on the tortured brain,
With self-protracting pain,
Deep minuted.

The drops with trembling hand,
Love steadied, poured out,
The draught replenished,
The label oft re-read,
With nervous doubt.

The watch that ticks so loud,
The winding it for one
Whose hand lies powerless,
And then the fearful guess
"That this hath run."

The shutter half unclosed,
As the night wears away,
Ere the last stars are set,
The few that linger yet,
To welcome day.

The moon so oft invoked,
That bringeth no relief,
From which, with sick'ning sight,
We turn as if its light
But marked our grief.

Oh, never after dawn
For us the east shall streak,
But we shall see again,
With the same thoughts as then,
That pale day break.

The desolate awakening,
When first we feel alone ;
Dread memories are these,
Yet who for thoughtless ease
Would exchange one.

These are the soul's hid wealth,
Relics embalmed in tears ;
Anon her curious eye
Searcheth futurity
The depth of years.

And there, in early life,
Enchanted land she sees,
Blue skies, and sun-bright bowers,
Reflected--and tall towers
On glassy seas.

But heavy clouds collect
Over that bright blue sky ;
And rough winds rend the trees.
And lash the glassy seas
To billows high.

And then the next thing seen
By that dim light, may be,
With helm and rudder lost,
A lone wreck, tempest tost.
On the dark sea.

Thus doth the soul extend
Her brief existence here,
Thus multiplieth she,
Yea, to infinity,
Her short career

Presumptuous and unwise,
As if the present sum
Were little of life's woe--
Why seeketh she to know
Ills yet to come?

Look up--look up, my soul
To loftier mysteries,
Trust in his word to thee,
Who saith "All tears shall be Wiped from all eyes"

And when thou turnest back,
Oh what can charm thee here ?
Seek out the spots of light
On "memory's waste" yet bright
Or if too near

To desolate plains they lie,
All dark with guilt and tears
Still, still retrace the past,
Till thou alight at last
On life's first years

Then not a passing cloud
Obscures the sunny scene,
No blight on the young tree,
No thought of what may be,
Or what hath been.

But all in hope--not hope,
For all things are possessed :
No peace without alloy,
And innocence and joy,
In the young breast.

And all confiding love,
And holy ignorance ;
Their blessed veil soon torn
From eyes foredoom'd to mourn
For man's offence.

Oh ! thither, weary spirit,
Flee from this world defiled ;
How oft, heart sick and sore,
I've wished I were once more
A little child.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE weather in town had for sometime been waxing hot, with scorching winds blowing in the middle of the day, followed latterly by clouds towards the close. On Tuesday, rain seemed imminent from the appearance of the heavens in the South. Since then the sultriness has somewhat abated. In the country, it seems in some places worse than even here. At Faridpore, hot winds blew even at night. Thank God ! we have had no such experience. Indeed, we do not understand the difference.

A TRUE Queen mother have we for our sovereign and no mistake. The following from the European Correspondent of the Pioneer will be read with pleasure by every subject of the great Empire :--

"The Queen's enjoyment of Grasse is greatly damped by the sad news of Manipur. Every day the band of the French regiment play under the windows of Her Majesty's apartment. On Tuesday, however, Her Majesty was so disturbed by the news of the fighting at Manipur and by the death of Earl Granville as to feel quite unfit for any kind of enjoyment. When, therefore, the band presented itself to await orders she sent Sir Henry Ponsonby down to thank the bandmaster, and to express her great regret that she could not listen with pleasure to the music."

THIS will come home to the bosom of every Indian :--

"Some attention was attracted to a circumstance when the Queen embarked in the yacht to convey her to the en route for Grasse. She leaned on the arm of her Indian attendant while the Duke of Connaught walked behind. It is now gossiped that Her Majesty, who is faithful in her likes as she is pronounced in her aversions, has put the Indian in the place occupied by the famous John Brown. The Indian successor to John Brown began to take rank about the time of the Jubilee. He is a splendid fellow, stalwart but supple, gifted with the courtly dignity that comes natural alike to well-bred Hindu or Mahomedan. He has also the gentleness of a woman and the reverence of a child. To him the Sovereign is more than Queen of Great Britain ; she is Empress of nearly 300 millions of his fellow-subjects in India. His qualities commended him to Her Majesty as a suitable personal attendant. He now rides at the back of the Queen's carriage and leads her pony. He is ever by her side ready to fetch, carry and--greatest honour of all--he is permitted to lend his arms as a support to his Royal Mistress's steps when she is weary, if the way is difficult or her injured knee is troublesome. Hence he has been detailed to accompany Her Majesty on her foreign holiday with other favourite belongings, such as a stout sleek donkey and the Queen's bed. Her Majesty has a fancy to lie on one bed only, and wherever she goes the bed is taken with her."

Loyalty is a duty, but it becomes a delight when its objective is such a sovereign as Victoria.

THE Statesman, of Wednesday, solemnly, in its editorial columns, communicates to its readers the following obscure and enigmatical information :--

"The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal leaves Darjeeling for Simla on the 1st of May."

That is the whole editorial. Not a word more or less. This, to be sure, is provoking. The date of the Lieutenant-Governor's departure from Calcutta, where he is now, is not given. Nor the purpose of the journey to the summer retreat of the Viceroy. Surely, Olympus Senior has not invited Olympus Junior to a picnic or a dance at this trying season ! Is it to confer on Manipur that the comparatively new Viceroy seeks the counsel of the trusted Councillor of the veteran Dufferin ? Do the great public works in contemplation as the sequelæ to the chastisement of the doomed inhabitants of the North-Eastern frontier demand Sir Charles Elliott's advice at Simla ?

WE congratulate the Maharaja of Durbhanga on having come to his own. The Behar Herald which ought to know says that he is now managing the Raj himself. This will be welcome news to a large circle of friends, Indian and European, as implying that the Maharaja has been sufficiently restored to health.

Mr. Llewellyn, the manager of the Durbhanga Raj, has resigned and left the country—to the relief of the Chief and his people, who, for one thing, will no longer be compelled to spell an unpronounceable Cambrian name.

WE read—

"Many ladies are practising as dentists in Dresden; the delicacy of their manipulation makes them very popular."

We don't doubt in the least. The operation so painful when performed by the rude hand of Adam or his sons, must be delicious executed under the benign influence of Eve or her fair daughters. We wonder whether at Dresden they use vulgar metallic extractors or their own dainty front teeth? There is nothing like woman for extracting the tooth of wisdom in man.

WHAT a progress urban arboriculture has made in our day! Of course, in this as in other matters, brave Jonathan goes ahead of all others. At Washington alone, as many as 65,000 trees are maintained, at an annual cost of about a Rupee and a quarter per each young tree.

HERE is dreadful news:—

"Influenza is ravaging Chicago and there have been hundreds of deaths daily. The streets leading to the graveyards are completely blocked with funerals, and many hundreds of bodies are awaiting burial. Pittsburg and other populous centres are suffering only less severely."

So this Influenza is not only a nasty but a formidable disease. As it has been imported to this country, it behoves us all to take particular care to guard against its attack.

PREPARATORY, we suppose, to Sir Charles Dilke's reintroduction to society and the political sphere, the ever liberal Prince of Wales has lately been found on the public promenade riding slowly up and down with the baronet and Lady Dilke.

THE Parsees are the most munificent people on earth, and just now the Petit family have taken the lead among them in good work. Sir Dinshaw Petit's second son, Nusserwanjee Manockjee of the same ilk, has just given half a lac to the Charitable Dispensary.

SYED Mahomed Ibrahim Hosain Khan, second son of the late Nawab Syed Lutf Ali Khan, of Goozree, Patna, is beginning to be liberal with his purse. He has offered two sums of Rs. 2,000 each for two scholarships to be named after the present ruler of Bengal and his lady. The one is to be competed for in the Patna Collegiate School and awarded to the Mahomedan standing highest in the Entrance Examination. The other is to draw female Mahomedan students from Behar to the Medical College for the Lady Dufferin Fund Association. His scheme is that preference should be given to a successful lady student who has passed the F. A. Examination, failing that to an Entrance-passed student in preference to others; and that, should there be no such student in any given year, two scholarships may be given, instead of one, the next year. In the absence of such students for five successive years, the whole of the accumulated interest is to be transferred to the Lady Dufferin Fund for its general purposes.

MR. P. C. Lyon, officiates as Under-Secretary to the Government of India in the Revenue and Agricultural Department in place of Mr. Muir-Mackenzie, Captain J. W. Currie doing the duties of Private Secretary to the Lieutenant-Governor.

THE Hon'ble H. J. S. Cotton having gone on furlough of seven months, Mr. H. H. Risley, who has just completed his work on the ethnology of Bengal, has taken up the duties of the Secretary to the Bengal Government in the Financial and Municipal Departments to which has just been retransferred the work of the medical department to the relief of the Chief Secretary.

MR. C. H. Reily having left India on leave, Mr. Gordon Leith acts both as Deputy Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs and as Assistant Secretary to the Government of Bengal in the Legislative Department.

MR. R. B. Buckley, Temporary Superintending Engineer, just returned from furlough, has been deputed by the Local Government to enquire into the system of canal administration in Orissa. He is to report within six months.

MR. A. Phillips has taken leave, Mr. L. P. Pugh officiates as Standing Counsel for the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal.

IT is notified that, in connection with the settlement of rents in the Sonthal Pergunnahs, an appeal shall lie from the order of the Settlement Officer to the Deputy Commissioner, and from the Deputy Commissioner, where he differs from the Settlement Officer, to the Commissioner.

THE next Criminal Sessions will begin on Wednesday, the 29th April, Mr. Justice Hill presiding.

A BOY, Avadh Kishore, obtained a Middle Scholarship for Behar Circle. It turned out, however, that, instead of being rightly shewn as a private student, he was wrongly entered as a candidate from the Gya Cheap School. His scholarship has, therefore, been cancelled and awarded to a student of the Aurungabad Middle English School. And what of the Cheap and nasty?

FROM Shibpore, on the other bank of the river opposite Fort William, the complaint comes that Baboo Upendra C. Mitter's appointment as Chairman has not yet been gazetted, although it is nearly two months since that gentleman was elected. At the same meeting, Babu Nursing Dutt was chosen for vice.

Since the above was written, Baboo Mitter's election has been confirmed.

OUR contemporary of the Indian Daily News will please note that Topsy "grewed" not "gtew."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Birthday of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress of India will be kept in India, as in England, on Saturday, the 30th May 1891.

THE penitent Prodigal having made his peace with his patrons, has returned to duty or show of it. The peace was ratified at appropriate time and place. Choosing his own day, Maharaja Dhuleep Singh, on the first of this month, went to Grasse and waited upon Her Majesty the Queen-Empress. For nearly an hour the sovereign mother conversed with her truant boy. The forgiveness of Victoria is like a true woman's and a mother's, though the policy of forgetfulness of Great Britain may be questionable. But the wonder is how, after all that has occurred, could a cub of the Lion ever show his face to the sovereign of England.

THE Governor of French Cochin China, Mr. Piquet, was about to return home, but, in view of the visit of the Czarewitch who was expected at Saigon on the 27th March, he was directed to stay till the 5th April. The importance of the Russian alliance to France required that the future Czar should receive the most cordial and brilliant reception at the chief seat of French Power in the East. It was specially necessary to avoid any contretemps, such as a change in the head of the administration of the Colony might possibly give rise to. But the order of the Paris authorities practically imposes a fine on their Governor of Franco-Indo-China. We wonder whether his loss consequent on his stay and the Imperial visit will be made good.

A HORRIBLE romance of reality culminating in a double tragedy, has lately taken place in British America. The account received is meagre in details and somewhat confused, specially in the geography. So far as we can judge, the facts seem to be these. A resident of Newport, Nova Scotia, named Duval, separating from his wife, left her and, abandoning his old domicile, went with his son to Prince Edward's Island, where he took up residence. Mrs. Duval at Newport, in her husband's absence, gave birth to a child—a daughter, whom she brought up in her house. This was unknown to the family in Prince Edward's Island, inasmuch as the wife never informed the husband of the little addition to her domestic circle, and no periodical return of population of the Newport household was received at Mr. Duval's house. Meanwhile, the child grew up as a little stranger adopted in kindness by the lonely "grass widow" of Newport. Every care was taken of her, but the thought that it was the care of generous humanity rather than natural affection and maternal duty must have been a blow to her advancing consciousness. It was a cruel surprise to hear that she whom she called "mother" was but a friend. In course of time, after the death of Mrs. Duval, the young girl went to Prince Edward's Island. There she caught the eye of young Duval, the son of the Duvals. Mistaking the instinct which drew the boy and the girl towards one another, they loved the vulgar love of man and woman and allowed themselves to know each other carnally. Indeed, they married. Afterwards, they appear to have returned to the old home. Their happiness seemed complete. Still there was a skeleton in the cupboard. They longed to know the parentage of the girl.

Who was her father?

Who was her mother?

Had she a sister?

Had she a brother?

It was a natural desire. The wife in particular, who had owed her preservation and her entire upbringing to the kindness of strangers, was curious as to how she came into the world. The loving husband would certainly like to know the parentage of his affianced, and he zealously seconded her efforts to find out the truth. And they ate the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge—with fearful result—to their agony and despair. The poor wife went howling mad, and in a fit of frenzy she drowned herself. And young Lucian Duval hanged himself to death.

AT the request of the President of the Calcutta District Charitable Society and the Directors of the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association, the Lieutenant-Governor has appointed a Committee under the Chairmanship of the Hon'ble Sir Henry Harrison, Member of the Board of Revenue, to enquire into

- (1) the extent and nature of the poverty and destitution which prevail in the town of Calcutta amongst Europeans and Eurasians;
- (2) the various charitable institutions and the funds at their disposal for the relief of such destitution;
- (3) the best methods of relieving present destitution;
- (4) any means which may be devised for preventing its growth and increase in future.

Sir Charles Elliott believes that private charity in Calcutta is amply sufficient to deal with local destitution, but that it requires organisation and direction. He agrees to the Committee because it is a matter of importance to the administration that the condition of this portion of the community should be thoroughly and accurately examined, and because the appointment of the Committee by Government may facilitate the enquiry. At the same time, it is desirable to know whether poverty or pauperism is developing among the Europeans and Eurasians in Calcutta, and its rate, if so. Nevertheless, not to raise false hopes of Government assistance in any event, the Resolution distinctly avers, that by it the Government is not committed to accept any new financial responsibilities or to occupy the field of the operations of private charity.

That is as much as language can do in the way of precaution. But language is not everything. Facts are stubborn things, as we are constantly reminded. At times, indeed, words get the better of things, but soon the latter recover mastery. As a rule, facts are triumphant over language. In this case, the fact will yet supersede the language. No literary skill can possibly suppress the facts of human consciousness. And no Secretarial manipulation could, in such a Resolution as the one under notice, prevent committal of Government. The relation between thought and language is indeed mysterious. We all know what is called reading between the lines. The truth is, words often convey more than they say. Sometimes protestations have a directly contrary effect. Hence the golden character of silence. Hence the wisdom of letting well alone. Such a Resolution cannot but kindle hopes, and, at the end, the Government may be compelled to expense it solemnly sets its face against. And after all, perhaps, it will do just as it wished, only it did not know its own mind.

IF Burma has its Moylan, Hyderabad has its Rudra. Ogres both, and no mistake! It is not exactly a case between six and half a dozen, though. There is something to choose between the two. Both are unquestionable fire-eaters. But perhaps both are not equally voracious. The mild Indian has naturally the advantage in sobriety. And he has altogether, we believe, a cleaner record than the Briton. He has been making the Grand Tour of India as it were in search of a field to practise in. Skipping from place to place—driven from one, or retiring, with more or less grace, from another—has this rolling stone of a barrister made the whole round of the Continent. Starting at Simla, he passed to Lahore, thence on to Sind, thereafter he turned up far down South at Madras, thence he passed over to Mysore, whence he put back to the Presidency, and anon he found himself in Native Decan. Often enough as he changed his locality, he himself was unchanged. Experience went for nothing. Through all vicissitudes of scenes and circumstances, the self-same spirit dogged him. We have a good opinion of, and even a sneaking partiality for, the brave man ever ready to tell the truth and shame the devil. Let us hope that at last he will now turn a new leaf.

MR Rudra who in open court condemned the administration of law in the Nizam's Courts and suffered in consequence, has now an opportunity of giving law and constitution in an Ilauqa within the Nizam's dominions. He has been appointed a Special Judge in the Paigah Ilauqa of the premier noble Sir Khoished Jah and will also act as his Legal Secretary. If Mr. Rudra succeed in his present position in reforming the administration of justice, Hyderabad will have a valid cause to rejoice at his disbarment in its courts.

To give a better hackney carriage service to the town, as proposed by the new companies on that behalf started, the Hon'ble H. J. S. Cotton introduced, on the 18th April, in the Bengal Legislative Council a Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to Hackney-carriages and Palanquins in Calcutta. The most noticeable innovation is the introduction of a new class—called the first—of carriages with increased rates of fare. The rate for the first class for any distance within and not exceeding one mile is proposed to be 8 annas; for any distance exceeding one mile, at the rate of 6 annas for every mile and for any part of a mile over and above any number of miles completed; for any time within and not exceeding one hour, one rupee; for every hour or part of an hour beyond one hour, 8 annas; for a whole day consisting of nine hours, 5 rupees. The Bill also enhances the rates of the third class carriages. For the first mile, it is 3 annas; and for every subsequent mile or part of a mile 2 annas; for the first hour it is 8 annas, for every subsequent hour or part thereof 4 annas; and for a whole day of nine hours 2 rupees. We may as well quote the rates for the second class which too show an increase. They are respectively 6 annas, 4 annas, 12 annas, 6 annas and 3 rupees. The rates for half a day of five hours are abolished altogether. The abolition introduces an anomaly. The fare for the whole day of nine hours is fixed at Rs. 5; and Rs. 2 for 2nd and 3rd class carriages respectively, which are also the rates payable for seven hours. The rates for eight hours will thus exceed those for the whole day or nine hours. Here is an absurdity of the whole being less than its part, which is avoided in Nawab Abdool Luteef's Act by the device of a half-day of five hours. Under Sec. 30, "the owner or driver of every hackney-carriage shall be entitled to demand and take for the hire of such carriage the fare specified in the First Schedule to this Act... Provided that any contract entered into to accept a fare lower than the fare so fixed shall be binding." Under Sec. 35, "Every driver of a hackney-carriage who shall demand or take more than the proper fare to which he is legally entitled, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding ten rupees." The question that suggests itself to us is, Can there be a valid contract for a higher fare? The working of the law is to be left to a Registering Officer under the control of the Municipal Commissioners. The Act will ordinarily apply to municipal Calcutta, but the Lieutenant-Governor may exclude from its operation any portions of the town or include any suburban area. The Act will he called the Calcutta Hackney-carriage Act. It may, nevertheless, apply to any other town or place in the dominion of the Lieutenant-Governor by a simple notification in the Gazette. Why not then call it the Bengal Hackney-carriage Act and re-form the sections making them applicable to all towns as in the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884? The hackney-carriage year or rather its registration begins in October, when the Calcutta season commences, and the carriages licensed under the Act are expected to be new and smart. The Bill includes palanquins.

THE mercies of the Amrita Bazar are—characteristic. At its first burst on the horizon with the morning sun, it took care to shine away from us. Our expression of appreciation apparently disagreed with our brother's modesty and we were shone upon by the luminary, but not in anger. This went on for a week only and then the light was stopped. This went on for more weeks, until one day our familiar old friend the weekly Amrita, whom we had not seen before the metamorphosis or doubling—we did not exactly know which—into the daily apparition, made his appearance. How considerate! The daily effulgence was justly calculated to be too much for our gaze, and so it is withdrawn and the weekly phenomenon is substituted for our enlightenment. So it has been going on these two weeks.

There is always something or other in the Koh-i-noor. We open a number and we recognise the selfsame spirit—rather the worse, perhaps, for the late labours—breathing in the pages. Thus is a great though misguided publicist, jurist and judge and one of the most intellectual and able men of the time, supposed to be under a cloud from physical infirmity, summarily disposed of:—

"It seems, Sir John Stephen has been at last obliged to resign. He had a keen intellect which he felt a pleasure in utilising for the purposes of justifying wrong and unreason. He had been always a friend of the strong against the weak; and he had no faith in the higher sentiments of man. And the great Sir John Stephen ends his days as an object of pity!"

The same vein of prophecy runs through the treatment of other subjects. Here is a jump indeed—without looking before!

"From telegrams published elsewhere, it will be seen that the opium revenue has been practically abolished from India by Parliament. One cannot help seeing the hand of retributive justice in this revolutionary measure. The late measure of social reform has stirred the Indian society to its uttermost depths."

The hand of retributive justice is visible, if at all, only to the elect. So only by them is the logic or coherence of the remark understandable. Even supposing that "the late measure of social reform has stirred the Indian society to its uttermost depths," what that has got to do with a motion in the House of Commons on the opium revenue, is what no fellah can understand.

Our contemporary cannot bear to learn that Sir Andrew Scoble was complimented with a garland by the reformers. Why, the same gentleman was garlanded in our contemporary's neighbourhood by that dubious amphibious Gobardhan, Raja Rajendra Narayan Delh, and so was Hara Prasad Shastri, the anti-garbhadhanist Pandit, without any protest from the Amrita. But there is an object in the present imitation.

Our contemporary seizes the garland as a pretext to abuse those who were not moved by his eloquence to join the crusade against the Consent Bill and were thus able to save the credit of their countrymen. We have no great objection to this sort of relief for the poor Gobardhan Baboos. But they ought to keep clear of falsehood. The probuwallahs are demolished in Amrita Bazar fashion. Here is wit!

"Take a needle, a piece of thread, a few flowers, and knit them, we mean the flowers together, and you are a great patriot, and a reformer to boot."

Thus are reformers and reform done for! Then for the true objective of all this pother, including Malini Mashi's directions for a garland:—

"We too have tailors in Calcutta; and they all plucked flowers to prepare a garland, but at last they gave up the attempt. And, do you know, why? There is a vast difference between the reformers of Bombay and those of Bengal. Here, most of the reformers posed as such, only to get something out of Sir Andrew Scoble. But, when Sir Andrew Scoble gave them nothing for their patronage, the Calcutta tailors argued it thus."

That is false—one of the many impudent falsehoods which the Garbhadhanists have been circulating throughout this controversy. The supporters of the Consent Bill have no objection to be called tailors and so forth. They have been called much worse—non-Hindus, non-Brahmans, Chamars and so forth. But their honor is sans tâche et sans reproche.

ON the 18th April, after Council, the Lieutenant-Governor, accompanied by Messrs. Buckland, Risley and Maude, inspected the Revenue and General Departments of his Civil Secretariat. Mr. Risley is under trial—or rather his System for the largest amount of work with the least expense. The method pursued by him was to reduce the cost and to simplify the work. Has he gained that object? He has certainly tried his utmost. His principle seems to be to employ the press to the exclusion of flesh and blood. No end of forms has been introduced entailing expense in printing to the confusion of the assistants. We are told that the cost of his system in its introduction will probably be over a lac of rupees—all for printing. That itself ought to discredit a system which cannot be regarded as a finality—which the next prig of an Under-Secretary may show up as an imposition, or the next Lieutenant-Governor may brush away as a nuisance. If this expensive experiment is to end in no permanent substantial economy, it were better left to die an early death.

It is believed that Sir Charles Elliott, who has an eye for idlers and stragglers, noticed, during his visit, that in the General Department of the Secretariat there are more hands than work. The end of it will be, we doubt not, that a number of them will be transferred from that department and their services placed under the orders of the Chief Secretary, the departments under that officer being not adequately manned. As Mr. Risley is now engaged in reforming the Civil Secretariat, it is to be hoped that his attention will be directed to the general redistribution of assistants in the whole office. The reduction of hands contemplated will simply increase expense in other directions. Blindly carried out, such reform will, while saving a few hundred rupees in the office establishment, increase the cost of printing by thousands. Look at the half a dozen printed forms that have been introduced! Under the old system, we are assured, one simple cover answered all the purposes of the three under the Risley reform.

In justice to Mr. Risley, we are bound to commend his proposal to abolish the Registrars. Their salaries are out of all portion to the insignificance of the work allotted to them, and if they are not to be put to better uses, the sooner they are swept away the better. The abolition of these posts involves no difficulty or hardship. The simple withdrawal of the personal allowances attached to these offices will serve the object without injuring the position or prospects of the officers in question as Head Assistants.

"XENOS" contributes to the Sunday Statesman, of April 19, a long letter on the vexed question on the linguistic acquirements of Christ. Our contemporary's correspondent, by his showing, is a good Christian, and he writes in all seriousness. To us Orientals of Orientals, the proceeding is shocking to the extent of blasphemy, but "Xenos" is perfectly innocent of impropriety in appraising the literary attainments of the Saviour—God in fact—as if he was a student at a public school. Nor is he singular. Great Christian divines like Canon Farrar have preceded him in the same discussion.

"Zenos" in his modesty calls himself a chokra, but he writes like a buddhi. Thus he says:

"There can be no doubt that Alexander's conquests made Greek the language of government and business, as well as of literature and society among the populations of Egypt, Syria, and North-Western Asia. More than that, in Northern Judea it was the language commonly employed by princes and traders in their relations with the West. I am not quite certain if Greek was not the medium of communication, in the time of Augustus, with the Roman traders to the eastern shores of Judea [etc.] and Taprobantes [etc.] which are now known as Ceylon. However that may be, it is admitted by the best of authorities that in the course of the third century B. C., Greek was commonly spoken in the Eastern portion of the Russian dominions. It was a lingua franca, commonly called the dialect in general use as distinguished from the pure Attic dialect of the standard Attic classics. At the period of our Saviour's life and mission this lingua franca was spoken by the mixed populations of Asia, Syria, and Egypt, very much as Italian is in the Levant at the present day. It was tinged with different colours by different nationalities. Thus the uneducated Jew would express himself in Greek with a strong Hebraic turn of thought, and the Alexandrians would give the language that Oriental colour which Greeks of the Attic period termed in derision Asiatic. The Greek used by the Alexandrian Jews who made the Greek version of the Old Testament (A.D. 285-135 B. C.) was the parent of the dialect used in the Old Testament, and was largely spoken in Galilee."

Taprobantes we take to be Taprobane—the classical Ceylon. Judea, therefore, must be a misprint for India.

We extract another passage :—

"Rénan distinctly states that it is doubtful if our Saviour could understand the Hebrew Scriptures in their original language, and that He spoke Aramaic—a mixture of Syriac and Hebrew—in which some of the documents which served the purpose for which the symplic Gospels were written. 'It is not probable that He knew Greek, for this language was little known in Judea outside the classes who were in Government employ, and the towns inhabited by pagans such as Cesarea. He could not therefore have had any knowledge of Greek culture. This culture was forbidden by the Palestinian doctors who included in the same cause the man who reared pigs and taught his son Greek. At all events, the Greek language had not penetrated such little towns as Nazareth.'"

All that is matter for scholarship, classical and Semitic, and, above all, for special research. Meanwhile, we only remark that Christianity has distinctly passed from a faith into a history.

WE have once more a living Government of Bengal. Sir Charles Elliott will leave no stone unturned that might possibly hide an abuse. The complete purification of the Angean stable may be beyond him, or indeed any, modern Hercules. But God grant our present ruler his full term, and he will, we have every hope, leave a sufficiently pure and active administration in every department. We have at length got a Governor who uses his own senses and his own sense in his office. This may seem a small matter, but it is a marvel, and cannot but produce the highest results.

Let us take an instance that has just come to our ears. The candidates for employment in the Opium Department having just been examined, one of the plucked examinees has appealed to Government against the examiners. And strange as it may seem, the appeal has been admitted. As a rule who listens to such representations, unless very influentially supported? Governments have too much to do to have leisure to plunge into the materials of an educational examination. Nor, truth to say, are governments ex-officio competent to try an appeal against professional experts. There is, besides, an easy way of preserving dignity and escaping botheration in the standing Secretarial formula "declines" or "sees no reason to interfere." Not so in the Bengal Government of the day. Secretaries are apparently not now allowed to clear files according to the old methods. The Lieutenant-Governor himself sees everything. So the matter came before Sir Charles Elliott and he took it up in right earnest, as became the head of a Government which needs much looking after and mending. The candidate questioned the justice of the examiners, and the Lieutenant-Governor called for his papers and regularly went through them, even to working out the sums and problems. The result of his labours was that the examinee had given correct answers and that the examiners had done him foul wrong. Not to act upon his own impression, Sir Charles, we are told, has sent the papers to the Director of Public Instruction for report.

This is a refreshing novelty in administration. It cannot but have far-reaching effects.

THE annual meeting of the Indian Association for the cultivation of Science, 210, Bowbazar Street, comes off on Thursday, the 30th instant, at 5.30 P.M. The Lieutenant-Governor will preside.

NAWAB Abdool Luteef Bahadar, who is recovering but slowly from a serious illness, has received a rude shock in the death of his fourth son, Abul Farah Mahomed Abdul Aziz, a lovely and amiable youth of twenty. He was the most beloved of his parent and was not unworthy of the preference. No words that we can say can heal the lacerated heart, but God is great and He will grant the stricken parents strength to bear the affliction.

THE Governor-General in Council has sanctioned house-rent to clerks accompanying the headquarters of the Government of Bengal to Darjeeling for whom there is no accommodation in Government buildings. Clerks drawing less than Rs. 400 will receive Rs. 25 per mensem. Those drawing less than Rs. 100, Rs. 20. Those drawing less than Rs. 100, Rs. 10.

THE disturbance at Benares has been quieted down. The Municipal Commissioners, at the suggestion of the Hon'ble J. J. F. Lumsden, Senior Member of the Board of Revenue, amended their Resolution for acquisition of the Ramji temple for the water works, which was put forth as the cause of the riot. They decided that the idol should remain undisturbed in situ, an inner shrine being built for its protection, and that the outer building, court, &c., be removed. Unless the Commissioners have been forced to this modification of their plan, they are partly to blame for their omission to declare their change of operation earlier.

THERE is no particular news from Manipur. The avenging columns have started for their work, but have not yet reached their destination. In the other frontier, in the Miranzai country, our troops have been steadily occupying point after point on the Samana Range. Theirs, however, is no smooth march. There have been some fighting. The enemy seems anything but beaten and continues to attack. On the 23rd, about 100 Pathans fell upon a convoy of mules proceeding from Sangar to Darband, killing four or five drivers and wounding as many. Early in the morning, the mail bags were pounced upon, one man was killed, one wounded and the letters carried off. The night before, the enemy gave fight at Chullibagh, eleven miles from Kohat, garrisoned by 200 Sepoys. The fighting continued for some hours. A large gathering of tribesmen is reported at a distance of 3 miles.

The Akel settlements in Chagri Darra have had a taste of our firearms and fire. A Simla telegram of April 24 says :—

"The 2nd Punjab reached the bed of the Changru Valley, and under cover of a spur surprised the enemy and inflicted some loss. It then moved up the nullah, covered by the 3rd Sikhs on the right bank. Nine villages were burnt, the enemy being prevented by the guns from following the troops up the valley. Large bodies of the enemy were seen on the hills, but were quite nonplussed by the fire of the guns. The enemy suffered heavily from shrapnel fire. To-morrow the chastisement of the tribes continues."

GREAT is Kedarnath Mookerjee, the suspended Headclerk of the office of the Superintendent of Political Pensions, Alipore. Suspended for deficiencies found in his accounts, the accounts audited and re-audited and still shewing deficiencies, the final orders stand suspended sine die. The Superintendent seems in no mood to send up papers.

MR. R. D. Mehta, of the Empress of India Cotton Mills, starts for England on Monday morning. This is his second visit. The first was when he brought out the mills. This time he goes accompanied by two of his sons whom he intends to bring up for the Indian Civil Service.

THE Eastern Herald of Mhow has been doubly punished for its rashness in allowing, in its columns, a correspondent, one James Arthur Manuel, describing himself "a general adviser to the public and a preacher of the Gospel," to insinuate ill of Captain Norman Franks, English Secretary to the Maharaja Holkar. Both the correspondent and the editor have been sent to jail and fined. The correspondent is sentenced by the Residency Magistrate, Sahibzada Wahid-uddin, to one year's simple imprisonment and fines of Rs. 650, in default to additional imprisonment for 7 months and 15 days. The Magistrate did not take upon himself the responsibility of trying the editor proprietor Babu Mohender Nath Chatterjee, a prominent pleader practising in Central India, but committed him to the Sessions. The Sessions Judge has sentenced him to 9 months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 1,500.

It is still open to the Captain to proceed against others connected with the weekly. Ordinarily, the conviction of the offending correspondent would have vindicated law and justice, but the Captain willed otherwise and the law helped him to tumble the Bengali Baboo. It is an atrocious law, which slaves to an unrighteous vengeance and, while practically powerless against the law, strikes down the honourable. We hope the press of India might be roused to combine for its reform. Had Baboo Mohendra Nath Chatterjee been a man devoid of self-respect, it were the easiest thing in the world for him to make his peace with the prosecution. He suffers for his spirit. Judges of a higher grade and calibre than the officer who condemned Chatterjee fail to sympathise with the brave man struggling with fate.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers.—Daily experience confirms the fact which has triumphed over all opposition for more than fifty years, viz., that no means are known equal to Holloway's remedies for curing bad legs, bad breasts, sores, wounds, diseases of the skin, erysipelas, abscesses, burns, scalds, and, in truth, all maladies where the skin is broken. To cure these infirmities quickly is of primary importance, as compulsory confinement indoors weakens the general health. The ready means of cure are found in Holloway's Ointment and Pills, which heal the sores and expel their cause. In the very worst cases the Ointment has succeeded in effecting a perfect cure after every other means had failed in giving adequate relief.

A YOUNG puppy hailing from Shib Narain Das's Lane has taken the trouble to compose and to engross, or get engrossed, in beautiful clerkly hand, a tolerably long rigmarole on nothing in particular filled with falsehood and the vilest personal abuse of the editor of this journal, as if the old man is his father, and has cut the truant with a—cowrie. Although this Gobardhanling asserts his "maturity" in his very opening sentence, that is all the greater presumption of the adverse truth. But then the Garbhadhanists are the favored children of Nature. This venerable gentleman in his teens has evidently—to use a Bengali Irishism—matured in the green fruit.

We may return to this correspondent, after inquiry.

THE EXECUTIVE SAFEGUARDS OF THE CONSENT ACT.

THE VICEREGAL PLEDGE FULFILLED.

LORD Lansdowne has been as good as his word. He gave his assurance in the Legislative Council that he would watch the Consent law so that the new measure may not be abused, and if the necessity arose would enact safeguards other than those accepted by the Council. That was on the 19th March. Scarcely a week had elapsed when the Home Department issued the following letter of instructions:—

"No. 421, dated Calcutta, the 26th March 1891.

From—C. J. Lyall, Esq., C.I.E., Secretary to the Govt. of India, Home Dept.,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I am directed to invite attention to the provisions of Act X of 1891, an Act to amend the Indian Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code, 1882, and to the observations* made by His Excellency the Viceroy at the meeting of the Legislative Council held on the 19th instant at which the Bill was passed into law.

2. The Governor-General in Council has no doubt that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor will give such instructions to the Magistrates of districts in Bengal as will ensure that the provisions of the Act are applied with due care and caution. The Government of India have full confidence in the discretion with which the experienced officers, to whom alone jurisdiction to enquire and commit for trial is left by the law, will carry out its provisions, and are convinced that no action will be taken except on really trustworthy information, brought by responsible persons, who may reasonably be presumed to have knowledge of the facts they assert to have occurred, and that no mere suspicion will be held sufficient to set the law in motion.

3. I am to invite attention to the provisions of section 202 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which allows a Magistrate, when he sees reason to distrust the truth of a complaint made before him, to postpone the issue of process, and either enquire into the case himself, or order a local investigation by some officer subordinate to him. The Act allows such an investigation to be made by a Police Officer not lower in rank than an Inspector; but the Government of India think it would be preferable, when an investigation has to be made in a case to which the Act applies, that it should be entrusted to some experienced Native Magistrate. The Governor-General in Council believes that this course would be more agreeable to the feelings of the people than that, in so delicate a matter as this, the enquiry should be conducted either by the Magistrate of the district himself, if a European, or by any officer of Police.

4. I am to suggest that Commissioners of Divisions should be specially instructed to watch the working of the Act, and to impress upon the District Officers subordinate to them the necessity, while giving full effect to the intentions of the Government of India in enacting the law, of applying it with the utmost care and discrimination. It would be convenient if these officers were to submit a report, after the Act has been in operation for a year, for the information of the Local Government, showing whether any difficulties have attended its working. The Government of India will be glad to receive from the Government of Bengal a summary of the reports so submitted, with any remarks which His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor may think it necessary to make upon them."

That letter does more than the Viceroy bound himself to do. It is an Executive amendment of the law of the Legislature. It goes much beyond the law. Yet it may be taken as the law. The administering officers are authoritatively directed not to investigate cases under the Consent Act in the ordinary way as in other offences. In the first place, it reminds those concerned in the working of the law of the Viceroy's pledge. Then it enjoins on the Head of the Local Government the necessity of due care and caution in the application of the provisions of the Act. The Government of India are not, however, satisfied with these directions. They improve upon the existing law in the matter of receiving complaints.

* A hope has been expressed that, when this Bill has become law, the Government of India will closely watch its operation with the object of ascertaining whether further safeguards are necessary in order to prevent its abuse. I gladly give the assurance for which we are asked. We shall cause the working of the measure to be watched with the utmost attention, and we shall be prepared, if the safeguards which we have already accepted should prove insufficient, to strengthen and add to them.

It is now open to a Magistrate to take cognizance of any offence—

(a) upon receiving a complaint of facts which constitute such offence;

(b) upon a police report of such facts;

(c) upon information received from any person other than a Police-officer, or upon his own knowledge or suspicion, that such offence has been committed. The letter directs that "no action will be taken except on really trustworthy information, brought by responsible persons, who may reasonably be presumed to have knowledge of the facts they assert to have occurred, and that no mere suspicion will be held sufficient to set the law in motion." These words are an echo of the suggestions of the Calcutta Committee in support of the Age of Consent Bill. The memorial prepared by that body and submitted to the Viceroy with over eight thousand signatures, suggested, "That no Magistrate shall take cognizance of any case under the proposed law, where the alleged offender is the husband of the girl, except under cl. (a) Sec. 191, C. P. C., and that no such complaint shall be entertained unless the complainant deposes to relevant facts from personal knowledge." The Government of India do not stop there. They accept the safeguard submitted by Nawab Abdool Lateef Bahadoor (Founder-Secretary of the Mahomedan Literary Society, and a member of the Calcutta Committee in support of the Bill,) through Sir Charles Elliott, and direct that, when an investigation has to be made in a case to which the Act applies, it should be entrusted to some experienced Native Magistrate, not to the Police. This virtually transfers the initial proceedings of a case against a husband to native Deputy Magistrates who are supposed to deal with them more sympathetically than European Magistrates. At the same time, it removes, as far as it is now open, the complaint, put forth in some quarters, that natives have been excluded from trying such cases between native husbands and wives. Lastly, the Viceroy repeats the injunction that the law is to be applied with the utmost care and discrimination.

These are additional safeguards and ought to satisfy those who apprehended mischief from the intervention of a Police regarded with distrust and awe. The terrors of false prosecutions and unwarranted exposure of the Zenana are reduced to a minimum. Those who objected to the measure on other than religious ground, can have now no reasonable hesitation in accepting a law in the interest of humanity and civilization. Nothing that the Government of India can do, however, can satisfy those who raised a howl to trade on the prejudices of the ignorant and the—purposely religious.

It would certainly have been better if the instructions could be incorporated in the law. It will not however matter if the country receive their benefits. We have sufficient assurance in that letter that the Government mean not to allow them to be a dead letter. Law is not always lawfully administered and Executive orders are not unoften of superior efficacy.

THE HINDU DELUGE—IN JEST OR EARNEST?

DURING the height of the agitation on the Consent Bill, our respected contemporary of the Indian Spectator had the following editorial, which was so curious that we marked it for comment at a less pre-occupied hour:—

"Every one acquainted with the Old Testament knows the story of Noah with his three sons Shem, Ham and Japheth. In the Indian work, Padma-Purana, supposed to be very ancient, as translated by Sir William Jones, in the third volume of Asiatic Researches, we find the following:—To Satyavrata (Noah), the sovereign of the whole earth, were born three sons, the eldest Sherma (Shem), then Charma (Cham), and thirdly Jyapeti (Japheth) by name. These were all men of good morals, excellent in virtue and virtuous deeds. But Satyavrata, being continually delighted with devout meditation, and seeing his sons fit for dominion, laid upon them the burden of government; whilst he remained honouring and satisfying the gods, and priests, and kine. One day, by the act of destiny, the king having drunk mead, became senseless and lay asleep naked. Then he was seen by Charma, and by him were his two brothers called, to whom he said, 'What has now befallen? In what state is this our sire?' By these two he was hidden in clothes, and called to his senses again and again. Having recovered his intellect, and knowing what had passed, he cursed Charma, saying, 'Thou shalt be the servant of servants; since thou burst into laughter in their presence, from laughter thou shalt acquire a name.' Tales of the Deluge abound in the Padma-Purana."—The Indian Spectator, Mar. 15, 1891.

That is the whole piece. How or wherefore, it got into the midst of our contemporary's editorial notes, is a wonder. The Hindu traditions of the primeval Flood is a proper subject of inquiry. A comparison of the Hebrew with the Hindu record of that great event in the history of the earth would be most interesting. But the subject is not to be disposed of in a summary fashion in a short paragraph. Nor is the Editorial Notes the proper place for its treatment. At any rate some warning, not to say apology, is due to the reader for serving him with such a strange and tough dish. The foregoing paragraph looks like a portion of an antiquarian dissertation which got dislocated from the main treatise and found its way by mistake in a weekly journal of politics and sociology. As such it might be regarded as a welcome windfall were it otherwise unexceptionable. That, unfortunately, it is not. It is, indeed, open to serious objection. It is at once meagre and inaccurate. It is tantalising, to begin with—tantalising with a vengeance. In offering to speak of the Indian account of the Deluge, the writer actually withholds the account altogether. And after all he concludes with saying that "Tales of the Deluge abound" in one of the Hindu scriptures. This is adding insult to injury. Nor is the cruelty to the reader exhausted here. The writer not only does not himself tell the Hindu version of the Flood, but he also takes good care—as much as he possibly can—that the reader shall not find it out himself! He has put him off the scent. Such naughtiness on a grave subject is probably unexampled in literature and reminds one of the tricks played on editors by wags like Lockhart and Maginn in the brilliant days of magazine wit.

The writer apparently is no Hindu or Sanskritist himself, or else he would scarcely speak of the Padma Purana as only "the Indian work." He would certainly not speak of it as "supposed to be very ancient." The Padma is not supposed to be more than eight centuries old. But he might be accurate within his own sphere. We may even pass over the careless statement that "Tales of the Deluge abound in the Padma Purana." But what excuse can there be for the assertion about Sir William Jones translating the Padma Purana? We do not remember that Sir William ever put his hand to the task. Nor do we think that such a version of this or any other Purana is to be found in the collected edition of Jones' Works. But here is this Bombay writer who refers to Sir William Jones' translation of the Padma Purana in the third volume of the Asiatic Researches. He has not the slightest misgiving on the subject. He actually quotes a passage from Jones' version! But surely no such Padma Purana translated by Jones is to be found in the third Asiatic Researches, or indeed in any other! We have not indeed consulted the whole series, for we have just now no complete set of the work, but it is not necessary. There is no doubt on the point. The Padma Purana has not yet been translated, except perhaps a few chapters into Latin, somewhere on the continent of Europe.

By day and night but this is wondrous strange!

It is impossible to suppose that there is wilful misleading in all this. There is no object to be gained. The circumstances do not allow us to suspect anything like "a derangement of epitaphs." The least revolting theory we can think of, is that it is a stupid hoax on a busy editor, though we confess the explanation is far from satisfying us.

We cannot end here. After having disposed of the literary curiosity, we would be guilty of the same tantalising trick on the reader that we have charged upon our contemporary's writer, if we did not attempt to give some positive information on the interesting subject raised in the connection. Unfortunately, we have exhausted our space for relating the Hindu account of the Flood. On another occasion we may present it. To-day we content ourselves with indicating the original sources where it is to be found. The Padma Purana is not one of those sources. The Flood is related in different ways in other Puranas, however, such as the Bhagavata, the Agni, and notably the Matsya. Above all, the story is given at length in that repository of all the traditions of the Hindu race—the Mahabharata, Van Parva. But the earliest record is in the Vedas, Satapatha Brahman.

THE MAHOMEDAN LITERARY SOCIETY AND THE MANIPORE MASSACRE.

From—Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadoor, C.I.E., Secretary to the Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta.

To—Colonel J. C. Ardagh, C.B., Private Secretary to His Excellency the Viceroy, at Simla.

Dated Calcutta, the 17th April 1891.

SIR,—The Committee of Management of the Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta have learnt, with the greatest horror and indignation, the sad news of the confirmation of the disastrous catastrophe which has taken place at Manipore, and by which the Chief Commissioner of Assam and several other high Government Officials have been cruelly massacred,—and they have desired me most respectfully to tender their heartfelt condolence to His Excellency the Viceroy on this unhappy occasion, and their sincere sympathy to Mrs. Quinton and the bereaved families.

The authors of this inhuman and treacherous act deserve the most condign punishment. Only by such justice, and by a severe example made of them, will the civilized world receive some, however scanty, consolation in its wounded feelings under the sad destruction, in cold blood, of the Head of a Province and of other Civil and Military Officers.

Although a number of most valuable lives have been lost, the Committee trust that good will come out of evil and that the Government of India will adopt measures for controlling the barbarous tribes, consistent with the righteousness of British Power, but effectual to prevent the repetition of such outrages, and for permanently completing the defence of the Frontier.

To—Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur, C.I.E., Secretary, Mahomedan Literary Society, Calcutta.

Viceroyal Lodge, Simla, 20th April 1891.

SIR,—I am desired by the Viceroy to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, conveying to His Excellency the sentiments of the Committee of the Mahomedan Literary Society of Calcutta on the recent events in Manipore; and to say that Lord Lansdowne has perused it with satisfaction.

I remain yours faithfully,

J. C. ARDAGH.

THE CONSENT ACT.

SIR,—The excerpt you have approvingly quoted from Mr. Hutchins' speech is exceptionally unhappy. It exhibits the speaker in an eminently unenviable light. It shews (1) that his conception of the principles by which legislators ought to be guided in legislating for a country like India is certainly not overstatesmanlike, and (2) that though he is himself a supreme lawgiver his acquaintance with the Indian Penal Code would scarcely do honour even to a village mukhtar. (1) Symmetry may be very good in aesthetics but is rather out of place in legislation. India is peopled by a large variety of peoples widely differing from each other in every possible respect. The natural result is that one law may not suit them all. It is therefore the duty of the legislature to see that their legislation suits all, the poor Bengali Hindu included. The private manufacture of certain intoxicating drinks is an offence under the Excise Act, but regard being had to exceptional circumstances, such as the habits and pecuniary circumstances of certain people, such manufacture is not an offence in certain backward districts. The process of jahā is a cruel torture to the animal subjected to it, and yet it is not punishable as a cruelty to animals, because the religion of the Mahomedans directs slaughter of animals for food by that process. True, the Excise Act and the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act do not form part of the Indian Penal Code, but yet they are pieces of penal legislation, at least some parts of them. If the supposed symmetry of the Penal Code be too much to be sacrificed by making the law sectional, the consent legislation could have been embodied in a separate Act which might be called the Husband and Wife Act. (2) But the Penal Code has not universal application. Bigamy is an offence under the Penal Code, but a Hindu or Mahomedan husband cannot be guilty of the crime of bigamy. The section itself is so skillfully worded that no proviso had to be added to except such husbands from the operation of the section. But the Penal Code is the work of Lord Macaulay and his worthy colleagues.

As regards the arguments advanced by the Legislature against the possibility of adopting the occurrence of a certain physical condition in the wife as an alternative for the hard-and-fast age limit, I have conscientiously endeavoured to understand them, but have failed. Perhaps you will be so good as to try to explain them in your columns for the benefit of the public. If I am not very much mistaken, the following points must needs come up for adjudication in every case under the new law :—(1) the age of the girl outraged; (2) the commission of a certain act; (3) whether or not the act was attended with any physical injury or even pain to the girl; and (4) whether the act was pre- or postmenstrual. The first two points will be for the prosecution to make out; and the next two must necessarily be attempted by the defence to be made out in its favour, if the prisoner does not care to be deported to the Andamans. The only circumstances that can be thought of as extenuating the prisoner's guilt and inducing the judge to inflict a lenient sentence are absence of physical injury or pain to the girl and the act being postmenstrual and therefore less heinous. Under the circumstances, it is difficult to understand how the adoption of the alternative suggested would have let open the door to inquisitorial proceedings of a far more repugnant nature than what will attend the working of the Act as passed. It must be borne in mind that in every case the commission of a certain act will have to be proved. I do not know if inquisition can go farther.

Those who have read the Lieutenant-Governor's speech to purpose cannot have failed to perceive that it is a very clear and unmistakable condemnation of the Act as passed. It shows that in his opinion the supposed safeguards provided by the Select Committee by the modifications they introduced are the very opposite of safeguards and themselves require to be guarded against. It was very good of the Lieutenant-Governor to make known to the District officials his wishes on the working of the new law, but unfortunately his wishes are not law, any more than the Queen's solemn pledge as contained in the Proclamation is. Why could not the Lieutenant-Governor's suggestions be embodied in the law?

We need not regret that the Proclamation has been consigned to the waste paper basket. That would have been its fate all the same whenever expediency would require that it should be so. It is not such a long time ago that Sir James Stephen pronounced it to be no more than the pious opinion of an irresponsible sovereign which could not be binding on the sovereign's vice-regents. The importance of the document it is possible still further to belittle by treating it as an utterance in the nature of a sop, dictated by expediency to pacify an infuriated people. It is a fortunate thing that language lends itself so admirably to being quibbled away.

The utterances of the Viceroy and Sir Andrew Scoble regarding the Proclamation are fraught with dangerous significance. No reform programme can be too extravagant to be consistent with the Proclamation.

REPAIRS OF THE JAGANNATH TEMPLE AT POOREE

A public meeting of the inhabitants of Cuttack was held in the local Printing Company's Hall, on the 1st April 1891, at 8 P. M., to consider what should be done to repair the Jagannath Temple at Pooree.

Proposed by Babu Lal Behari Ghosh, Vakil, and seconded by Babu Gokulanand Chowdhury, B.L., Vakil, that the Raja of Atguri do take the chair.

The Raja thanked the meeting for the great honor done to him in being asked to discharge presidential duties. He thought the object of the meeting was a noble one—being associated with the maintenance of their glorious Faith. He invited the gentlemen charged with moving and seconding Resolutions to submit them before the meeting.

The following Resolutions were unanimously adopted by the meeting :—

I. Proposed by Rai Bulloram Mullick Bahadur, Sub-Judge, Cuttack,

That this meeting is of opinion that it is absolutely necessary to adopt prompt and effective measures towards the repairs of the great temple.

Seconded by Babu Kalipada Bandopadhyaya, Zemindar; supported by Rai Rasbehari Naik Bahadur, Personal Assistant to the Commissioner.

II. Proposed by Babu Haribullav Bose, B.L., Government Pleader, Cuttack,

That the following Appeal be adopted and circulated among the Hindu community in this and other Provinces :

AN APPEAL TO ALL HINDUS.

The Holy Temple of Lord Jagannath at Pooree is sadly in need of repair. To make effective repairs, it is necessary to raise 3 lacs of Rupees. The local authorities have issued a notice under S. 210 of the Municipal Act calling upon the Superintendent of the Temple to make the repairs within a week, on penalty of the damaged portion thereof being closed against the public.

2. During Mahratta rule, the Temple was a State institution. After the conquest of Orissa by the British, the Temple was for sometime managed by the British Government. It pleased Government to abdicate its powers in favor of the Raja of Pooree in virtue of certain rights of his princely House. The Raja, as Superintendent of the Temple, was allowed a periodic monetary grant at first, which was subsequently commuted into a grant of land towards that purpose. What with the rise of prices, the difficulties associated with the strict assessment and realization of rent of the endowed lands, the present Raja of Pooree (a minor) is unable to find ways and means for taking the work of repair in hand. To this is to be ascribed the gradual decadence of the noble shrine, which will cease to exist in the immediate future, unless prompt and energetic measures are adopted by the Hindu community to prevent the catastrophe.

3. The present appeal is submitted to the Hindu community in India with the object of

(a) Apprising them of the danger which threatens to extinguish one of their most sacred and popular shrines;

(b) Endeavouring to awaken the sympathies of the Hindu community towards arresting what must be a religious calamity; and

(c) Creating an interest in the preservation of a relic of ancient Hindu art and Hindu philanthropy, the grandest, noblest, and sublimest that one could find.

4. The Appeal, in the name of the great Lord of the universe, is sure to find a hearty response throughout the length and breadth of Hindu India. Hindu Chiefs and Princes, Hindu nobility and gentry, whose interest in the maintenance of Jagannath-worship at Pooree is historical as well as hereditary, will come forward with their willing purse. To such as firmly believe that without a national Hindu religion there can be no true love of one's own country, others who delight in preserving matters of archaeological interest from the vandalism of Time—the appeal is nonetheless fervently made.

5. The Executive Committee, who have ventured to appeal to the feelings of their co-religionists, are not devoid of hope that some beloved devotee of the great Lord may feel the repairs of His House to be a joyful burden, and may readily accept it in whole or part. Such readiness would be most welcome. The Executive Committee will be glad to receive subscriptions, the amount of which will be deposited in the Bank of Bengal for safe custody. The amount of each subscription will be acknowledged in the leading journals.

6. A Working Committee has been established at Pooree, consisting of certain officials and respectable non-official gentlemen, and the Executive Committee hope and trust that the repairs of the temple will be taken in hand as soon as the preliminaries are settled. The Executive Committee propose to publish periodical reports of the progress of work, together with a statement of all receipts and disbursements on account of Jagannath-Temple Repair Fund.

Seconded by Rai Jagat Durlav Bysack Bahadur, Deputy Magistrate, Cuttack, and supported by Rai Jogendra Lal Chowdhury Bahadur, Moonsoff.

III. Proposed by Babu Dwarkanath Chakrabarti, Chairman of the Cuttack Municipality,

That a Central Executive Committee consisting of the following gentlemen,

Maharaja of Keonjhar; Maharaja of Atmillock; Raja of Atguri; Raja of Nayagarh; Raja Balauntha Dev Bahadur; Raja Baidanath Pandit; Babu Behari Lal Porlit, Zemindar; Choudhury Krutibas Das, Zemindar; Babu Lushminarayan Roy Chowdhury, Zemindar; Babu Kalipada Bandopadhyaya, Zemindar; Babu Rajagovind Jagalev, Zemindar; Babu Brahanath Khuntia, Zemindar; Babu Boloram Bhramarbat, Zemindar; Babu Mchhara Lal Boavat, Banker; Babu Woomesh Chandra Mandal, Zemindar; Babu Ragharaman Das, Zemindar; Babu Lolnath Roy, Zemindar; Babu Gobinda Ballav Roy Mahasoy, Zemindar; Babu Khosali Chand, Merchant; Rai Nanda Kishore Das Bahadur, Assistant Superintendent, Tributary Mohals; Babu, Rebehari Naik, Dy.-Magistrate; Kedarnath Datt, Dy.-Magistrate; Monomohan Chakrabarti, M.A., B.L., Dy.-Magistrate; Mohendra Nath Mukherjee, B.L., Moonsoff; Dwarkanath Chakrabarti, Supdt., Normal School; Ramprisona Mookerjee, Professor of Sanskrit, Ravenshaw College; Madhusudan Das, M.A., B.L., Vakil; Gokulanand Chowdhury, B.L., Vakil; Nimai Charan Mitra, B.L., Vakil; Parbati Charan Chakrabarti, Pleader; Dinanath Ghose, Muktiar; Mahant Raghunandan Ramanuja Das; Bara

Ramprosonna Ramanuja Das ; Adhikari Krishnaprosanna Das ;

he appointed, with power to add to their number, for

(a) collecting subscriptions, &c.

(b) passing accounts, and publishing them, as also reporting from time to time on the progress of work done at Pooree.

(c) discharging other executive functions.

Seconded by Babu Mothura Lal Bhagat, Banker.

IV. Proposed by Babu Chaturbhuj Patnaik, B. A., Government Translator, Cuttack,

That the Bank of Bengal be requested to accept the Treasurership of the fund to be styled the Jagannath-Temple Repair Fund, and the Committee already formed at Pooree be asked to co-operate with the Central Executive Committee constituted under the previous Resolution.

Seconded by Babu Nimai Charan Mitter, Vakil, Cuttack.

V. Proposed by Babu Jagat Bullav Ghosh, Sheristadar, Judge's Court, Cuttack,

That copies of the proceedings of this meeting be sent to the Indian press for publication, as well as to the Magistrate and Municipal Chairman of Pooree for information.

Seconded by Babu Janakinath Bose, B.L., Vakil, Cuttack.

The meeting broke up after a vote of thanks to the Chair.

Speech of the Hon'ble Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar at the Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for supplying Female Medical Aid to the Women of India, held on February 9, 1891.

The Hon'ble Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, in proposing the first Resolution for the adoption of the Report, spoke as follows :—

Your Excellency, Your Honour, Ladies and Gentlemen,—

Her Excellency the Lady President and the Central Committee of this the National Association for supplying Female Medical Aid to the Women of India, have done me the honor to ask me to move the adoption of the Sixth Annual Report which has been just so ably presented to you, and it is due to myself to tell you that while I feel proud of the unusual honor done to me, that feeling is associated with its antithesis, a sincere sense of my own utter unworthiness of the honor, by virtue of my incompetency to discharge the duties which the honor demands of its recipient. Had it not been for the august source whence the honor has come, I should certainly have hesitated to accept it with its heavy responsibility. I have however no other alternative now than with all humility to submit, in full reliance upon your indulgence for my shortcomings.

This the Sixth Annual Report of the Association is the biggest of all that have been published, and I am happy to be able to say that its increased size is indicative of the increase in the magnitude of the sphere of its operations. A comparison of this with the previous Report shows that in place of fifty local and district associations and committees affiliated or attached to provinces and in touch with the Central Committee, there are now over a hundred; in place of ten lacs spent in the erection of hospitals there have been over twelve; in place of two hundred thousand of women who had received medical relief there were over four hundred and eleven thousand; in place of thirty there were forty Lady doctors and assistant surgeons and female medical practitioners working in connection with the Fund; and in place of two lacs which the local associations and committees had in actual and in promise, there are now actually invested three lacs and thirty-nine thousand, in hand thirty-five thousand rupees, and in donations promised of over a luc and seventy thousand. Now this is progress beyond all expectation, and testifies to the deep and genuine sympathy with which Her Excellency the Marchioness of Lansdowne has taken up the duties of Lady President, and also to the loyalty and earnestness and energy with which those under her are working for the Fund.

So far therefore as the Central Committee and its Lady President are concerned the Report is eminently satisfactory. The Association, far from suffering on the departure of its benevolent Founder and first most energetic President, has made immense strides under her successor who has shown herself in every way worthy of the mantle of benevolence and practical good work which has fallen on her and which she has taken up with all the earnestness of genuine conviction. The Report is also satisfactory inasmuch as it shows that the Lady Founder on her retirement from India has not only not forgotten the noble work which she inaugurated with such unexampled enthusiasm and devotion, but has infused new life into it by working for it with the same undiminished enthusiasm and devotion in her native land, and drawing towards it the active and substantial sympathy of the womankind of England, the noblest of their type in all the world.

So far then as the originators and workers of the Association are concerned the Report is more than satisfactory, and it gives me very great pleasure to move its adoption, fully confident of your unanimous acceptance of my proposition.

But before I sit down, Ladies and Gentlemen, I have one question to ask, and that is a very serious one. Is the Report satisfactory so far as those are concerned who are really interested in this movement of benevolence and charity in the highest sense of the world? Now who are they who are really interested? Who, but we the natives of India? Does the Report show that we have done our duty to ourselves, and to those who have pointed out to us what that duty is? It would be ingratitude, with the fact before us of the magnificent and princely donations that have been made to the Fund, to say that some of us have not. But would it not be a violation of truth to say that we as a nation have awakened to a lively sense of that duty?

Boast as much as we may of our ancient civilization, there is the unerring index, the condition of our women, which points to the melancholy fact that we have not only not advanced from the point attained by our ancestors in ancient time, but that we have receded much from it, that we have not only not profited by a literature, a philosophy and a religion which were marvels and models for the rest of the world in their days and which are the admiration of even the most cultured moderns, but that in every respect we are showing ourselves unworthy of that noble heritage. Look at the condition of woman in Vedic and even in Puranic times, and look at her condition now, and then say if we have not fallen from our high state.

Whatever the cause, about which it is now idle and unprofitable to speculate,—whatever the cause, it is a positive but most lamentable fact that for centuries the fairest of our community have been immured within the prison walls of the zenana, shut out not only from the light of day, but from what is equally essential, the light of knowledge, and subjected to the tyranny of a most degrading and ruinous custom, the custom of child-marriage. The result has been most disastrous to the very life of the nation. And, what is worst and most painful of all, under the mistaken idea of obedience to the dictates of religion the fair sex has been patiently enduring the acutest agonies of disease, preferring relief in the hands of the great Deliverer himself to relief in the hands of the physician of the opposite sex. It is only the professional man who can understand what this state of things means, what the amount of suffering is which is so heroically endured, what the consequences in most cases life-long in the shape of chronic uncured and incurable ailments are, and how almost countless are the fatal terminations from all these causes combined, most of which might be averted by timely medical aid. This state of things has been going on in our midst from time almost immemorial, and we have been complacently looking on as if all was right, as if no intervention on our part was necessary. And this state of things would have gone on unremedied till probably the end of time, had it not been for the divine attribute of sympathy in woman. A knowledge of this melancholy state of things in her Indian Empire reached the Queen-Empress, and with that wide and prompt sympathy which has been the charm of all her life, Her Majesty lost no time in commending the matter to the Countess of Dufferin before her departure for India. That recommendation has borne fruit in the foundation of the most magnificent and the most needed charitable institution in the world, the National Association for the supply of female medical aid to the Women of India.

In this fact of this National Association owing its very existence to the direct initiative of our Sovereign, and its maintenance and development chiefly to the philanthropy of our noble sisters of England, we ought to read the two-fold character of the duty that is now imposed upon us, duty to our mothers and sisters and daughters and wives, and duty to our Sovereign and the womanhood of England not only for having pointed out to us that duty but in helping us with head and heart and money to enable us to perform that duty. Now, I think it would be quite superfluous on my part to tell you that the best way to discharge the second duty is by fulfilling the first one to the best of our ability.

Is any incentive necessary to prompt us to do this first duty, our duty to our own mothers, and to our own sisters and our own daughters and our own wives who are or are to become mothers in their turn, all of whom we have been hitherto most culpably neglecting with a selfishness which has its origin in the pride of our sex? If any incentive is necessary, I should ask you, my countrymen, to find it in the glorious words pregnant with the highest wisdom and the deepest reality attributed to the Founder of Islam—Aljannatu táhtá aqdámé ummahátekum : "Paradise is beneath the feet of your mothers." Woman is essentially mother, and verily, a mother is the incarnation of God's love on earth. In neglecting women we do in reality neglect our mothers, and thus neglect our very salvation. We have been guilty of this sin all along our later national life, and the world has to see whether we are to continue in it, or whether we should attempt to purge ourselves of it. Let us raise woman from the subordinate position she now occupies to the co-ordinate position she ought to occupy, let woman with man be in reality one flesh, one heart and one soul, as God has designed, and then all will be right, and there will be no room for foreign intervention.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

SOWING AND REAPING.

SOMETIMES the heart grows weary with the load
Of efforts fruitless grown, and withered hopes,
Of love that sought in vain to pour itself
Freely and fully forth into the hearts
Of others, God's appointed cups for love ;
Sometimes the heart grows weary with the sight
Of those whom God made men with living souls,
Groveling, if not in crime, in vice—if not
In vice, in that rank emptiness and sloth
That rot souls piecemeal even ere they kill ;
Sometimes the heart grows weary with the din
Of wealth, and cry of want, and sullen laugh
Of holy sorrow curdling into hate,—
Ay, with that groan of universal woe
Wherewith the whole creation, as of yore,
Travaileth in pain together until now ;
Sometimes the heart grows weary, very weary.

And then the Small Voice saith, "Sow on in faith
Sow the good seed ! another after thee
Shall reap. Hast thou not garnered many fruits
Of others' sowing, whom thou knewest not ?
Canst tell how many struggles, sufferings, tears,
All unrecorded, unremembered all,
Have gone to build up what thou hast of good ?
Canst tell how many died, that thou shouldst pray ?
All unrecorded, unremembered... Nay,
Not unrecorded all, even though forgotten ;
Not unrecorded He who died for thee...
'The seed thou sowest, is it thine to say,
'I will or will not sow it,' as it falls
Ripe with all blessing from that fruitful cross,
'That tree of life, rich with His blood ?

•• Up, man ! ••

Up, worthless one ! up in God's strength 'go forth'
Go ! treasure up for joy each smallest woe,
Each baffled hope, each callous sneer, each threat
Of evil undeserved, each idle jest
Blunting the point of truth, each cold smooth smile
Freezing the love that would be ! Treasure these,
I say ; these be thy precious cross ; by these Bless God if thou canst suffer for His sake !

"Faint not. 'Tis much only to sow good seed.
'Tis much to sow that which another reapeth.
And many daily sow, marked well of God,
Who, having sown, do faint, and He forgiveth !
Yet is it more to sow, and not to faint.
'In due time we shall reap, if we faint not ;'
And 'they that sow in tears, shall reap in joy.'"

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Little War in Manipur is over—to the disappointment of the prophets and publicists of the Gubbhadhan cult. The Raja and the Jubaraj or Senapati are fugitives. Our troops are returning.

A MYSTERIOUS tragedy has this week thrown Bombay society into a sad excitement. Two young ladies—Parsees both—were picked up in the grounds of the University. One was stone dead, and the other died in course of removal to Hospital. They had gone to visit the building alone, if one might employ such a contradiction in terms—without a third to chaperon or cicerone them, and had gone up the tower. That was all. How they came to be in the state in which and at the place at which they were found, no body can tell. One theory is that they went on purpose to commit suicide. There is a rider to the theory that one was a suicide and the other fell down in trying to catch her companion when the latter suddenly took her awful jump. Another explanation suggested is that they jumped in a sudden fit of hysterics. The most horrible suggestion is that they were driven to the step by attempts on their honor by some one.

THERE was a disgraceful riot at Mandalay. Four Madras sepoy had an altercation with the hackney-carriage drivers. From words they went to blows. In this encounter the military had the worst of it. The discomfited sepoy returned to barracks and appealed to their fellow-military, with the result that two hundred sepoy sallied forth to wreak vengeance on the doomed "cabbies." They had their revenge to the full. It was an indiscriminate discipline they exercised. Not only were the offending drivers licked or belligerents roughly handled, but all hackney coachmen were pounced upon. And not only drivers but innocent pedestrians were insulted and assaulted. For a full hour the roads were dangerous.

It is stated in the Madras papers that Sir Arthur Collins over-stays at home the summer vacation of the Madras High Court by one month, and that during that month, Mr. Justice F. Mathuswamy Iyer, as the senior Puisne Judge, acts as the Chief Justice of that Court. The Government having once allowed a native Judge in Bengal to fill the high office of a Chief Justice, the Brahman Puisne at Madras could not well be refused his chance. We hope Mr. Justice Iyer will fill the post with dignity and credit to himself and the Court.

MR. Spring Branson having gone on leave, Mr. H. G. Wedderburn acts as the Advocate General of Madras, Mr. N. Subramaniam, barrister-at-law, officiating as Administrator-General. In Bengal, no native has yet acted as Administrator-General, though a native clan rules the great office from generation to generation.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL Sir George Tomkyns Chesney, K.C.B., C.S.I., C.I.E., R.E., retired from the government of India on the 25th April, having resigned his seat as an Ordinary Member of the Council of Governor-General of India. The same afternoon, Lieutenant-General Henry Brackenbury, C.B., R.A., took upon himself the execution of the duties of the Military Member of Council. He does not come as a stranger, for he has had Indian experience, and we welcome him as an old acquaintance of India.

THE indigo planters of Benares and Jaunpur connected with the N.W. P. Planters' Association, at a conference at Mr. T. Nickel's house, Benares, under the presidency of Captain F. C. Chapman, Bati House, Bharwari, have Resolved that no planter should export indigo direct to England, as this tended to lower prices, so that stocks remained unsold; but that all indigo should be consigned to Calcutta to be disposed of by the brokers.

HERE is a study of the lawyer from a Tasmanian paper.—

"A lawyer was bathing in the Leven the other day when he encountered a huge shark. Their eyes met for an instant, when the shark blushed and swam out."

That is not exactly the truth, we trow. The lawyer also hastily ran up shore. The understanding doubtless was, each to his element.

THE savage custom of duelling is still in full vigor in France. The very men of letters fight each other with sword and gun. M. Champaur wrote in a provincial paper an article reflecting on the private life of M. Jules Lemaitre, the dramatic critic of the Débats. The writer was challenged to a duel which was accepted. It was fought with pistols on the 10th April on the Châtillon Plateau. Two shots were exchanged without hitting any of the fighters.

IN Hungary, near Ticsin, while a railway employé was giving the signal to an approaching train and was inattentive to his child of three, an eagle swooped down and carried off the baby.

IN Secunderabad, one Daniel was instantly relieved of the agonizing pain of scorpion bite by the local application of chlorodyne.

VILAYET HOSSEIN, a pleader in the Jhansi District, has been committed to the sessions on charges of perjury and forgery.

THE Rast Goftar of the 19th April contains a carte size cut of Khan Bahadur Muncherji Cowasji Murzban, Executive Engineer of the Presidency Circle, Bombay, and Engineer to the Bombay Town Corporation. As we see it here, the head is not of the best Parsee type, but there is amplitude of forehead and intelligence and alertness all through, the whole crowned by the sublime head-dress, which is the eye-sore of Baboo boobies in Calcutta—the pointed pugree which lends a grace to even the vulgar close-breasted European coat.

THE Rivingtons announce "The Lord's Prayer in three hundred languages."

AT an inquest lately held at Battersea on the body of a still-born child found in a garden, Mr. Barton Hicks, coroner, said, that ten or twelve children had been found with their brains dashed in, and every inquiry was being made to find who perpetrated these deeds.

HERE is a process of modern embalming:—

"A French physician—Dr. Variot—has recently discovered, or perfected, a method of preserving dead bodies by galvanoplasty. To facilitate adherence of the metallic deposit he paints the skin with a concentrated solution of nitrate of silver, and reduces this with vapours of white phosphorous dissolved in sulphide of carbon, the skin being thus rendered dark and shiny. The body is then ready for the electric bath, which is served by a thermo-electric battery, giving a regular adherent deposit of copper if the current is properly regulated. With a layer of $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ of a millimetre the envelope is solid enough to resist pressure or shock. Dr. Variot further incinerates the metallic mummy, leaving holes for the escape of gases. The corpse disappears and faithful image or rather statue remains."

WHILE the "patriotic" of our Graduates have announced themselves as boycotters of English goods, as the first step towards Babu rule, the more practical Madras graduates in Mysore, forming themselves into a trading association, have taken to coffee, tea, sugar, and snuff-vending.

THE Travancore Dewan T. Rama Rao notifies, under date Huzur Cutchery, Trevandrum, 7th April 1891,—we give the Travancore Durbar the benefit of this free advertisement—that "under command of His Highness the Maharaja, it is hereby notified that, except in cases where the publication of official papers is duly authorized by Government, the communication of such documents to the newspapers or to any private person, except as provided for in the orders relating to giving copies to interested parties, is strictly prohibited." We wonder why the Durbar does not go the whole hog in the adoption of the Official Secrets Act of British India.

HERE is an account of the Mala Vita—a Secret Society in Italy:—

"A great trial which has just been begun at Bari is expected to throw considerable light upon the organisation and operations of secret societies in Italy. The authorities, who have recently displayed unusual activity in unearthing seditious conspiracies, have succeeded in bringing to trial no fewer than one hundred and seventy-nine persons, charged with being members of an illegal organisation known as the Mala Vita. For a trial upon so large a scale there was no suitable accommodation in the town, and a large hall had to be specially fitted up as an Assize Court for the occasion. There are two hundred and seven witnesses for the prosecution, and four hundred and twenty-five for the defence, in addition to twenty-nine complainants. From the evidence adduced, so far as it has gone, the Mala Vita appears to be a society having at its head a strongly-constituted hierarchy. No one, the witnesses stated, was allowed to join the association until he had undergone certain stringent tests, and upon their admission members were obliged to take a solemn oath that they would be ready to abandon father, mother, wife, and children in the interests of the society. The membership was divided into several classes, the inferior grades owing implicit obedience to the superior. The penalty of disobedience was death. The persons appointed to execute the will of the society were chosen by lot. One of the objects of the organisation was robbery. Its statute declared that 'he who has not, is entitled to live at the expense of him who has.' In conformity with this principle, all the members of the conspiracy swore to mutually aid and support each other in case of necessity. Many of the accused bear upon their bodies all sorts of tattooed devices."

A WOMAN named Farndell died at Tipton, Sussex, aged 102 years.

A PARIS telegram of April 10 gives the cheering news of the discovery of water at El Golea, in the Desert of Sahara. A large body of drinkable liquid has been unearthed at a depth of 120 ft., throwing up nearly 40 gallons per minute. A much larger quantity is expected.

A LYONS telegram of April 10 speaks of a gathering of 1,500 workmen in the Bourse de Travail and the passing of a resolution for a May Day demonstration. It was proposed that the workmen should meet at one O'clock on the first in the public squares and simply march solid to the Town Hall, without communicating with the officials. Demonstrations were also arranged for at the graves of men who fought in the bloody riots of artisans in 1831 and 1834.

Orders were issued by Government forbidding meetings in the streets of Paris yesterday, the 1st of May.

THE State Council and the National Council are not agreed as to the site of the Swiss National Museum. While the State Council have voted for Zurich, the National have selected Berne.

THE Belgian Constitution is to be revised. There is a feeling for universal suffrage, but the Government is opposed to such a sweeping change, as it considers the country not fully prepared for the privilege. The suffrage will be given to every person occupying a house, or part of a house, assessed at a rate of 30f. This concession is calculated to raise the electoral body from 135,000 to 600,000. Payers of 10f taxes and holders of University degrees will also be eligible as electors. The Senate will be drawn from citizens paying 2,500f in taxes or having filled high functions.

The King will have the right to consult the Electoral body, by a referendum, upon questions of principle not submitted to the Legislature or regarding laws passed but not promulgated. The royal consent must be obtained before the marriage of a Prince or Princess.

AN astute correspondent the other day sent the Statesman from Chinsura an account of what he calls a "largely attended and influential meeting" of the Gabardhan malcontents. It was held, date or time unspecified, at the premises—not outoffices, it is to be hoped—of a Mandle who is described as a Zemindar of another district and a rais "of this place" (Chinsurah) to raise funds in aid of the Gabardhan movement.

A RICH Hamburg bachelor died leaving by his will 12,000 marks to a widow who refused to marry him, in that she enabled him to pass his days in peace and quietness. That was the reason assigned by the testator, but we suspect it was not the truth. We do not pity the woman who has such a poor opinion of us. This Hamburg man still loved the attractive widow.

THE Town Gumastah Poonosawiny Naicken was charged with contempt of Court by a constable at the Madras Town-Police Court, for walking into the Court while it was sitting. He was fined Rs. 3. A tailor was also fined the same amount by Mr. Sultan Mahideen Saheb, at the Presidency Magistrates' Court, Black Town, for the same offence. He was brought up for behaving indecently by entering the 2nd Magistrate's Court with his slippers on. No magistrate here would think of convicting a man for wearing shoes in court, but in a city where the highest native judicial functionary does not wear shoes in court or when visiting Europeans however below him in position, a tailor in slippers could not certainly be tolerated in a court.

A SOWCAR—Thanmull Dhamull—at Secunderabad failed with Rs. 75,000 liabilities. He is being proceeded against both civilly and criminally by the 7th Hussars who are losers to the extent of Rs. 19,000.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

HER Majesty has returned from Glasse to Windsor.

THE Influenza of last year seems to have returned to distress England this year too. Breaking out in the north of England, it has descended to the capital.

THE Benares rioters are being tried by three different Magistrates. The accused are divided and grouped into three classes: those who attacked the water works at Brabant and Sita Ram's house; those concerned in the destruction of the telegraph office; and those who plundered the railway station. Rewards have been offered from Rs. 100 to Rs. 1,000 for information leading to the apprehension and conviction of the leaders. Of the 500 and more persons arrested, 120 have been set off for want of indemnification. Those who had seized them for nothing, ought to be sharply dealt with.

THE murderers of General Annuddeen, the Vice President of the Rampur Council of Regency, still defy detection. The Durbar has doubled the reward for their apprehension, which, with the Supreme Government's Rs. 5,000, makes a total of Rs. 15,000.

That is a tempting prize, if anybody is base enough to care to win it. But then he has got to remember the account Per Contra, which is serious. All Rohilkhand will execrate the traitor with fierce indignation.

Oh for a tongue to curse the slave,

Whose treason, like a deadly blight,

Comes o'er the councils of the brave,

And blasts them in their hour of might!

May life's unblest cup for him

Be drugg'd with treach'ries to the brim, -

With hopes, that but allure to fly,

With joys, that vanish while he sips,

Like Dead Sea fruits, that tempt the eye,

But turn to ashes on the lips!

His life itself will not be safe who betrays the deliverers of their country, for such doubtless are they regarded who murdered the late Vice-President of the Council of Regency and virtual head of the Rampur state. Such, at any rate, is our surmise. That the deceased had rendered himself deeply unpopular to the people of Rampur and specially the Mahomedan community so strong there, and, above all, the family of the Chief, is matter of fact. The causes of that unpopularity lie on the surface, and they are far from unjustifiable. Rumour points very high for the inciter of the assassination.

Bāp ki betā, sipāhī ki ghōrā, kuch nā hoe to thōrā thōrā. Mahomed Ahmad, the only son of Nawab Mushtak Hossain, the confidential adviser of Sir Asman Jah, Prime Minister, Hyderabad, has already managed to make himself famous. He was only recently called to the Bar in England. He has, with his father's consent and approval, taken to wife a European—can we call her "lady," Mr. Bengal Times?—Miss Fitch. A Villayeti Begum will impart a new ingredient of spice to the usually vapid Deccani pillau of Nizamit intrigue.

THE excitement at Coimbatore over the conversion of a Brahman boy—Appa Row—has subsided. The boy being baptised into the fold of Christ, his relatives filed a suit in the Munsiff's Court for his restoration basing the claim on his non-age. An injunction was issued on Mr. Bird for production of the boy, which was disobeyed and Mr. Bird was ordered into prison for contempt of court. The superior court refused to interfere unless the boy was produced, and Mr. Bird avoided a long imprisonment by complying with the order of the Munsiff. The suit too has been decided in favour of the plaintiffs. The principal issue was the age of the boy. The father and others swore it was not more than ten and produced the horoscope in support. The District Surgeon thought it was between sixteen and seventeen. Other doctors examined on commission were of opinion that Appa was seventeen if not eighteen. The Munsiff Malhari Row decided that the age was seventeen and ordered Mr. Bird to restore Appa to the plaintiffs, pay the costs of the suit and refrain from teaching him Christianity until he attains his majority. The decree was followed by the issue of a warrant for its execution, and the boy was handed over to his parents. In his resistance to the injunction of the Munsiff, Mr. Bird evidently had relied on the faith of the convert, who deposed in court to this effect:—

"He of his own accord went to the Rev. Mr. Bird, whom he did not know before he thought of becoming a Christian. He had been reading the Bible at home and went to Mr. Bird for enlightenment, with the result that subsequently he desired baptism, for which he again went to Mr. Bird, from whose house he wrote to his grandfather on the matter. When his grandfather came Appa was under no restraint, and had an interview with his grandfather in Mr. Bird's room. He refused to go back. When Appa left Mr. Bird's house he went to other places, being assisted by Christian friends. He now considered himself a Christian, and objected to return to his Hindu home because his people would make him wear the Brahmin string and put on Brahmin marks, drink panchakayan, prostrate himself before all Brahmans in Coimbatore, bathe in the sacred rivers, perform prayaschittam ceremonies and shave. Panchakayan, he explained, was composed of cow's urine, dung, buttermilk, ghee and milk. He decidedly objected to revert to Brahminism even if these consequences did not follow. As a Christian he could not agree with Hindus. To questions from the plaintiffs' vakil, a Brahmin, Appa replied he did not know the Hindu religion perfectly because his parents had not taught him. In Christianity there was salvation for sinners. To the vakil's further question regarding Christianity Appa said: 'Do you want to examine me in the Christian religion?' I decline to argue with you."

Mr. Bird has been advised not to take up the case to the High Court.

ANOTHER religious misunderstanding is brewing at Rangoon which, under manipulation of the mischievous and the disaffected, may lead to unhappy results. It appears that a new railway line threatened a Mahomedan cemetery. The Mahomedans complained of the encroachment. Fortunately for them, the matter came for disposal before Sir Alexander Mackenzie in the gracious mood of a new ruler. On the 22nd December last, that is the twelfth day of his accession, the Chief Commissioner promised to turn the line from the sacred spot where sleep the Islamicite pioneers in British Burma. Nevertheless, the railway still disturbs the Mussulmans living and dead. It is said that the Viceroy has been appealed to in vain. We cannot believe this. This sort of hasty distrust of Government is unjust. Whatever may be the indifference or high-handedness of district authorities, compelled to make bricks without straw, the higher powers that be show a commendable solicitude to remove all reasonable grievances and even to humour the people. The disposition to distrust them at the instance of the busybodies, who abound among us and are increasing day by day, cause unnecessary bitterness and retard the smooth current of business. In this case, for instance, it would have been fairer to suppose that some accident had interfered with the execution of the Chief Commissioner's promise than that the promise was a mere blind or had been deliberately broken. Instead of troubling the Viceroy, who has really enough on his hands, indeed more than he can do justice to, a reminder to the Local Government in the shape of a fresh representation—even a call at the Secretariat—would have prevented all this ado. But perhaps that would not have suited some persons—some local “lawmen” or “politicals.”

ON Thursday, there was a meeting of the shareholders of the Darjeeling Himalayan Railway Co. Ltd., at their registered office No. 8, Clive Street, Calcutta. The meeting passed two resolutions, one receiving and adopting the report of the Directors for the second half of 1890, and passing the account as correct, and the other re-electing Mr. W. B. Gladstone, who goes out by rotation, as a Director. Only three persons were in attendance, namely, Mr. C. C. McLeod, Mr. H. R. McInnes, and Mr. W. B. Gladstone, though fifteen others were supposed to be present by their attorneys, the said Messrs. Gladstone and McInnes. Mr. Gladstone took the chair and proposed the first resolution, which was seconded by Mr. McInnes and carried by them and Mr. McLeod. The second was proposed by Mr. McLeod, seconded by Mr. McInnes and declared carried by the chairman. There was, besides, a vote of thanks, but the mover and seconder are not named in the advertised report. There was no proposition giving Mr. Gladstone the chair in that meeting. Such proceedings are supposed to satisfy the law and, we hope, the shareholders too are content.

THE Parsees in Western India are being wofully exercised by not the death of one of them but the disposal of his remains. One Pestonji Kolah dying a few weeks back in London, and there being no special Parsee cemetery, the body was burned at the crematorium at Woking. This is the first time that a Parsee's body has been so irreverently treated. The news has been received by the Parsee community at home with profound sorrow and sense of humiliation. The dead is beyond the power even of Mohals and Dastors, but however clever Mr. Kolah may have been, he could not burn his own carcase. It is the living Zoroastrians who assisted in the burning who have become the objects of their fellow-worshippers' rage. The cry on all sides is, How dared they degrade the —holy Fire! offspring of Heaven, first-born,

Or of the Eternal coeternal beam, to such base use! Mere exaltation is no adequately meet punishment for such an outrage. It is lucky that the offenders are out of the range of shot.

LORD Wenlock has subscribed Rs. 1,000 to the Ootacamund Hunt—a liberal sum for an English Governor in India, but a bad sign for the government of the country, we are afraid, and altogether an evil example to society, European and native. British noblemen who accept the difficult charge of ruling over tens of millions of Asiatics, may well be expected to submit to a temporary divorce from the dissipations of abundant leisure at Home. By the bye, how much has his lordship subscribed for missions and education of the people and of the poor Whites and Indo-Europeans and for other charities?

A TRULY practical people are the Yankees. They have opened an academy in New York for giving lessons in the art of love making. The Roman Ovid whose misfortunes failed to quench the fire that burned in his heart, amused himself with a poem on the Art of Love, ably Englished in metre by Dryden. The Hindus went into the same business with unblushing impudence worthy of the worshippers of Shiva and Vishnu in appropriate temples. But no race before these Americans had established a regular seminary for bringing up students in the subject. The project is worthy of the countrymen of Barnum. We suppose the projectors argue thiswise—If Erotics may be treated in books, why not in pro pria persona by professors? And, of course, anything for the almighty dollar. We wonder who are the instructors appointed at New York. We dare say many candidates have applied for the chairs—superannuated “mashers” and retired members of the demimonde, perhaps even soiled doves from the beau monde itself. Dilapidated roués who have taken French leave from Paris may have preference. The testimonials and references of the applicants will no doubt embrace not a little of the mysteries of some of the greatest capitals of Christendom. We can safely recommend for head of the establishment, a perfect master, or rather mistress, of the Art.

AN Englishwoman, named Eveline Heal, has been arrested in Paris as a swindler. She is alleged to have, since 1880, married and deserted forty-three husbands, after accepting valuable presents from each. It appears to us that she will make a magnificent President of the new New York Academy.

THE following from some English paper is going the round of the world, without note or comment:—

“The following characteristic story is told of Charles Lamb: Being awakened one night by a noise coming from the lower part of the house, he proceeded to discover the meaning of the same. He soon traced it to the plate room, and peeping through a window, discovered a burglar engaged in filling a bag with his valuables. Throwing open the door, he stepped in on the astonished robber. ‘What tempted you to risk your life,’ said the great Charles, ‘at such a profession? Were you hungry?’ ‘I was,’ was the surly and laconic answer. ‘In that case, allow me to assist you to a leg of lamb,’ said Charles, and raising his foot he suited the action to the words, and landed the nocturnal marauder out through the door.”

That is new to us. It is not in Sergeant Falgout's either biography. It is not in Bernard Barton's book nor any other collection of Lambiana that we can call to mind. It is certainly not in Moore's and Henry Crabb Robinson's Diaries and similar repositories of anecdote. In fact, we seriously doubt the truth of the new anecdote. It would be strange if it were true. If the teller calls it characteristic, he does not know the personality of its subject, or we have completely blundered in our impression of one of the rarest angels who have walked the earth not unseen. The account is highly improbable. The story is characteristic of John Bull, but not of Charles Lamb. His portrait is against it. He was a thin spare man of sedentary habits, worn out at the dull desks daily toil and by his domestic trials, and no burly hero like his brother John. Plucky for all that he still may have been, and even daring, but not in such a cause. The anecdote violates our conception of the gentle Elia. What is predicated of Lamb may be believed of Wilson, of the Noctes Ambrosianae. Elia could not possibly kick a thief who pleaded poverty. He would have given the fellow a leg of lamb rather than a leg of Lamb, and let the lucky rogue go without the plate. Christopher North would very likely have kicked the fellow down the door into the street and thrown to him some pieces of money. After having put the question “were you hungry?” and received an answer in the affirmative, it was both base and barbarous to punish the man for the attempted burglary without satisfying his hunger for the nonce at least. No admirer of Lamb will ever believe him capable of such conduct.

The “plate” is another difficulty in the matter. Talk of a poor Kerami's “plate!”

It is said that tobacco smoking contributes every year at least 1,000 millions of pounds of carbonic acid gas to the atmosphere.

IN Russia, soldiers are prohibited from smoking in the streets, the officers being permitted to do so in only selected places. It was found that the majority of fires was due to the lightened ends of cigarettes thrown away. Hence the precaution.

TOBACCO is at a discount in British Columbia. In schools, they teach, through a text book, the evil effects of both tobacco and alcohol. The legislature too has passed a law making penal the selling of cigarettes to minors. In our own city, cigars are getting into fashion in preference to the less deleterious and more enjoyable hooka. The boys too, grown “cheeky” under modern teaching or example, openly promenade the public streets with cigars stuck between their lips. Yet we would not have them betake to the hubble bubble. A school-boy, or for that matter any boy in his teens, puffing away a cheroot is a less intolerable sight than a juvenile or hobbledehoy pulling at the smoking pump. An occasional bird or pán—betel leaf with areca nut, quick-lime and catechu, &c.,—is the utmost stretch of dissipation allowable to the young generation for their own good. The evil of boys smoking in the street is developing rapidly. It needs check.

DR. Shaw, an American missionary in China, has stumbled upon a Chinese manuscript dating two hundred years before Christ, in which it is conclusively proved that America was discovered about the year 217 B. C. by one Hee Li, a Chinese navigator of the reign of Emperor Ching Wang. Somehow or other when taking a coast voyage, a yangsi beetle got into the compass, and prevented it from acting. Hee Li didn't know this, and sailed due east for days, not a little puzzled to find how long it took him to get to his destination. He subsequently fetched up on the coast of California, but did not know where he was, and how far from his objective. Meanwhile, one of the crew found the beetle, and Hee Li for the first time realized how he had found a new world. In the narrative of his strange adventure, Hee Li speaks with all a discoverer's enthusiasm of the country and the climate. He explored the Golden Gate and the Bay of San Francisco which he named the Great Bay, and then returned to China. Great was the sensation created by the adventures of the Celestial tar and boundless was the kudos obtained by Hee Li on his return. Nor was it the effervescence of a day. As a consequence of the discovery, a trade between the two countries sprang up.

To us, we confess, all that appears too much of a good thing.

It appears that Great Britain has 11 Universities, 334 Professors and 13,500 students, or over 30 professors and rather more than 1,227 students to each University. That is not a bad number of places and of teachers for high instruction for a small country. But the number of those receiving instruction is disappointing, compared with the population, and certainly falls short of England's pretensions as an enlightened nation. There are far more teachers than learners, the average being little more than 4 students per professor.

THE Indian Association for the Cultivation of Science held its annual meeting on Thursday at 5-30 P. M. Considering that it was a Hindu marriage day, the attendance for a sultry afternoon was good. Sir Charles Elliott, the President, presided. Dr. Sircar, the Founder-Secretary, read the report of the Committee for the year 1890, to which he added an address of great eloquence of his own. The regular business of the meeting over, the adoption of the report and the election of office-bearers for the current year, the Lieutenant-Governor concluded the proceedings with a speech from the chair. The Indian Civil Service is not remarkable for the "gift of the gab." In that very Association we have seen an eminent Lieutenant-Governor, who wielded a tranchant pen, cut a miserable figure, in attempting to mumble out the speech he held in his hand. Not so—indeed, very different—Sir Charles Elliott. Without being an orator, he speaks well with perfect self-possession and with distinctness to be understood and a voice to be heard at any ordinary meeting. His matter is always excellent. He has always something to say, and he says it with liveliness. Thus, at the Association on Thursday, his allusion to Moliere's jeweller at once established a fine understanding between himself and the audience. Of course the poor Calcutta reporters could not follow him in the French Comedy. As we expect a correct report, we will not say more on this occasion beyond stating that he spoke on the advisability of scientific knowledge if only as the best means for diversity of pursuits, which he gave as his nostrum for the galloping increase of Indian population, in addition to Sir James Caird's recipe of scientific agriculture.

MR. Ward, Judicial Commissioner of Lower Burma, has finished his investigations, under Act XXXVII of 1850, into the charges against Mr. Duke, late Deputy Commissioner of Pegu, arising out of the Pegu Bribery case. The charges were two in number, namely,

"First:—That Mr. Duke, while District Judge at Pegu, from an improper motive, failed to prosecute Oung Bah for an offence under section 162 of the Penal Code, and took part in an agreement with Oung Bah and Taroke Pyu in compounding that offence; Secondly, that he gave false evidence when a witness for Oung Bah in the case where the latter was convicted recently."

Mr. Duke would not admit the charges. Mr. Fox, the Government Advocate, prosecuted, while the defence was conducted by Mr. Vansomeran and Mr. Fagan. It was discovered that Mr. Duke had written to Mr. Moylan, the Counsel for Taroke Pyu, among other things, "I trust that as Taroke Pyu has agreed to this (compromise) you will let the matter end. To prevent a repetition of this I have ordered Oung Bah to leave the district." The prosecution does not say that the money reached Mr. Duke, but according to Oung Bah's story to Taroke Pyu it was given to Mr. Duke's mistress. Mr. Duke had explained to Government that "when I examined Oung Bah in the presence of Taroke Pyu he stated that the money was made over to him to engage a pleader; and as Taroke Pyu did not deny this and as he refused to prosecute, I, considering the matter a purely civil one, allowed them to settle it between themselves." He had admitted the letter to Mr. Moylan which he said had been carelessly worded and written in haste.

Taroke Pyu who was examined narrated how he was prevailed upon by Oung Bah to part with Rs. 1,140 to enable him to induce Mr. Duke to acquit the relative of the witness accused of dacoity.

In connection with the trial, the Rangoon Own Correspondent of the Indian Daily News writes:—

"The trial, which was a long one, having lasted three whole days and a good portion of the fourth, was before the Judicial Commissioner, Mr. W. E. Ward; and such a vast amount of evils as was disclosed! It all shows that our present system of administering the country on the cheap non-regulation principle is a great mistake. A man does not cease to be a man when he becomes a member of the services. We send a man out into the district to govern it. The whole place is wild and jungly outside the head-quarter station; in this station there is no one to check the actions of the district officer; all, in fact, are subordinate to him, and indeed have to depend on him for everything they want. He becomes really a little king, and his kingdom is his district. The Commissioner of a division, or a Chief Commissioner, has not a tenth of the power or influence which a Deputy Commissioner enjoys. And men in such places we leave practically uncontrolled. What can be expected in circumstances such as these?—what else but that frail humanity should fall under the inevitable temptations. This is just what happened in Mr. Duke's case; and it would not be going too far to state that, if an investigation were to be made to-morrow into the life of all our Deputy Commissioners, not two out of ten would be found better than the one whose conduct has so lately been the subject of inquiry. Mr. Duke, and others of his kind, are not so much radically evil as the produce of a bad system, which exposes weak human nature to excessive temptations of the worst type. Where is the use of making rules and regulations, issuing stringent orders and threatening condign punishment when there exist no means for carrying out rules and detecting evil-doers? Now, it is very well known that the Government has issued the most stringent orders against their officers keeping the women of the country as mistresses. If any should obey this order it is the head of a district, so as to set a good example to all in the district. Yet, in Mr. Duke's case, there is evidence to show he systematically broke this order, and did so with impunity. This is what his own witness, Oung Bah, said:—'I know Mah Le. I first made her acquaintance at Myobin, four or five years ago, when I went there. She was then living with Mr. Duke.' Then he said: 'Mah Le had been Mr. Duke's mistress at Pantanaw, and had followed him up to Pegu.' And what he said about her life in Pegu was 'she lived there as the Deputy Commissioner's mistress; everybody in the place knew that.' Now, what respect could such an officer ever have commanded from the people, or what could the masses ever have thought of the administration which, in spite of strict orders, permitted one of its highest district officers to move about from district to district carrying a Native paramour along with him openly? Nor was Mr. Duke ignorant that his girl's name had been used by people in connection with bribery cases. It came out in evidence that on one occasion Mr. Duke was present with his woman when money was paid to her, and it was told him what the money was given for. All this is extremely sad, and I would not have taken the trouble to relate it in detail, as has been done, but for the reason that in this paper complaints have been so frequently made about the conduct of these officials, and their dislike to have any of the non-official body settle in the districts. Their life is so sinful and sad that they are against any one becoming witness to the same; nor is the keeping of women their only transgression of rules and orders; their laches are as numerous as the sands of the ocean, or the stars of heaven. Unless the Government provides adequate checks on these district officers it cannot hope to keep its administration pure and free from scandals such as this one."

THE new Bengali weekly, the Bangabasi, the rival of the Bangabasi, in its new zeal and bid for a diseased popularity, has entangled itself in the meshes of the law. Last Saturday, three prosecutions were started in the magistracy against the proprietor, the editor, the publisher and the printer, for defamation. The complainants are respectively Baboo Dwarkanath Gangooly, Nilrutton Sircar and Sivanath Sastri, all of the Sadharan Brahma Samaj. The first complains of attacks on his wife, the other two, representing the said Brahma community, prosecute in the interests of the Samaj.

Whatever the merits of the cases, we hope the prosecution will not prove vindictive.

THE vengeance of the English Secretary of the Maharaja Holkar is complete. For insinuations against that official, the Correspondent of the Eastern Herald is in jail. The proprietor-editor too has gone the same way. And now the manager announces the extinction of the paper—in its third volume—with apologies all round for sins committed, consciously or unconsciously.

MAHARAJA Jotendro Mohun Tagore has returned to politics and the British Indian Association. He has been elected President for the year. Raja Doorga Churn Law, who had the manliness to give his opinion in favor of the Consent Bill, has been shunted out of the dignity, such as it is. He took it in good grace and himself proposed the Maharaja. Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, the champion of garbhadhanists in the Council, has been honored by the Association with a seat under the Maharaja as a Vice-President. The good Knight has also given him the solace of Mr. H. M. Rustomjee's company as a fellow Vice.

Raja Peary Mohan Mookerjee, of Uttarpara, who has commenced a crusade against those who had the audacity to support the Consent Bill, got the Association committed to the continuation of the agitation against the new law.

A JEWISH youth of twenty, named Solome Gubboy, a nephew of David Gubboy of this city, was on Tuesday morning heard to groan, when the whole house was awakened and he was found comatose, and died shortly after. Drs. Shroff and Butt who had been sent for and had examined the patient, certified that death was due to opium. There was no post mortem examination, the cause of death being no uncertainty in the opinion of the Coroner. Dr. Chambers, in answer to a question from the Coroner's Jury, said he was perfectly satisfied from the certificates of the two Doctors that death was due to a specific cause. There were, besides, all the appearances of opium poisoning, and he found no necessity for outraging the feelings of a respectable family who were observing the feast of the Passover. This feeling of the Coroner is commendable.

THE Coroner had sent up a case direct to the sessions. There was no magisterial enquiry as the evidence disclosed no offence. Recognizances were taken by the Coroner for attendance of the accused in the Sessions Court. Mr. Justice Hill who presided at the sessions said there was no offence, and ordered the discharge of the recognizances.

THE trial of Ambica Churn Bose charged with the murder of the Brahmin, Guja Sundari, has been postponed to the July sessions. A maternal witness, who in his attempt to protect the murdered woman was wounded by the prisoner, is still in hospital, and unable to attend court to give evidence.

THEY set a cannon to demolish a mosquito and they had not even the mosquito of the Bengali proverb to crush. Such is the ludicrous ending of this Manipur expedition. They had blundered at the beginning by despising the foe they might possibly meet with. It would be a walk over—a case of seeing and succeeding. A mere show of a few trim uniforms would be enough to cow down the Manipuris. It proved very different. Then when it became necessary to humble and chastise the self-respecting military chief who would not be arrested in his own palace and at the head of his troops, an expedition out of all proportion to the demand was fitted out and sent. The breathless warriors made their way through the difficult passes to the valley, to be disappointed of their prey. There was no foe to fight not even a city to burn or country to live upon. The Raja and the Senapati had fled towards the North East—the only way open, even if that be open.

They had made some arrangements and strengthened some stockades. But they could not be expected to face the overwhelming host which was making for Manipur from all points of the compass. They appear to have hurriedly left on the 20th, the day before the Briton was at their gate. It was a rather foolish position for a proud army to be in. Its thanks therefore are due to Captain Dury of the 4th Goorkhas for giving the avenging Force its only taste of blood. As commander of the reconnaissance of General Graham's column, he managed to hem in a small body of Manipuris, numbering less than 200 we imagine, and wanted orders to attack them. General Graham not only gave the orders but also overwhelmed him with help, in the shape of 2 mountain guns and 200 Goorkha rifles. The result was a massacre—the destruction of all the Manipuris. Cut off from hope, they fought as well as they could with their means. A Goorkha officer and sepoy have been killed and several men and officers wounded. Most of the English officers engaged were wounded. The way in which battle was forced on these Manipuris to the bitter end is scarcely creditable to Civilization. It is significant that there were no prisoners.

And now the question has to be decided—What to do with Manipur? Whatever may be done, we trust there will be no annexation. Burma was bad enough, but even the excuses on that occasion are wanting in the present instance. We would not like to see the fair name of Lansdowne tarnished by the reproach of annexation. That is a crime which history remembers and the people of India can never forgive.

THERE is distress in Upper India, more or less throughout. The signs are most observable in the great cities where men do most congregate. The destitution of the poorer classes in these centres of population is no new thing, though of course it has been aggravated by the failure of crops. In consequence of this, there seems an apprehension of bread riots and looting by the rowdies abounding in these cities. Such looting has already taken place at Benares under cover of religious exasperation. Something of the kind is apprehended at Cawnpore. In Lucknow, there was a distressing rumour for some days that something very dreadful would occur between the 26th and 30th April last,—say a rising of the mob, during which the bazaars would be looted and the incidents of 1857 repeated. The originators of the rumour ought to be traced and punished for creating false alarms.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, May 2, 1891.

COUNT VON MOLTKE.

A GREAT military and state Genius, the greatest of modern strategists, Field-Marshal Helmuth Carl Bernhard, Count Von Moltke, "Father Moltke" of the German people, died suddenly on the 25th April, from failure of action of the heart. It was time. He dies full of years and honors. On the 8th March 1889, he celebrated the seventieth anniversary of his entrance into the army, and, last year, his ninetieth birthday, which was proclaimed a school holiday throughout Germany by the Emperor. The Emperor deploras the Count's loss to the German empire as greater than the loss of the whole Army Corps. The funeral came off the next day. The body was conveyed by the Head-Quarters Staff of the German Army to the Railway station, thence to be taken to Kreisau, the Emperor William, King Albert of Saxony and the Royal Princes following the hearse on foot. Prince Bismarck kept away from the mournful demonstration.

The Englishman vindicated its leading position with a masterly article on Count Von Moltke immediately on the arrival of the telegram announcing his death, besides a long memoir of six columns. That is in the Printing House Square style. The leading article does full justice to the deceased. Without detracting from the glory of the statesman who kept his simple old master in hand and the minor Durbars at home in check, now tempting, now bullying them, and the Powers abroad amused or conciliated as far as possible, or suppressing the organising capacity of administrators like Von Roon, the writer recognises the daring strategy of Moltke and its effects in altering the map of Europe in favour of Prussia. Though the Carnot of Germany—the organiser of victory—the deceased was very far from a brilliant Frenchman. He was a plain substantial Teuton of solid worth. He was a linguist, familiar not only with the languages of Christendom but with those of the East. At one time he spoke Turkish like a native Stambouli. He would have made of Turkey a Great Power again, if permitted. But, like all our degenerate Eastern rulers, they know not their friends and would not see their interest. The Count was an inordinate lover of music. His other dissipation was whist. In fine, he was a plain householder who did not give himself the airs of a hero. He would not have made a remunerative "lion" to any speculative showman. He was far too taciturn. Indeed, it is but natural that one so accustomed to long stretches of earnest calculation should be so, until, in course of time, the habit became second nature. A German friend of ours was his neighbour and passed him daily in the street, bowing to the great man and receiving his nod in return, but they never made any nearer approach. Who could dare to disturb the great master of war? And Mars himself was the picture of a walking automaton. Yet our friend had an inviting presence and had distinguished connections and was withal a gentleman worthy of the company of any prince or professor. Nor was the case different with others. He was a silent hero absorbed in his own meditations. No such conversations of Moltke are recorded as of Bismarck. The only things brilliant about him were his achievements. He was above vanity. He had doubtless pride—who ever had better warrant for it? Without thorough confidence in himself he could not possibly have got sovereign and minister over to his views, nor scored the success he did. Though the embodiment of war as it were, he loved not fighting for itself. Above all, he was Guiltless of ambitious crime.

THE DRAINAGE SYSTEM OF CALCUTTA CONDEMNED.

THE drainage of Calcutta, about which there were always some misgivings or other in the public mind, is at last authoritatively condemned. It is pronounced to be radically wrong by an expert whose verdict is entitled to considerable weight. Mr. Baldwin Latham who had lately been in India to advise the Bombay Corporation about its drainage arrangements, has exceptional experience of the subject. He had the sole charge of the Thames Sewage scheme, and the investigations he had to carry on in connection with that scheme place him at a great advantage in advising upon any similar scheme as in Calcutta. His report on the Calcutta drainage system is moreover marked by most diligent and careful enquiries, and if he condemns the existing works, it is from no spirit of fault-finding. Indeed, nothing is so characteristic of his elaborate report as all absence of captiousness or conscious hostility of tone. The facts, however, established by his investigations, in which he had the valued assistance of Mr. Kimber, the Corporation's Engineer, leave him no option but to condemn. He finds the system defective both in design and the minor details of execution.

The lay critics of Mr. Clarke's scheme in the old Municipal Corporation are thus at last vindicated. Their blind instinct has somehow or other come true. It is certainly much to be regretted that public funds should thus be at the mercy of professional men, and an enormous capital expenditure undertaken upon advice which ultimately proves unable to stand the test of practice. Such experiences, however, are far from new or rare. How many costly engineering projects have been practical abortions, and the only wonder is we still go on implicitly relying on professional opinion as such. These experiences, at any rate, ought to teach us to be wary of individual opinion, even though of experts. These should be tried, one by another, and, above all, we should employ the usual circumspection and discretion which are considered so essential in ordinary affairs.

The sewers of Calcutta are wrong in design. It was a mistake to adopt what is called the combined system, that is, to make them serve the purposes of draining both the rainfall and the sewage, and Mr. Baldwin Latham does not therefore venture to recommend the same system for the additional works that are now required for the amalgamated area of the town. The sewers are also defectively constructed and ill protected. They are often found to contain deposit of solid matter, necessitating the disgusting process of sending men into them for its removal. The flushing arrangements are highly defective. Instead of clearing the sewers, they do positive injury and are, in Mr. Latham's opinion, the direct cause of much of the deposit found in them. Another serious disadvantage to the proper flushing of the sewage, arises from the difference in the time of the tides in the Hooghly and the Salt Water Lake. The tides in the Hooghly are two hours earlier than in the Salt Lake. The flushing naturally commences when there is high water in the Hooghly, and, as a consequence, no sooner the flush water gets through the sewers than it meets the high tide of the Salt Lake at the mouth of the outfall sewer, which practically produces stagnation in the sewers intended to be flushed! A pretty arrangement, surely!

The pumping machinery at the sewage pumping station is also inadequate. It is said to be barely sufficient to deal with the present dry weather sewage, but totally unequal to deal either with rain- or the flush-water, so that when either of these waters is present, there is no pumping. The consequence of this is something frightful. The penstock in the outfall is opened, and the whole mass of city sewage with water moves up and down in the sewers and outfall channels as it is controlled by the height of the tide.

Another error pointed out in the design is the making of all the inverts of sewers of varying characters at the point of juncture level or nearly level, so that when the sewage ceases to run parallel with the invert of the sewer, the velocity and discharge of the sewers is greatly retarded.

There are great defects in Mr. Clarke's design. The sewers are frequently water-logged, and when this is the case, and the outfall sewers are full, the lower parts of the city become the reservoir of rain water and mixed sewage, which cannot escape until the sewers have been relieved by the comparatively slow flow from them owing to this water-logged condition.

It is astonishing to discover how little foresight is exercised in forming original designs of such great works. The area and population at first intended to be drained are now considerably increased, requiring either the abandonment of the original works or the construction of additional works, both involving great outlay, which might be well avoided by laying the original plan on a wider scale with anticipation of future needs. This has been the case with roads, bridges, canals, water-works, and sewage-drainage. In view of this Mr. Latham now suggests that some districts around Calcutta whose insanitary condition must necessarily affect the sanitation of Calcutta, ought to be combined in any judicious scheme of sewerage and water-supply. His further recommendations we reserve for notice hereafter.

ENTRE NOUS :

OR INTERJOURNALISTIC AMENITIES.

WE recently congratulated a contemporary on its newborn zeal for knowledge late in life, as evidenced in its inquiry, after the passing of the Age of Consent Bill, into the Hindu marriage system, commencing at the beginning, the Betrothal. This passion has a tendency to grow and be infectious, and to lead from one department to another. Thus we have now to congratulate the conductor—a more appropriate word in the connection than editor or writer—on his noviciate in English literature. It must be a pleasure to all connected with the press to see one of the liberal craft trying to make up for early neglect and fit himself for his position. There is doubtless more zeal than wisdom observable in this particular effort at self-education. It has been begun, or is being pursued, at the wrong end. Instead of spelling through the grand old British drama, it would have been more to the purpose to master the spelling-book and learn the English grammar. However, the sign is good, and we who have so long been doing our little best to induce in our countrymen and our society a taste for letters, are truly glad to see the Dryasdusts of the chief organ of Hindu Philistinism at length recognise the claims of culture and art. Gamaliel can scarcely have ground for fret at the progress of his favorite cult, even though the first overt indication of conversion be an impertinent revolt against his personal authority. The incident recalls to us a Hindu father who was miserable on account of the failure of all his efforts to make his boy attend school or learn his lessons. He had set his heart on making a scholar of his own flesh and blood, but after years of hope he found himself no nearer the realization of his dream. At last one day, in the presence of the boy, he gave vent to his pent up feeling, saying, "If that fellow Sarbanand, clad in Europeanish trousers and so forth, will but 'damn rascal' me as Sabehs do, I can die in peace. I want no more." Our Sarbanand has done the trick, by hook or by crook. We are comforted at last. He has done more. He has not only "damn rascaled" us, but Shakespearised us into the bargain. This Shakespearising to be sure betokens not genuine literary lore, the show having evidently been got up with the help of the index-makers only. Never mind. Shakespeare is Shakespeare still, and from the cover-title to the Concordance is a great step for poor dear Sarbanand. We have done our work—in part at least. We shall now die in peace, leaving our tardily promising scapegrace all the poor Brahman's 50,000-old pins and pointed Delhi pumps and nagoras.

The Hindoo Patriot has noticed our leaderette on it in characteristic fashion. Our treatment was not very respectful perhaps, and we could not expect it to be pleasant, but it was discriminate and even kind. Certainly, the errors met with at every step in the organ of a wealthy society were touched with as light a hand as possible. If still we did not expect thanks, we were for once not sure of blackguarding. But old habits are not to be conquered, it seems, and some fellows will call names when they ought to reverentially pronounce "Father!" and make faces when they should bend low to your feet.

The blessed men! how they love us and are careful of our reputation! We asserted that the Hindoo Patriot is never personal except to others. And the very next number furnishes the proof—against our very self!

This respectable publicist has simply astounded us. Yet we have no reason to be surprised, after we saw him criticising our talor and continually harping on our outfit, at being called "rascal" and the rest of it. Is it a case of—

All seems infected that th' infected spy,

As all looks yellow to the jaundiced eye?

We are not only a rascal and a knave, but a "filthy rogue," nay, "a very filthy rogue." This abusive person speaks doubtless, to some extent at least, from personal knowledge. He surely knows intimately some one who is a very clean rogue, or, if you will, a very cleanly rogue—one who, with liveried servants, drives his brougham and lately added a horse to his stable in order to be able to enter appearance in the Council chamber in befitting style—driving in a chaise and pair—in expectation of appointment to the Council, and now drags the melancholy burden of chagrin and additional expense, for the very vacancy was not allowed to occur by an inscrutable Government which reappointed the old member and saved itself the humiliation of the bathos in action on which the tuft-hunter of the press had calculated.

One word more and we have done. Whether we are blackguard or not, the man who calls us so is something besides—an ass.

THE DIRTY LITTLE SNOB.

"There's nothing right but what I think,
There's nothing good but meat and drink,
There's nothing to compare with 'chink,'"

Said the dirty little snob.

"And work's the greatest 'bore' I know,
And learning's dull, and virtue 'slow,'
So, fast shall be the road I'll go!"

Said the dirty little snob :

Devout of sense,

An ass intense,

The dirty little Snob.

PUBLIC CONVEYANCES IN CALCUTTA AND THE SUBURBS.

Extract from the Proceedings of the meeting of the Bengal Legislative Council, held on the 5th April 1862, under the Presidency of Sir J. P. Grant.

Moulvy Abdool Luteef moved for leave to bring in a Bill for regulating public conveyances in the town and suburbs of Calcutta. The subject had been so frequently under the consideration of Government, as well as of the public, that anything from him by way of explanation would be superfluous. So far back as 1857, or six years ago, the municipal authorities of the town urged the propriety of a legislative measure to restrain the extortion of native livery stable keepers, provide a regulated scale of fares, and otherwise place the relations between the garrec-hiring community and the owners and drivers of the garrees, on a satisfactory footing. Since then two efforts had been successively made to carry out the recommendation, but, from unavoidable causes, without any definite results. It was the duty of the Local Legislature to give its attention to wants so repeatedly urged by a large and influential portion of the public, and acknowledged to be deserving of regard by their predecessors in the work of legislation. It was therefore in the belief that what he proposed would be eagerly accepted outside, and approved by the Honorable Members of this Council, that he asked for permission to introduce this Bill. The motion was put and agreed to.

Extract from the Proceedings of the meeting of the Bengal Legislative held on the 12th April 1862, under the Presidency of Sir J. P. Grant.

Moulvy Abdool Luteef moved that the Bill for regulating Public Conveyances in the Town and Suburbs of Calcutta be read in Council. He felt, he said, in so doing, the easy position of one who had nothing unusual to advance, and no opposition to encounter. The Honorable Gentlemen, who had successively undertaken the task, and had gone through the work of enquiry and report, had invited, and obtained the comments of the public on the merits of the proposed enactment, and had embodied the result of the whole in opinions, which had mainly guided him in the details of this Bill; so that there was hardly a subject so thoroughly matured and prepared for legislation, or on which the minds of people were so generally made up. To any one who had observed the vastly increasing prosperity of Calcutta, the increase of commerce and business of every description, it must be surprising how the convenience of those to whose ceaseless movements all this progress and improvement were owing, was neglected. For their benefit it was nothing but right and proper that the Council should establish laws and usages, which were in vogue in all civilized cities of the world, and the want of which here had been long and pressingly felt. It was not his intention to trouble the Council, with details of the proposed Bill; but to one or two points he would draw especial attention. The Bill, if passed into law, would not affect European Livery Stable-keepers, and for a reason which was in no degree invidious. They should legislate in the interests of society only in matters connected with the absolute wants and necessities of those composing it. To the man of business it was a matter of absolute necessity that he should be able to get a conveyance to carry him to his work provided he was going to pay for it. And to give him the right of hailing one at the nearest stand, and of bringing the law to punish non-compliance with a proper offer, was a real boon to him, while it violated no principle of justice or fairness. But hiring a carriage or a phaeton at Cook's or Hunter's was not an everyday necessity, and few resorted to it, except on occasions that warranted, at all events in their own eyes, the expense. No one ever complained of being made to pay sixteen Rupees for an hour's use of a coach and pair, or eight Rupees for a buggy. Those who paid were satisfied, and it was not for the law to prevent people from spending their money in any way they chose. It was quite different, however, when people absolutely depended for very livelihood on the daily use of conveyances, and those were in the hands of a class of persons not very scrupulous as to the use they made of their advantages, and in such cases the law could well interpose. Then it was proposed to bring under proper regulations the large body of Palkee-bearers in and about Calcutta—a measure that could not fail to be agreeable to a large section of the community at the Presidency. But, while the duties of Carriage-owners, and those of Palkee-bearers, were sought to be defined, strict care was taken to give the means of quick redress in all instances of ill-treatment and unfair withholding of hire. With these remarks, reserving further discussion for a more convenient opportunity, he begged leave to move that the Bill be read.

Extract from the Proceedings of the meeting of the Bengal Legislative Council, held on the 18th April 1891, under the Presidency of Sir C. A. Elliott.

The Hon'ble Mr. Cotton said:—In introducing the Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to hackney-carriages and palanquins in Calcutta, it will be convenient that I should, in the first instance, refer briefly to the history of the legislation in Calcutta relating to hackney-carriages.

It is nearly 27 years ago since legislation on the subject was first introduced into this Council. Our much respected fellow-townsmen Nawab (then Moulvie) Abdool Luteef was placed in charge of the first law relating to hackney-carriages in Calcutta. That measure became law as Act I of 1864 after considerable discussion. The objects of that measure, in the words of the hon'ble member, were "to restrain the extortion of native livery stable-keepers, provide a regulated scale of fares, and otherwise to place the relations between the carriage hiring community and the owners and drivers of gharries on a satisfactory footing."

After a brief interval it was, however, found that Moulvie Abdool Luteef's Act required amendment. Although it placed sufficient obligations on the owners of carriages, it was considered that it failed to exercise sufficient control over the drivers of carriages. Moreover, it left practically uncontrolled power in the hands of the registering officer. A Bill was therefore introduced by Mr. F. R. Cockerell into this Council to amend and supersede the former Act, and became law as Act V of 1866. That is the law now in force. There has been no substantive change in legislation on the subject, with the exception of an amending measure introduced by Mr. Reynolds in 1878. The Act of 1866 (Mr. Cockerell's Act) placed the registering officer and the administration of the law relating to hackney-carriages entirely under the control of the Commissioner of Police. The object of Mr. Reynolds' amending Act, IV of 1878, was to authorise the Local Government to place the registering officer under the control and supervision of the Corporation. That Act empowered the Local Government to make an order authorising the Corporation to exercise the powers exercised by the Commissioner of Police, and under that law the necessary order was passed, and since 1878 the registering office and the administration of the Hackney-Carriage Act have been transferred from the Commissioner of Police to the Municipal Commissioners of Calcutta. There was no other change made in the law.

Now, Sir, you, as well as all the members of this Council, must be well aware that from a long time past there has been growing up a strong feeling of dissatisfaction with the way in which the hackney-carriage service of Calcutta is administered. The public of Calcutta, both the residents and visitors to the place, have complained, and with good reason, of the extreme inefficiency of the lata gharries of the city, and of the disreputable manner in which they are turned out. The Municipal Commissioners of Calcutta, responding to the public sentiment on the subject, took the matter into their consideration last autumn, and appointed a Committee to enquire into the working of the Act and to suggest amendments. In this Committee the leading members were two representatives of the 'Trades' Association—Mr. Phelps and Mr. Remfry—and it is to those gentlemen in particular, as well as to the Committee in general, that the thanks of the Calcutta community are due for working out a scheme to improve the working of the hackney-carriage service of Calcutta. The Committee sat several times, and their report was laid before this Government on the 30th of March last. Their recommendation was that legislation should be resorted to, and that further powers should be given to the Corporation to carry out the objects of the Act. It was felt by the Government that it was very necessary to assist and encourage the Corporation in their praiseworthy endeavours to improve the administration of the hackney-carriage service, and no time was lost therefore in preparing a draft measure and in obtaining the permission of the Government of India to introduce it into this Council.

Mr. President—As it is not probable that I shall be in Calcutta during the deliberations of the Select Committee on this Bill, I venture to trespass on your time and on that of the Council at somewhat greater length than would otherwise have been necessary, in explaining some of the different changes proposed to be introduced in the substantive law on this subject. I have briefly explained them in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, but it will be convenient that, on this occasion, I should explain them in somewhat greater detail.

The first of the changes effected under the new Bill is to lay down that the working of the Act is to be entirely under the control of the Corporation of Calcutta. Under the existing law, as I have stated, it is in the power of the Local Government to authorise the Corporation of Calcutta to take measures for that purpose, but this Bill will place the working of the Act directly under the Corporation without any delegation of authority from Government.

It is intended also that financial responsibility shall accompany administrative responsibility. Under section 51 of the present Act, it is laid down that all penalties and fines levied under the Act shall be disposed of in such manner as the Local Government shall direct. In point of fact, in most cases in which the Act has been extended to mofussil municipalities, it has been directed by the Government that fees and penalties shall be credited to the municipality concerned. But this has not been done in Calcutta. There have been a series of conflicting and varying orders on the subject; but as the orders now stand, fees and penalties, after deducting working expenses, are credited to Provincial funds under the head of Police. A grant is then made to the municipality for the construction and maintenance of stands, and the balance over is again credited to Government. This is a very cumbrous arrangement, which it is undesirable should continue. I have therefore omitted in the present Bill the provision that all penalties and fees shall be disposed of in such manner as the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal shall direct, and the effect of this omission is that all fees levied will be credited to the Corporation; that is to say, the fees payable on the registration of carriages, the fees payable on drivers' licenses, as well as any fees which shall be leviable under the Act on account of transfers of registration or copies furnished. All these fees will be credited to the Corporation. But penalties or fines imposed in Magistrates' Courts will be credited, under the general rules on the subject, to the Government. It is of course at the discretion of the Government at any time to order, if it should be thought fit, that fines realised under any special law may be credited to the municipality; but there seems no reason to refer to this in legislation. At present it is contemplated that penalties and fines realised on convictions under the Act shall be credited, as penalties and fines for all other offences are, to the Government.

Another point of some importance is the arrangement made by this Bill in regard to jurisdiction. The present Act applies to Calcutta and the Suburbs of Calcutta. But since the Calcutta Municipal Consolidation Act has been passed, the expression "Suburbs of Calcutta" has no longer any definite meaning. As a fact the present law, worked under the registering officer appointed by the Corporation of Calcutta, is administered by the Corporation in communication with the adjoining municipalities, such as the municipalities of Howrah, Cossipore-Chittpore, Maniktollah and Dum-Dum. There is one registering officer maintained in Calcutta, who registers gharries for all these neighbouring municipalities, and, under arrangements come to with those municipalities, they receive a certain portion of the fees placed at the disposal of the Corporation. The South Suburban Municipality is worked separately. There is a separate registering officer there, and I am informed that the gharries of that municipality pay fees twice over both to the South Suburban Municipality and to the Calcutta Corporation. The Bill now before the Council is designed to avoid any difficulties which may be found to result from the present arrangement. It defines "Calcutta" as it is defined by the Calcutta Municipal Consolidation Act, but the next section (4) says:—"The Local Government may, by notification published in the Calcutta Gazette exclude from Calcutta any local area, or include therein any local area, in the vicinity of the same." It will therefore require a notification from the Government to include Howrah or any of these suburban municipalities within the limits of Calcutta for the purposes of this Act. But when they have been included by that notification, the arrangements which are in force in Calcutta will also extend to those municipalities, and it will be left with the local bodies concerned to make arrangements amongst themselves for distributing the fees and apportioning the expenditure.

The existing law authorises the Local Government to extend the provisions of the Act to any other local area in the Province where it may be found necessary to do so. This has been done in many places, and the same provision is continued in the present Bill. The last section of the Bill, which has been taken from the Madras Act on the subject, is new. It supplies what was an omission in the present law that, when the Act is extended to any town or place, the Local Government may appoint persons to perform the duties imposed by the law on the Commissioner of Police and the Registering Officer. In mofussil municipalities it will be convenient to entrust the powers of the registering officer to some subordinate official—it may be of the Municipality or it may be some Government official—and the powers of the Commissioner of Police will have to be delegated in the same way to some corresponding authority in the mofussil municipality to which the Act may be extended.

The next change to which I shall refer is the year of registration. Under the present law the year of registration dates from the 1st of April. It is proposed in this Bill to make the registration year take effect from the 1st of October, which will be convenient on the general ground that the Calcutta season commences in October or November, and the carriages licensed under the Act will therefore be new and smart at the time of the year when the season commences.

A more important change relates to the recognition of first class hackney-carriages on the same footing as second and third class carriages. Under the present law, no hackney carriage can be registered under the first class unless it belongs to a coach builder, hotel-keeper or livery stable-keeper, and does not ply for hire in the public streets. The consequence is that no one in Calcutta is aware that he has ever seen hackney-carriages of the first class. They exist in livery stables, but are not marked as such, and to the general public hackney-carriages consist entirely of second and third class carriages. By the change proposed in the Bill hackney-carriages of the first class will ply for hire in exactly the same way as second and third class hackney-carriages; there is to be no difference in this respect between them what ever. The only difference will be that the license fee and the rates of fare will be higher in the case of first class carriages, and they will therefore be of a better quality. There are also some minor details with which I need not trouble the Council regarding registration and license, the object of which is to strengthen the control of the municipality over the working of the Hackney-Carriage Department.

Another minor change to which I wish to draw attention is, that the age of the driver, which under the present law cannot be below 14, is raised by the Bill to 16. The fees for registration are also slightly increased. Under the present law a fee of Rs. 3 is paid for first class hackney-carriages, and of Rs. 2 for second and third class carriages. In the Bill before the Council, it is proposed that a fee of Rs. 4 shall be paid for first class hackney-carriages, of Rs. 3 for second class, and of Rs. 2 for third class carriages. It is proposed also, that, when any change of address is registered, the fee which would be realisable by the Corporation should be eight annas. At present there is no fee for transfer of ownership or changes of address.

There are sundry other changes in the Bill to which attention will be drawn in Select Committee, especially in regard to the amount of penalties imposed, the general tendency of the changes made being to reduce the penalties, especially in the case of drivers. Under the present Act it is found that the alternative penalty in default of payment of fine is somewhat excessive. For instance, in the case of a fine of Rs. 10, imprisonment for one month is imposed in default of payment of the fine, and this period of imprisonment seems excessive in comparison to the amount of pecuniary fine. It has been reduced in most cases, so as to be more proportionate to the amount of the fine which it is competent to a Magistrate to inflict.

Then the most important of the changes I think, which the Bill proposes is, that it authorises the Corporation to make bye-laws subject to the approval of the Government for the working of the Act. It is a serious defect in the present Act that no power is given to make bye-laws. It was not necessary of course that this power should have been given as long as the control of the hackney carriage service rested in the hands of the Commissioner of Police, but when that power was transferred to the Corporation of Calcutta, it was quite necessary that the power of making bye-laws should also be given to the Corporation. As a fact certain bye-laws have been framed by the Municipality, but as they are not authorised by the law, they are of no legal validity. It is proposed in the Bill that a variety of rules which it is not convenient should be contained in substantive legislation should be made by the Municipal Commissioners and enforced as bye-laws. The first of these has reference to the examination of the qualifications for drivers and the conditions under which they should be employed. This is a very important point. At present, as far as I am aware, drivers are not subjected to any examination at all, and we all know, I think from experience, that their ignorance of the topography of Calcutta is as great as can well be imagined. There is no reason why the standard of intelligence and the knowledge of the streets of Calcutta possessed by hackney-carriage drivers should not be considerably improved. In other countries it is usual to subject such drivers to examination both in driving and topography before they are allowed to take out licenses, and it is desirable that a similar course should be followed in Calcutta. But the rules on the subject should certainly be left to the local body which is responsible for the working of the law and need not find a place in the Act itself. Then there is the description of horses, harness and other things to be used in hackney-carriages, and the condition in which such carriages and the horses, harness and other things used therewith shall be kept. There are also other questions of importance, namely, the size of the carriages and size of the horses or ponies. These are all matters which ought to be provided for by the controlling authority in bye-laws, and there is the inspection of the premises on which the carriages, horses, harness and other things are kept. It is convenient that rules should be laid down for regular inspection, without which no proper control can be exercised. Then there is also what is of the first importance, namely, the protection of weak, lame and sickly horses. It is not too much to say that in the opinion of the Government this provision is the most important of all. It is a point to which public attention has been most prominently drawn, and it is a point on which the public expect, both of the Government and the Municipality, that they will adopt stringent measures to ensure improvement. Then there is the question of the publication of a table of distances. In other countries it is usual at a hackney-carriage stand to find a table of distances from which the public may learn what fare they will have to pay from such a point to such a point. This is a matter which the Municipal Commissioners should certainly consider, and they probably will prepare tables and have them put up at the stands for the information of the public. It is of course very necessary that these bye-laws should not have effect until confirmed by the Local Government, and this is provided for by the Bill, and a penalty for the infringement of any bye-law is also provided.

Now I come to the question of rates of fare. They are contained in a schedule annexed to the Act, and it is proposed in the present Bill to make some change in the existing rates. As regards first class hackney-carriages which are not referred to at all in the schedule to the present Act, as they are not under the existing law carriages which ply for hire, it is proposed that the fare by distance should be annas 8 for a mile or less, and 6 annas for every mile or part of a mile over and above the first mile; that the fare by time should be Re. 1 for one hour or less, and 8 annas for every hour or part of an hour beyond the first hour; and that for a whole day consisting of nine hours the fare should be Rs. 5. These are the rates proposed for first class carriages. With regard to second class carriages no change is proposed in the rates of fare by distance or in the fares by time, except that the provision in the present law, which authorises a special rate to be paid for half a day of five hours, is omitted entirely from the new schedule. As to third class carriages there is no change proposed in regard to the fares by distance, but there is a slight increase proposed in regard to the fares by time. The present law imposes a fare of 6 annas for the first hour or part of an hour; this is raised by the Bill to 8 annas, and for every hour or part of an hour beyond the first hour the rate is raised from 3 annas to 4 annas, and for a whole day consisting of nine hours the rate is raised from Re. 1-8 to Rs. 2; and as in the case of second class carriages the rate for half a day of five hours has been struck out. The object of raising the rates in regard to third class carriages is to enable a better standard of carriage and horse to be kept up, as the complaint of the owners of third class hackney-carriages is that really they cannot afford to keep up better carriages or to entertain a better class of ponies, and this slight raising of the rates of fare will remove the cause of this complaint. It is expected of the Corporation that they will insist on better third class carriages being maintained, and of the public that they will be prepared to pay slightly increased rates of fare in return for a better article.

The Act relates not only to hackney-carriages, but to palanquins, but it is not proposed to make any change in the existing law in regard to palanquins.

There are various petty alterations, many of a verbal character, in the Bill, and, with reference to the number of changes effected, it has been considered advisable to repeal the existing law entirely and to propose a new enactment in its place. As the President has told you, it is not the intention of the Government to hasten or rush the passing of the Bill in Select Committee. As the Bill has been laid before you to day after suspension of the rules of business, no doubt it has the appearance of having been pressed somewhat more rapidly than is usual in the case of Bills introduced into this Council, but such pressure was unavoidable having regard to the late date on which the Government received the papers on the subject from the Chairman of the Corporation. The intention of the Government is that the Bill shall be published in the Gazette and circulated through the press and other channels to all persons interested in its provisions, and that they should be asked to favour the Government with their opinions. It is hoped that these opinions may be collected in the course of two or three months, and that it may be possible to pass the Bill during an autumn session, so that it may take effect from the new year, which, as I have informed you, it is proposed to date from the 1st of October.

With these remarks I beg to introduce the Bill and to move that it be read in Council.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment—Travellers to and from distant climes would do well to bear in mind that these changes and the altered diet and surroundings of their lives entail manifold risks to health. Occasions are sure to arise in which they will need a remedy such as these renowned Pills and Ointment, and no traveller by land or sea should ever fail to have a supply at hand. Then he may truly be said to have a physician always at his call for the various emergencies of travel. Chills and fevers should be promptly treated, and the printed directions should be carefully studied at the commencement of any illness, for Holloway's remedies can be safely used in all climates.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

A LITTLE MISTAKE.

SHE felt he'd claim her as his own,
For woman's wit is quick to see
The growth of seeds by Cupid sown
Just after tea.

She blushes red when slow she hears
The low-toned words he just has said,
And trembling on the verge of tears,
She blushes red.

And startled at the look she bears,
For ere he finished her soft head
Droops and to his shoulder nears.

He hastes to say, 'midst hosts of fears,
"I love—I love that gingerbread
Your dainty little hand prepares."
She blushes red.

GONE.

The shadow of a tent I saw,
Along the sloping sand,
A tent upon a headland high—
That bulwark of the land.

By day I heard the campers laugh ;
And when the evening star
Shone soft above the sea's dark rim,
Like lighthouse lamps afar—

How jubilant the sweep of song
That burst from out that tent,
A song to which the roaring sea
Its bass deep-sounding lent.

To-day that tent 'is gone ! It left
No trace upon the sand,
A lonely sky is overhead ;
Below, a lonely land.

And yet the campers' song goes on ;
It sounds along the shore,
I hear it in the snowy surf
That breaks in wild uproar.

Is life a tent, a transient tent,
Do not we often say ?
A shadow on the stretching sand,
So swift we pass away ?

To-night I sit alone and hear
The songs my dead did sing,
And in mine ears their voices clear
Will never cease to ring ;

The song of deeds by souls that went
Like saints in garments white ;
Of honest speech, of highest aims,
That sought and found the light.

Oh, vanished tents of pilgrim lives,
So transient by the sea,
What though the singer must pass on ?
The song shall stay with me.

E. A. RAND.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

WE are told that two ladies, who had equal repugnance to stating their age, or making a false declaration, evaded the census return by driving about London all night in a cab. They are Girls of the Period, of course, but representative women of all ages still !

It is gravely stated that Lady Macdonald, wife of the Premier of Canada, is a total abstainer. What ! are ladies in general such heroic swimmers ? Is it so rare to find a lady who has no relations whatever with the bottle ?

THE Chinese Board of Astrology reported that "the wind on New Year's Day blew from a quarter which presages long life and an abundant harvest." There is a remarkable sameness in the astrology of different nations from China to Peru.

SIR James Johnstone, late Political Agent at Manipur, protests strongly against annexation of that country. According to him, a large and costly punitive expedition was neither necessary nor desirable. A force of 1,500 with an ample complement of European officers would have been sufficient.

A RECENT census of Indian students at Oxford gives a total of 17. Of these, nine are Hindus, including Mahratha and Bengali Brahmans, three Mahomedans, four Christians, including a lady and two Eurasians or Portuguese, and one Parsi. Of the 17, again, only two are married being of the ages of 26 and 29. A third is a widower of 30.

MADRAS seems to be suffering from two pests—the mosquito and the Coom. The People's Friend thus describes the situation :—

"Madras and its suburbs have been visited with the plague of mosquitoes for some months and this, perhaps, is owing to the absence of the regular monsoons. Wherever one goes it is the humming of the winged insect round about oneself and painful reminders that blood is being drawn from your person. In church or chapel, in the office or at the court, in home or at a visit, the tormentor gives you no peace

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Not all the sulphur smoking of bed rooms expels them from their lodgings as one is hardly off the land of nod when a sting bids adieu to repose. Evidently the mosquito rejoices over its feast for it trumpets away at the sight of its carnival. To add to this nuisance, the Coom wafts its offensive odours all over the town. When is the purification of this ditch to begin? The Engineers and Municipality have sent in their schemes and views to Government, but nothing is known than that the Coom is to be purified. Why cannot the Government adopt the cheaper and simpler method of employing coolies and treat the clearing of the river as a famine work? A few hundred men and women could in a few weeks deepen the bed in a way as to permit a free flow of water from Ennore, which lake is full. The deepening should be extended up to the Lock. The object should be to make the Coom a tidal stream. It looks extremely selfish for the Governor, Councillors and other big folk to desert us at this time to die, or get ill, from miasma, while they are enjoying lovely scenery, invigorating breezes, picnics, lawn tennis and other temptations to breaking the seventh and tenth Commandments. We trust the authorities will attend to the cleaning of the Coom as speedily as possible before an epidemic makes its appearance."

We too here are troubled by the mosquito and distressed by another and a new experimental nuisance—the Harrington incinerator.

MR. Henry Heylyn Hayter, C.M.G., Government Statist of Victoria, estimates the total population of the world at 1,510,281,000 persons, Five-ninths of the population are found in Asia, but, though that continent is considerably more than double the peoples of Europe, yet owing to its greater area, the density is little more than half that of Europe. Asia is returned as having 830,599,000 population; Europe, 349,873,000; Africa, 203,321,000; America 121,335,000. Australia and Polynesia and Polarland together maintain a modest 4½ millions. Taking the average of Europe, less than 94 people are found to one square mile. Asia has 49 persons to the square mile, Africa 18, America 10. Less than two persons are found to the square mile in Australia and Polynesia. Polarland maintains about one person to every twenty miles. Europe has an area of 3,713,340 English miles; Asia, 17,150,210 miles; Africa, 11,514,770 miles; America, 15,311,490 miles; Australia and our Polynesian Isles comprise some 3,500,000 miles; and Polarland (mostly unexplored), 1,728,500 miles.

MR. Chamberlain is a good hand at a screw—that is his business. He is no "screw," however, if we may believe those of our people who have seen him at home. Although he has been an alderman and a mayor in the latitude of Brummagem, he is a man of refined and costly tastes. He can enjoy something more and better than turtle soup. He is passionately fond of flowers, and has, we believe, one of the finest conservatories in the country. Such a man must of course be master of a mint of money. Mr. Chamberlain is now providing for his sons in a characteristic way. He has purchased Mayagana, one of the Bahamas, where he has sent his two boys to explore and make trials in fibres fit for cultivation on a great scale.

SINCE the death of Sir Edgar Boehm, who received the commission for the statue of the late Governor of Bombay, the Reay Memorial Committee have arranged with Mr. Gilbert, A.R.A., for the work.

What of the Ripon Memorial in Calcutta?

It is announced that the Daily Telegraph is about to spend £1,00,000 in new machinery, whereby the paper, which is to be enlarged to ten pages, will be printed, cut, folded and pasted together in one operation. This is a proper advertisement for the great concern. Just the trumpet blast for Jupiter Junior!

A POLICE officer of Serampore, Inspector Mohit C. Banerjee, has brought on himself trouble by his indiscreet zeal. On receiving information that a man of the cowherd caste had a revolver in his possession, he searched his house and, discovering the weapon, prosecuted him. The man's defence was that the revolver was a useless piece of iron, in consequence of which he had not thought it necessary to apply for a license. The magistrate came to the same conclusion and discharged the defendant. The man now sued the Inspector for Rs. 500 damages. The Munsiff has properly dismissed the case with costs, on the ground that the Police acted in good faith, no malice being shown. The case is characteristic of the present temper of the masses, a temper which has its good side no doubt but which is not one to be freely encouraged. It discloses the difficulty which the Police have to encounter in the discharge of their duties. We are all ready to cry out against the inefficiency and tyranny of the Police, but what are the Police to do when even in the zealous working of a law for the safety of the empire an Inspector may be harassed in this way by a cowherd?

A CORRESPONDENT of the Indian Daily News writes from Bankura:—

"Bankura is a down-right land of gold. Here the Sessions Judge is a Sonabania, and in the Educational Department from the Inspector, Assistant Inspectors, down to the very Deputy and Sub-Inspectors, are all of the same yellow caste!

What! have the Government of Bengal by advice of their Ethnologist sent all the "golden bankers" in the service to the right about to the Ethnic Frontier? There is not only ethnographic warrant, but also philologic propriety in locating most of the banker caste in Bankura or, according to the Indian pronunciation, Bank'ro.

The following Bankura news is from the same source:—

If the Age of Consent Act does no good to the country, it has already given an impetus even to the very stony orthodox community, who used to look upon any reform with dismay and horror. The Hindoos of this quarter will soon have a monster meeting to curtail the bridal dowery (Paun) and cutting the matrimonial connection with the Kulins, if they still adhere to their Shylockian custom with regard to the marriage expenses. I wish them success."

A HIGH dignitary of the Greek Church who had passed many years at Yakutsk, Okotsk and other places, informed Miss Kate Marsden at Ooffa whilst there on her way to Tobolsk, that the natives in those regions cured themselves of leprosy by means of herbs and that this terrible disease was not accounted incurable in Eastern Siberia.

THE cases between the Missionaries, Mr. Summers and Mr. Edwards, and the twenty-five sunyasis for assault and interference with preaching at Tarkessur, have terminated. Both sides have lost and won. The cross prosecutions have been dismissed.

SOMETHING like the late missionary outrage at Tarkessur in Bengal was repeated towards the end of last month at Bangalore in the South. It was the anniversary of the car festival in honour of Muttiālmah. As usual it was celebrated in Sippings Road, St. John's Hill. Certain preachers of the different missions began their operations just a yard distant, if distant that can be called, from the car of the goddess Muttiālmah. For some time all went merrily. The Hindus in gay dresses were in festival mood, bent on mild enjoyment in their way. They flocked to the preachers as an amusement served gratis. After some time, however, a boy more forward than the rest took it into his head to give a practical direction to the fun by throwing a handful of dust on the face of a convert preacher. This was resented, a confusion followed and a struggle ensued between the two sides. At last the Christians were overpowered and the poor preacher was near being consigned to the gutter, when a party of Eurasian youths, attracted by the noise, ran to the rescue. By this it was time enough for the Police to enter appearance, and now Inspector Meller arrived with his men, and all was peace and order. Mr. Meller arrested the boy who disturbed the preaching and threw dust at the native Christian preacher. To the credit of these native Christians, however, they prevailed upon the Inspector to let the mischievous boy off.

SATURDAY, the 30th May next to be kept as the birthday of Her Majesty the Queen and Empress of India, has been declared a public holiday under "the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881."

THE remainder of Act XI of 1890, the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1890, has been declared applicable to a number of municipalities in Bengal named in the Calcutta Gazette of this week.

THE jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes of Howrah has been extended to include thana Bally within the jurisdiction of the Munsif of Howrah.

REVISED Rules framed by the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal, under the Court Fees Act, VII of 1870, confirmed by the Local Governments of Bengal and Assam, and sanctioned by the Governor-General in Council, are published in the Calcutta Gazette of the week.

MR. W. E. Ward, C.S.I., Judicial Commissioner of Lower Burma, is Gazetted Chief Commissioner of Assam.

THE Superintendent of the Royal Botanical Gardens, Calcutta, and of Cinchona Cultivation in Bengal, will henceforth have the additional dignity of Director of the Botanical Survey of India.

KHAJEH Mahomed Azgar has been elected Chairman of the Dacca Municipality, and Babu Ishur Chunder Das has been re-elected Vice-Chairman.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Emperor William did not send congratulations to Prince Bismarck on his last birthday. Does His Majesty think the retired Chancellor is making too long a stay in the world? Ungracious monarch! But then, there are no men so ungrateful as sovereigns. And even salaried rulers ape the men of divine right to a nicety.

NAWAB Diler Jung Bahadar alias Abdul Huk is in no hurry to file his written statement in the suit of the Nizam against him in the Bombay High Court. He has obtained further time till the 15th September to disclose his defence. This is the way with these Nawabi cases. It was in the same manner that in the late Nawab Nazim of Bengal z. Raja Prosunno Narain Deb, at Moorshedabad, the defendant who was at his wits' end for an answer deferred the evil day, obtaining postponements even by the influence of the Residency, till, in the course of a year, he could get some one to effectually intercede for him with his old master, who, after all, forgave him and all his offences.

IMITATING the bait to catch donors, held out by Sir Alexander Mackenzie while Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, the British Resident at Hyderabad, Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick, has issued orders for commemorating donations of Rs. 500 or upwards to a hospital, dispensary, school, or for improvement of the sanitation, water supply, or site &c., of a neighbourhood, by a tablet of marble or brass. As a further stimulus a notification in English and in the vernacular setting forth the provisions of those orders will be framed and suspended in every tahsil hospital, dispensary, and school in Berar.

EVERYTHING in these days is being vulgarized, from hearts to diamonds. Another land of the last mentioned gem has been found—not in the Gorgeous East or even the Far West, but in the cold North Lapland. Meanwhile, a French savant, M. Fremy, has published a work on the Synthesis of Rubies, and on the 27th February last, at the French Academy of Sciences, on the occasion of presenting it to that body, he declared that he had obtained numerous rhombohedral crystals identical with those found in nature. This was, after many trials, calcining a mixture of aluminium, red lead, and potassium bichromate for several hours in an earthenware crucible.

THE St. James's Gazette, which usually compares favorably with the rest of the British Press in acquaintance with Indian matters, can yet be foolish as any other journal in Great Britain. The Statesman quotes from one of its recent issues the following:—

"The fighting races (of India) make very fine janissaries; but there is always a certain element of danger about such troops, especially when they can be reinforced to an indefinite extent by recruits of their own blood and kin."

Fine Zouaves, the writer might as well write. Indeed, fine Zouaves or Chasseurs would have been more to the purpose—something in the direction of the truth. In point of fact, there never was a wilder comparison. It is a random shot and the Statesman well exposes the pretence to Eastern knowledge and historic lore. Our contemporary takes the opportunity to give in brief the history of the famous Turkish corps from its foundation to its destruction in 1826 by Mahomed VI.

THE Queen's partiality towards her Indian domestics, which hitherto known only in court circles became generally known on the occasion of Her Majesty's last trip to the Continent, has exercised a good many people in England. We wonder what these gentlemen would have us do, or where go. Are not Indian "natives" fit even for the table of the well-fed Britons? Must they return to their native element and hide their heads deep in the bed of the Indian Ocean? Are the Indians not to serve their sovereign even in the meanest capacities? We can understand the dissatisfaction of the valetocracy of the British Court but we never thought the press should be so mental-minded as to make a public grievance of Her Majesty's preference for her dark domestics.

Tennyson has sung the fierce light that beats upon a throne. Now the scorching blast of criticism is being directed by the press against the Palace footmen and other attendants. Much is being made to their prejudice of these poor strangers of such little things as the following:—

"One of the Indians amused himself during the Queen's journey from Cherbourg to Paris by playing with the alarm signal, which is displayed in every carriage of the Royal train, the result being that he touched the spring, and the alarm bell rang loudly, to the consternation of the officials. The train was, of course, stopped, and the functionaries and members of the suite rushed to the Queen's saloon to ask what was wrong, when, lo and behold, it turned out to be simply a frolic of this capering Hindu! The result of the delay was that the train reached Paris twenty minutes late."

These Oriental servants at any rate are not likely to inconvenience her or put her out by occasional forays into the cellar or fits of intemperance. The blacks have their good points.

THE late Earl Granville is said to have retained his powers of understanding to the last, yet his memory had considerably waned. The Home Correspondent of the Planters' Gazette tells how one day he actually of a morning quietly invaded the sanctum sanctorum of Tory politics, the Carlton, and, taking his seat, began to read a newspaper, when one of the members of the Club and of the Ministry into the bargain came up and with a significant laugh addressed him, What in the world are you doing here? The old peer innocently retorted, "That's a question I ought to ask you. How have you come into this place?" If that account is true, it evidences failing faculties on both sides. It looks like the encounter of a couple of matter-of-fact North Britons. Such a rare situation deserved to be better utilised. Lord Granville at any rate was famous for making the most and best of small occasions. And surely the great Conservative club has still enough of its wits and grace left it not to abuse such a wind-fall of an opportunity for a fine practical joke. The Tory Minister who went up to the always amiable and utterly venerable Liberal leader in the House of Lords like a "Bob" with his baton to eject him as a trespasser with a plain interrogatory, is a downright "duffer." He ought to be black-balled for his pains. He cannot be a strength to the Government.

AFTER a brief spell of hallucination, the Indian Mirror is returning to its normal condition of abnormality. The present Viceroy has been taken up as his predecessor had been. Our contemporary has made up its mind that Lord Lindsay will soon retire. "Whether he is compelled to do so from the unsuitableness of the climate of this country, or because of political and other causes," it is the same thing. Not that our contemporary has any particular sources of information to tempt it to oracular deliverances ex cathedra. Nothing of the

SHAKESPEARE LESSONS FOR PROMISING OLD BOYS OF THE PRESS.

Clown. Marry, you are the wisest man; for many a man's tongue shakes out his master's undoing; to say nothing, to do nothing, to know nothing, and to have nothing, is to be a great part of your title; which is within a very little of nothing.

Parolles. Away! thou'rt a knave.

I. Drawer. Sir, ancient Pistol's below, and would speak with you.

Doll Tear-sheet. Hang him, swaggering rascal! let him not come hither: it is the foul mouth'dst rogue in England.

Falstaff. He's no swaggerer; a tame cheater, I' faith; you may stroke him as gently as a puppy greyhound—he will not swagger with a Barbary hen, if her feathers turn back in any show of resistance.—Call him up, drawer.

Pistol. Then to you, mistress Dorothy; I will charge you.

Dol. Charge me! I scorn you, scurvy companion. What! you poor, base, rascally, cheating, lack-linen mate! Away, you mouldy rogue, away! I am meat for your master.

kind. Its grounds for sending the Viceroy away are far from recondite. They are charmingly naïve.

Says the writer :—

"The rumours of his retirement have been strong both in India and England. The Englishman, as usual, has come forward with a contradiction, but the denial is a matter of course, and the public, as a rule, endorses the truth of what the Hare Street and other semi-official journals so readily and officiously contradict. When the Englishman, therefore, says that Lord Lansdowne has no intention to resign, we may rely upon it that the resignation will not be late, following upon the contradiction."

The poor Englishman and its miserable scribe suborned to perjure for the Government! To be sure, the Englishman is not alone in the denial, the Pioneer also having contradicted the rumour. But in our contemporary's eyes, they are both naughts or negatives and the united protestations of two such lying valets do not constitute a particle of truth. To such a pass has Indian journalism come! And, indeed this sort of plain speaking is, to the misfortune of the land, popular.

A singular circumstance about the editor's present political mind is its attitude towards the late Viceroy. Whether the course of events or fresh light has reconciled him or not, or whether the exigencies of our contemporary's art of vituperation require a contrast of colours, there is certainly at last a disposition to do justice to the retired Governor-General. Thus we read :—

"However opposed we were to Lord Dufferin's administration, and though we were obliged to condemn it for one reason and other, we could never ignore his high diplomatic talent, which approached as near statesmanship as possible. But Lord Lansdowne has given proof of neither statesmanship nor even diplomacy."

Well, be it so. There is some room for consolation in this sort of thing. Justice is a question of time. When, in due course, the next man comes, Lord Lansdowne too will receive his due. Then the Indian Mirror is sure to awake to the truth by and bye that he was not so bad as he had been painted—by himself.

Of course, our contemporary lays the whole disaster in Manipur at the door of the Viceroy. Others do the same—some of the most sober and enlightened politicians—but on very different grounds. The Mirror's reasons are original. In fact, there is but one reason, and it is this :—

"What led up to this disaster at Manipur? Though the connection may appear remote and far-fetched, it was, nevertheless, we think, the appointment of Mr. Quinton to the Chief Commissionership of Assam. This was as good as a jobbery, for he it remembered that Mr. Westland was first nominated to the office, but, in some mysterious manner, this arrangement fell through, and Mr. Westland retired from the service in disgust."

A horse! a horse—my kingdom for a horse!

SPECIAL correspondence in some shape must have come into being early in the history of journalism. The Times which has brought the press to perfection, certainly early employed special agents. If we remember rightly, at the beginning of this century, Mr. Henry Crabbe Robinson became its correspondent abroad. The long Peace after the decisive battle of Waterloo, however, was not favorable to the development of this sort of enterprise. When at length a great war came, the Times was found equal to the occasion. Ah! at once the modern system of special correspondence burst in all its completeness upon the world, like Minerva from the brow of Zeus. People scarcely noticed when Mr. William Howard Russell, a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, one of the most promising young fellows on the reporting staff, physically as well as literarily, of the Times, found himself at Gallipoli in April 1854, ready to chronicle the first occupation of Turkish soil by the Allied Powers. But the new instrument of government and civilization soon made itself felt. The marks of inefficiency and waste of administration lay on the surface, and young Russell was not the man to baulk them for fear or favour. He had to pay the penalty of truth, of course. He had before encountered not a little opposition to the rôle of Reporter of the general public at the seat of war undertaken by him. Having, with the permission of the Commander-in-Chief, attached himself to the Guards, the first on the Expedition, taken his passage for Malta with them and even taken possession of his berth, he had been turned out by telegraphic message. But he was not to be baulked of his purpose by official obstruction. So he left the vessel to proceed on his own bottom to Marseilles and thence reached Malta before the Guards themselves. Thus he had gone farther. But now he and his were to be starved out of the following of the Expedition. Notwithstanding orders from Home, he was not allowed his rations and his forage from the Commissariat. Thus harassed at every step, scorned and sat upon, he kept his brave heart up and stuck like a leech to the army, and found with it on the bleak Crimean coast. Meanwhile, the Times had wrung some little recognition for its agent, and his own tact did the rest.

At length his opportunity came with the events of the war. The account of the very first battle in the Times warned the world of the presence of a genius for description. Nothing indeed escaped the notice of the Times' Argus, who became a power and an unquestioned instrument of public good. The example of the leading journal was followed by other members of the Press. Thus arose the Special Correspondent. Dr. Russell is now jotting down in his weekly the Army & Navy Gazette his Crimean recollections, commencing with the battle of the Alma. We subjoin the following general reflections from his first paper :—

"The invasion of the Crimea, regarded merely as a military operation, was not bold simply. Boldness may be justified. The descent upon the coast of the Chersonese was more than bold. It was rash. The allies were utterly unprepared for such an enterprise. It was known that a Russian army was encamped at an easy march from the Old Fort, as the scene of our landing was named, and that they had, of course, cavalry and horse artillery. The allies alighted on the shore like so many flocks of birds, but, had it been necessary, they had no wings to fly away with again. They squattered down on a sandbank on a narrow belt of beach, at the other side of which, parallel to the sea-shore, there was a salt-water lake. I say nothing of the state of the French, who had no cavalry whatever, though they had tentes d'abri and caçoles; nor of the Turks, who had neither cavalry nor food; but I speak of the force en bloc. The British had cavalry, but they had neither transport, nor tents, nor ambulances, nor litter! It is not too much to say that if the enemy, informed of our arrival and landing on September 14, had sent their field artillery quietly down in the dusk and opened fire on the bivouacs of the troops that night, they would have done immense mischief, greatly demoralised the allies, and much impeded the landing. The fleets could have done nothing to prevent them. The ships dared not open fire. Outside the bivouac fires, all the transports, with masthead lights and lanterns blazing, snowed like the Milky Way. I heard afterwards that one artillery officer, Stahonpine, made the horrible suggestion that the attack should be made. He told me so. How glad I am the Russians did not act on it!"

A WEEKLY contemporary gave out a few days ago that it was in contemplation to appoint a European Civilian as Vice-President in the Council of Regency at Rampore, in the place of the late General Azimooddeen Khan Bahadur. But we could not think it to be true, as we were not satisfied with the soundness of such a policy and were loath to believe that Lord Lansdowne would approve of such an appointment in the present disturbed state of the feelings of the people of Rampore.

A paragraph however appears in yesterday's issue of the Pioneer, which runs as follows :

"We learn that Munshi Hamid-uz-Zafar Khan, Manager of the Court of Wards' Estates in the Bara Banki District, and a nephew of the late General Azimuddeen Khan Bahadur, has been temporarily appointed special Assistant to the Lieutenant-Governor's Agent in Rampore."

This shows that a European Political Agent only has been appointed to watch over the administration at Rampore—not that a European official has been told off to assume the administration of the state in the place of the deceased General.

The appointment of a Political Agent in the present state of affairs would certainly be a move in the right direction, as the head of the executive would just now be in need of the help and advice of such an officer in the administration. But the chief administrator ought to be a native gentleman of position and ability.

We do not however approve of the policy which has led to the selection of Munshi Hamid-uz-Zafar Khan (who, we believe, is a brother and not a nephew of the General Azimuddeen) for the post of the right hand man and chief adviser of the Political Agent.

We had been to Rampore in the time of the late Nawab Kalb Al Khan, and from what we saw of the turbulent character of the residents of that town, we are of opinion that great care should be taken in carrying on the administration, at this critical moment.

The ruler of the state is a minor and a ward of the Government of India, and we are exceedingly anxious that nothing should be done during his minority which may bring about complications that may ultimately be injurious to his interests.

WE hope the report is true, that Dewan Thakur Pershad, the chief financial officer of the state of Bhopal, who, we are told, had been in jail with fetters, has been released after a long period of incarceration.

The post of Dewan had been held by him and his forefathers for more than a century, and he had the reputation of being the ablest and most upright of the officers of that state.

We are still in the dark as to the nature of the crime which was laid at the door of a venerable old man of upwards of 70, and for which he was rigorously imprisoned; and we shall be glad if our correspondents in Central India would enlighten us on the point.

WE are sorry to find that Her Highness Nawab Shah Jahan Begum of Bhopal has not yet been reconciled to her only daughter and heir, the heiress-apparent Nawab Sultan Jahan Begum. And we suspect that it is not the interest of the advisers of Her Highness to bring about such a reconciliation. The children of the heiress-apparent are growing up, but they are entirely neglected and ignored by their grand-mother, the Ruler, and hence their education, we are afraid, is not properly attended to.

In the meantime, Her Highness has adopted a little boy, the son of some distant relative, and settled upon him a valuable jagheer. It is also whispered in court circles that the Begum's object in adopting him, is to obtain the sanction of the Foreign Department to declare him the heir-apparent, in place of Sultan Jahan Begum.

How this can be done is beyond our comprehension, as Sultan Jahan was declared heiress-apparent many years ago, with the full sanction of the Government of India; and the Mahomedan law, unlike the Hindu, allows no adoption.

News reaches us of great rejoicings recently held at Bhopal on the occasion of the ceremony of Bismillah Khance of the boy, and presents of large sums of money to all the officers of state, relatives and others, in celebration of the occasion on a grand scale.

THE Sportsman says:—

"Head measuring is evidently a more interesting pursuit, after the discoveries made by a Hindu gentleman in the line, than it may seem at first sight. A University man, in a newspaper letter, had referred slightly to the circumference of the cranium of the average Indian by saying that the 'average European head is to the average Hindu as the head of a man to that of a boy.' The patriotic Hindu endeavoured to refute this slander, by measuring the heads of Christians, Mahomedans, Parsis and Hindus who had gathered at a Congress at Calcutta. Out of a hundred heads taken indiscriminately, 23 were under 21 in. circumference, 50 were over 20½ and under 22, 25 were from 22 to 22½ whilst 22 had a circumference of 23 in. The average struck was therefore 21½ which corresponds to that of a European female, the European male having another inch allowed him as brain space. The measurer has not apparently gained much for his race but rather proved the argument that the inch or two's difference in head circumference was the principal reason why a hundred millions allowed themselves to be subjected by thirty thousand."

These English scribes need not be too elated at the present position of their country. The whirligig of Time brings in its own revenges and compensations. The Indians are not the only people who have borne the yoke of strangers. The people of England themselves have not been wholly without the same experience. There is no occasion to boast, still less to insult the unfortunate.

As for the question of the relative size of crania, it is a case of much ado about nothing. The inquiry can lead to no just conclusions. The size is nothing to the purpose. The intellectual capacity of animals is not proportioned to the cranial capacity. Or else, monkeys would invariably be superior to apes, and elephants necessarily distance all monkeys and even men. Much stress is commonly laid on the massiveness of Baron Cuvier's head. But surely the great anatomist and naturalist did not reach the acme of human intelligence. Greater men might be found who carried no monster head on their shoulders. Many dunder-heads (using the word in the primary sense) are prodigious for bulk, while small heads have contained a world of power. The size indeed is no criterion. It is the character of the contents that determines the superiority. It is the quality rather than the quantity of the brain that is most important. It is the delicacy of the brain fibre which makes it potential. An ounce of Aristotle is worth more than a pound of a prize ox's brain.

THE British occupation of Manipur is complete. The postal and telegraphic lines have been restored. The murdered British officers have been given a grand military burial. General Collett read the service, the roads were lined with troops, the mountain battery firing minute guns. The dragons in front of the palace, the main gate towers of the fort have all been blown up or levelled down. The country has been disarmed, at least a general disarmament has been proclaimed. Any subject of the Regent found in possession of arms after a week will either be put to death or sent to transportation. The leading priests have expressed their regret at the massacre. Subadar Miranjan Singh, described as a Hindustani and an important personage, is under arrest as also Mya Minzarrow, said to be the actual murderer of Mr. Quinton—that is supposed to be the executioner who under orders decapitated the Chief Commissioner. A title of the Maharaja, the present of the British Viceroy, has been captured. The son of the ex-Maharaja Suria Chundia, who was in hiding near Manipur, has given himself up. The Kukis have been heavily fined for three of them cutting down the bridges on the Kohima-Manipur road. Still the full triumph is not yet. The Regent and the Senapati still elude pursuit. But if the Regent and the Senapati are still at large, twenty-six of the royal elephants have made their submission, being brought up by their own mahouts.

There being nothing to fight, and cholera having broken out and the rains approaching, our troops have turned their back on Manipur, the garrison there being reduced to 50 British officers, 1,800 Native troops, and about 400 followers, for whom six months' supplies are to be collected.

PARADOXICAL as it may sound, involving indeed a bull, it is nevertheless true that of all the ills that flesh is heir to the worst are those that afflict the spirit. The diseases of the mind are a great deal more serious than those of the body. Under objective lesions and trials the soul can more or less support the patient. But when the mind itself suffers—when the consciousness that constitutes the ego—is prostrate, farewell all hope. The worst of it is that science renders no help. Mental disease is the despair of Medicine and the doctors. Look into Shakespeare, that pocket vide-macum of human experience. Everybody remembers the celebrated scene towards the fitting close of the sublime drama of guilty ambition, where the scarcely less mad usurper Macbeth accosts the Physician called in to treat his still more villainous and tougher consort gone raving under the incessant torture of a heart laden with the most diabolical crime.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased;
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow;
Raise out the written troubles of the brain;
And, with some sweet oblivious antidote,
Cleanse the stuffed bosom of that perilous stuff,
Which weighs upon the heart?

To which the poor man of pills and lotions:—

Therein the patient

Must minister to himself.

At which the disappointed husband blows up:—

Throw physic to the dogs,—I'll none of it!

And there the matter still rests. The progress of near three centuries has not substantially advanced this difficult branch of medicine. The therapeutics of mental disease are as crude as ever.

At last light breaks in from the least expected quarter. The new number of the National Magazine (for March) announces a notable discovery. It is quite in keeping with our era of wonders in science and art. Like so many advertised in the papers and in handbills and by sandwichmen and musical carriages, it promises a thorough cure. And the recipe is simple—as simple as Squash himself. There need be no fear about taking the medicine. It is no dangerous berry or unknown mineral. It is only a matter of pence—rupees—gold mohurs. You have only to pay—the more the merrier. Eschew medicine, and all doctors. For the new treatment of the disease of the mind is not medical at all, though therapeutic still in a sense. The recipe is, not to take but to give—in heroic quantities.

Anrum Metallicum—

Lawyers are not the humblest of God's creatures. And now the last ballast-stone has been removed from their back. They were wont to regard themselves the superiors of the medical faculty. Now they have become doctors into the bargain—doctors in the most difficult speciality of the art of healing. They are told on the authority of the Hon'ble the Vice-Chancellor of our University, "If the medical man ministers to a body diseased, yours (the lawyer's) is the noble profession of ministering to a mind diseased."

It is a fine prospect for the world, with barristers and vakeels and mooktears for mad doctors!

THE Statesman notices the death in England, on the 13th April, of Mr. J. C. Murray, a retired Bengal merchant, at the age of 68. The deceased came out to this country in 1843 as an assistant in the then great firm of Colvin, Cowie & Co., bankers and agents. After 8 or 10 years he left service to do business on his own account. Not succeeding to his expectation, he, in 1860, gave it up to join the wellknown firm of Kettlewell, Bullen & Co., and, by his abilities, character and judgment, succeeded in becoming the senior resident partner. His position and talent were recognised by his election four times as President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. During his final presidency, he published a pamphlet on exchange advocating a gold currency for India.

It is not for a native journalist who never knew Mr. Murray to attempt more than to record the news of a wellknown retired Calcutta merchant and the particulars of his career as given in an Anglo-Indian newspaper, doubtless by a friendly pen. But if we may trust our recollections, we fear there is an important omission in the above narrative. The Statesman says, "He (Mr. Murray) served that firm (Colvin, Cowie & Co.) for eight or ten years, and then launched out in business for himself. But this venture was not so successful as he expected, and in 1860 he abandoned it to join the firm of Messrs Kettlewell, Bullen & Co." We know nothing about his independent business, but before he joined the house of Kettlewell, Bullen & Co., Mr. Murray was for several years Printer of the great Indian weekly journal, the Friend of India of Serampore, which was purchased by the late Mr. Robert Knight and is now incorporated with the Statesman. He never failed to conceal his humble connection with the press, but in his conversations with the natives of the country often referred to his Serampore days. And well might he be proud of his connection with a historic establishment like the Friend and a historic and deeply interesting scene like Serampore. And we of the Indian Press may well be proud of having had among our printers such a man. From what we have heard we are ready to endorse every word of the eulogy passed on him by the writer in the Statesman. He was an active shrewd little man but withal lovable, kind to fellowmen, and most generous towards the people of the land.

THE Bangalore correspondent of the Statesman who writes under date the 4th instant, is full of news—to the world at large. "Modern Bangalore is, as far as climate goes, an exceptionally pleasant place of residence." There was only one drawback to this paradise. It was intellectually still a dark hole. But, thanks to the Northern Bengal Railway, that reproach has been fully removed. The teacher has come, and at the advent Barotia has been turned to Athens. He is said to hail from the metropolis where his light had been hid under a bushel.

"A well known public speaker from the city of palaces, Babu Deben-dromath Mookerjee, has been amongst us, and on Saturday last he delivered a most instructive and interesting lecture at the special request of our popular district magistrate, Mr. F. H. Skrine."

Doubtless such a son would not shine without pathetic appeal from the head of the district. It does not matter that we never heard of this great man here. The prophet is proverbially without honor in his own neighbourhood. The letter continues:

"The subject was 'Our National Literature: its rise and development.' It was a really eloquent one, and gave a short history of Bengalee literature, full of facts and practical suggestions."

As reported by the writer, the facts of the lecture are the veriest commonplaces on the subject, and the practical suggestions, if at all practical, mischievous. In so far as the lecturer's statements are not hackneyed, they will not bear close scrutiny. He of course talks loosely of 1757 as the date of commencement of British rule. Less pardonable still is his assigning 1830 as the date of the Brahmo Samaj movement. In 1830 Ram Mohan Roy went to England, where he died! Here is a curious statement! "Besides Akhoy Kumar Dutt Bengali literature has been revised by Pandit Iswar Chandra Vidyasagar, rightly called the Addison of Bengal." By "introducing" here introducing, we suppose, is meant. Yes, revised these writers have the Bengali language, to be sure. We do not know that Pandit Vidyasagar is called the Addison, but it is not unlikely. Our people have a weakness for dividing among themselves all the great names within their knowledge. To our mind, "Johnson of Bengal" would be more to the purpose. But there is, from a long time, a run on Addison, we know. The famous Secretary of the original Dharma Sabha and editor of the Sanchar Chandrika, Bhabani Charan Banerjee, claimed to write as Addison. Preposterous idea! According to the lecturer, Bengali literature sprung from the religious upheaval of Chaitanyaism, and in the course of its history it was influenced by another religious agitation—Brahmoism. This, however, is a truism at this day. And it is provoking to see a public teacher ignorant of truths as important but perhaps less known and which, on that account, ought to be pressed upon the attention of the public. Thus this lecturer is innocent as well of the influence of Europe on his vernacular as of the influence of Christianity and the missionary movement on its literature. This teacher fittingly concludes with proposing, with any amount of sounding fervor, a society for administering moral castor oil to poor Bengali Literature to purge it of the filthy humours in its bowels!

THE MANIPUR FIASCO.

ONE peculiarity in this wretched Manipur drama has been the reversal of the established functions of the sexes in affairs. The faces of us men have been blackened. But women have not only escaped but have acquired fresh laurels. Woman is the heroine of the story, only there is scarcely a hero. It is the surrounding gloom that brings into prominence the moderately luminous glory of Grant. The sons of Adam have all done infamously—on both sides. Experienced diplomats behaved like children—experienced soldiers lost their heads before savages—veteran administrators behaved like madmen—but the sole lady in the affair showed the national stuff. She came triumphant out of the disaster which engulfed and sent to their doom her husband and his official superior and comrades, and she maintains her superiority still. She is as ready and adroit in council as she was prompt in action and strong in danger. This unfortunate episode in contemporary history is still enveloped in mystery. And it is after all a woman who comes forward to unravel it. Whatever may be the measure of her success, we all must be thankful for the light afforded, and, above all, the example. While the surviving men are silent, this lady has broken the ice.

The Englishman has distinguished itself throughout this Manipur matter, by any enterprize which places it far and away above every other journal in Bengal. At the close of the drama, it has crowned its efforts by publishing a remarkable story of the origin of the outrage. We give the cream of it as follows:—

"On Sunday, the 15th of March, Mr. Gordon arrived at the Residency at Manipur, having been sent forward by the Chief Commissioner, presumably to make enquiries and gather information. On Monday, the 16th, he closely questioned Mr. Grimwood with regard to Manipur affairs. Mr. Grimwood was well posted on the subject, and gave all the information sought for, but from first to last he was studiously kept in ignorance of what was the object of the Chief Commissioner's coming, and for what purpose he was being questioned. So marked was this that (as a blind, we must now think) to the astonishment of Mr. Grimwood and of the Manipur Durbar, 500 coolies were requisitioned for the Chief Commissioner on the Tamu Road, and further the telegrams which passed between Mr. Gordon and the Chief Commissioner were communicated in the Italian language."

On Tuesday, the 17th, Mr. Gordon left to rejoin the Chief Commissioner, and on Friday, the 20th, Mr. Grimwood went out to meet him at Sengmai, returning on Saturday, the 21st, at 7-30 P.M. In the interval between Mr. Gordon's departure from the Residency and Friday, Mr. Grimwood and Lieutenant Simpson, of the 43rd Gurkhas, who happened to be a guest at the Residency, went out on a shooting expedition which had been organised for them by the Jubraj.

When Mr. Grimwood met the Chief Commissioner at Sengmai, he was for the first time, and in strict confidence, told that it had been determined to arrest the Jubraj in open Durbar, and deport him from the country, and he was informed, to his dismay, that his was the hand required to execute that office.

On Sunday, the 22nd, the Chief Commissioner arrived at Manipur at 9 A.M. with his escort, having been met some distance on the road outside the town by the Jubraj, the individual whom he had come to arrest; and a Durbar was ordered at noon, to be held in the Durbar Hall at the Residency.

The military officers were not taken into the Chief Commissioner's confidence. Mrs. Grimwood had been told by her husband on his return from Sengmai of the intended coup, but she had maintained, at his request, the strictest reserve on the subject. Mrs. Greenwood, however, as the time approached, took advantage of an opportunity to beg of the Chief Commissioner not to force upon her husband the distressing task of arresting the Jubraj, since he had always been on very friendly terms with her husband and her herself, and earnestly besought him to impose that disagreeable duty upon someone else. The Chief Commissioner firmly declined to alter his plans, alleging that it lay in the province of Mr. Greenwood's duty to make the arrest. And in reply to Mrs. Greenwood he informed her that the reason of the arrest was that the Government of India could not allow anyone except themselves to make and unmake Maharajas, and since the Jubraj was such a power in the country, he must, for reasons of State, be sent out of Manipur.

At the hour appointed, the Maharaja (often referred to as the 'Regent'), the Jubraj, and the Senapati arrived at the Residency. But they were not admitted into the Durbar Hall, because the translation of a certain document from the Government required for the occasion, had not been completed. This delay gave the Jubraj the opportunity of noting the unusual disposition of the troops under four British officers on the steps of the Residency, and surrounding the house on every side. As a matter of fact, though this could not have then been known to the Jubraj, troops were posted as guard in every room leading out of the Durbar Hall, and at every point of egress from it, four sepoy being located in Mrs. Greenwood's bed-room.

After the translation was ready, that is to say at about 1-30 P.M., the Maharaja entered the Durbar Hall, but the Jubraj and the Senapati could not be found. The Maharaja waited 2½ hours. During this period Mr. and Mrs. Greenwood remained with him, doing the honours of the house. The Chief Commissioner steadily refused to see the Maharaja in the absence of the Jubraj, while the Jubraj, on his part, persisted in excusing himself on the plea of ill-health. Eventually the Durbar was postponed until the next day, Monday the 23rd, at 8 A.M. When that hour arrived, word was brought that the Jubraj could not attend, as he continued unwell, and the Durbar was postponed until 12-30 P.M. on the same day. At that hour the Jubraj again refused to come still alleging the same excuse.

At 4 P.M., the Chief Commissioner, apparently recognising the futility of attempts being made to secure the attendance of the Jubraj before himself, sent Mr. Greenwood to inform him (the Jubraj) of the decision of Government, and to peremptorily require him to leave the country, giving him a stated time for his preparations, and to make his adieu to his family. Mr. Greenwood went on this mission to the Jubraj's palace with Lieutenant Simpson, who had volunteered to accompany him. For three hours Mr. Greenwood remained with the Jubraj striving, but without success, to persuade him to leave the country, holding out the hope, in accordance with his instructions, that he, the Jubraj, would be allowed to return after three or four years if his conduct during that period was considered satisfactory to the Government. But the Jubraj stolidly refused to leave his country, protesting that he had not done anything to deserve banishment.

At daybreak the next day, Tuesday, the 24th, a party of sepoy and two British officers, of whom Lieutenant Simpson was one, stormed the Jubraj's palace, but did not succeed in capturing his person. At about noon the Manipuris began to retaliate, and commenced their attack on the Residency. At 3-30 P.M. the party holding the Jubraj's palace was withdrawn, and concentrated at the Residency. At 4-30 P.M. the guns began to play upon the Residency, firing from behind a high wall, through loopholes made in it, from a position which could not be stormed, and which was perfectly secure as against rifle fire. At 7-30 o'clock there was a truce. Mr. Greenwood now suggested abandoning the Residency and retiring to certain heights about 1½ miles back, arguing in it the fact of the telegraph line having been cut would have given warning to their friends of a disaster; that they could easily hold the heights in the open, and out of reach of the guns in their present position, until succour arrived; and that in the event of the guns being brought out, they could be easily rushed and captured. Colonel Skene at first fell in with this plan, but later advised a retirement out of the country without delay. The Chief Commissioner thought otherwise. He considered that the best course would be to try and obtain terms, and this opinion prevailing, Mr. Greenwood, who again, at his own request, was accompanied by his friend Lieutenant Simpson, was sent out to parley. The Jubraj declined to negotiate with anyone other than the Chief Commissioner in person, and the Chief Commissioner at about 8-30 P.M. went forth to sue for terms at the hands of his victorious foe, and he went forth to his doom.

From internal evidence we have no hesitation in ascribing that narrative to Mrs. Greenwood, the widow of the late Political Agent. It is fully worthy of such a heroic wife's loyalty to a dead husband. It is not the whole truth, but so far as it goes it makes the Manipur business out a worse blot on the fair fame of the British. It relieves Mr. Greenwood's memory from the suspicion of treachery against the court towards which he professed personal friendship, but it makes Mr. Quinton a base imbecile, unless the onus can be shifted on to the Government of India.

THE PRESERVE OF LAW REPORTING.

WE observe with satisfaction the appointment of Mr. A. F. M. Abdur Rahman, Barrister-at-law, as a Reporter for the Indian Law Reports. We cannot, like some of our native contemporaries, commit the absurdity, of congratulating a senior barrister in decent practice on the prodigious windfall of Rs. 300 a month for only three months. Indeed, we shall not be surprised if Mr. Rahman's acceptance became the subject of unfavorable comment in the bar. Such remarks, however, are vain, and usually wide off the mark. Each to his business. In the present case, it may well be presumed that Mr. Rahman would scarcely have cared to accept for a few days a trumpet office involving a sacrifice of practice, except as a stepping-stone to something more substantial and permanent. Be that as it may, there are public considerations why we cannot pass over even this small acting appointment. The distribution of patronage in the High Court has hitherto been very unjust to the Indian nationality of the bar. Thus, the Reporting has hitherto been maintained as a close European preserve. Any slight departure from the unhallowed rule is, therefore, a thing to note. We have reason to be thankful for the smallest mercies.

Some years ago, the claims of the native section of the Bar were recognised by the Government of India by the appointment of Mr. (now Mr. Justice) Ameer Ali to this post. On the resignation of Mr. Ameer Ali, on his appointment to the Presidency Magistracy, however, a European was appointed to succeed him. For years together, no native was appointed on the staff of the Indian Law Reports. The exclusion became so barefaced and so scandalous that the natives at last complained in right earnest. The question was agitated in the press, and if the Council of Law Reporting still remained deaf, the Government of India was moved with more success. For the second time a native Barrister was accepted in the person of Mr. K. M. Chatterjee. Mr. Chatterjee continued to act until he was promoted to the Judgeship of the Presidency Court of Small Causes, now about three years. Since then, a number of junior English Barristers have filled the office left vacant by Mr. Chatterjee. The native community therefore is thankful to the Government of India and the Chief Justice for this concession for the third time. Whether the credit of this appointment rests with the Viceroy, Sir Alexander Miller, our new Law Member, or Sir Comer Petheram, certainly it is once more a recognition of the claims of the Indian section of the Bar by reason of their number and standing. We think it time that an Indian gentleman be permanently attached to the staff of the Indian Law Reports.

REPRODUCTION OF ANCIENT INDIAN FRESCOS.

ABOUT a quarter of a century ago, a new interest was created in the art and antiquities of India and a earnest desire manifested for the preservation of Indian monuments. A regular archaeological survey was instituted throughout the empire. The Western Presidency specially distinguished itself in the work. Not the least important part of it was the taking of accurate views of the wonders of Mahomedan and Jain architecture scattered about from Guzerat down to Mysore, and their publication in sumptuous volumes with descriptive letter-press and introductions. These illustrations of the magnificent temples of Jain worship and of the great public buildings and palaces of Bejapur and other old capitals, explained by such masters as Feugussou, were among the most valuable contributions to art and archaeology. We owe their publication to the enlightened liberality of the merchant prince of Bombay, half a dozen of whom undertook the expenses, each paying for a volume. Neither the Government nor the wealthy class of any other Province has shown anything like the same esthetic or historical zeal, or the same readiness to spend in such a cause. What was done thus for architecture remained still to be accomplished for painting. The famous frescoes of the caves of Ajanta, which have been the wonder of travellers, which were even important out of proportion to their intrinsic excellence as about the only relics in their department of ancient art, were fast crumbling to pieces. Happily, we live under enlightened rulers who will not willingly let any really important landmarks in the history of the land perish for want of care. Appeals to them in such a cause rarely go unheeded, specially when made by those who are entitled to speak. In response to a representation to Government in behalf of the delineations on the walls of Ajanta, an expedition and an establishment were sanctioned for obtaining copies of them. This mission commenced in 1872 under the supervision of Mr. John Griffiths, and was continued, with an intermission of three years, till its close, with the attainment of its object, in 1885. These ten years were not easily spent. They were consumed in patient toil inspired by an enthusiasm of art and knowledge. Frescoe painting is, for its physical and mechanical difficulties, the most troublesome branch of the pictorial art. It is only less forbidding than its sister, cave architecture. The reproduction on canvas or other material of the paintings in fresco cannot certainly compare in arduousness with the task of the original artists. Yet it is a tedious and oppressive process. The main conditions indeed of the work are common to both the old masters and their present copyists. Ten years are a long time, but the task could scarcely be thoroughly accomplished in less. The expedition has given a most satisfactory account of how it employed its time. Mr. Griffiths shipped to the India Office immense cases of paintings made by his artists. In the correspondence on the subject now going on between the Home Government and the Government of India, there is appended to the Secretary of State's letter lists of these paintings with their measurements and identificatory references, which are highly creditable to the industry of the party sent on the mission.

These together constitute a good tentative catalogue raisonné of the art treasures in Ajanta. One is a list of fac simile copies in oil colour made during the year 1884-85. A second list contains the water-colour drawings to reduced scale made the same year. A list of plans and elevations shewing the position of the paintings copied follow. Then there is a complete list of fac simile copies of paintings from the Ajanta Caves executed between 1872 and 1885. This of course includes the water colour copies of the last mentioned list. Here we must observe that there has been some blundering error in the Secretary of State's office or in India subsequently in copying these lists. For we see that the measurements between the two lists do not agree. The disagreement goes on a method that suggests a derangement. In fact the figures given for height in one are given, in the other list for length and vice versa. We see many caves ignored in these lists. There must be some explanation for it. Perhaps there were no frescoes in them or they are in a condition too far gone. But the treasures of twelve Caves have been explored and copies of the frescoes made or suitable drawings taken, the result being a collection of several hundred pictures.

There can be no doubt of the importance of the work done. Had a tithe of it been done in regard to any other country, the land would have rung with shouts of enthusiasm. But India is no body's concern. It is certainly not the people's. The nation is too ignorant to know their history or care for it. The men who are wont to speak in the name of the nation are knowing by half. Outbiting the British, they are practical with a vengeance. They cultivate politics pure and simple, to the exclusion of anything else. Their single care is criticism of Government and its myriads of every kind. In their zeal they are apt to forget the great things that are being done for them and their country by Government or under its auspices. As regards criticism of Government itself, they are not very well informed, or else they would certainly perceive the money expended on the Ajanta Cave Expedition during a decade if not more, and demand something in return. They did not notice the shipments of cases of pictures made by Mr. Griffiths before their eyes.

After five years there is a prospect of the world at large being the wiser for the money expended on Mr. Griffiths' mission. We believe we owe this to the Government of Bombay's initiative. The Secretary of State is prepared for the reproduction of these copies of the paintings in the caves in chromo-lithography with suitable letter-press, provided 150 copies at £10 per copy are subscribed for in India by the people. Already on the West, 65 copies have been subscribed for through the Bombay Government. The remaining 85 copies have to be divided between the rest of the Empire. We have no doubt that the aggregate number subscribed for from India will exceed the number of copies reserved for this country. We only wish there may be no delay in filling in the required number. Meanwhile, we hope, the chromo-lithographic press is vigorously at work.

Mr. Griffiths has a reputation, and the paintings are believed to have been admirably reproduced. The frescoes have been highly spoken of not only by dilettante tourists but also by connoisseurs like Fergusson. The book, therefore, will be a valuable contribution to art as well as to the history of art. In the field of Indian archæology it will be an unique possession. In Sanskrit literature, such as the drama, we frequently read of painting, but no specimens of old Indian art in this branch have come down to us, except such as are to be seen on the walls of the Ajanta Caves.

VIVISECTION AT THE ZOO.

TO THE EDITOR OF "REIS AND RAYYET."

DEAR SIR,—May some Englishwomen to whom India is very dear, entreat your influence against the spread of Vivisection in your noble land? We deeply grieve at finding this openly practised at the Alipur Zoological Gardens, and we are alarmed at the coming event in the same direction in the opening of the Framjee Dinshaw Petit Laboratory for research, at Bombay. We are ashamed to know it was by Englishmen, that this cruel practice was introduced last year into the Deccan, whilst thankfully remembering your journal's righteous condemnation of those experiments on the poor helpless animals.

At the Alipur Gardens you have it in your midst. As native gentlemen, can you bear this unmoved? To you it is comparatively a new crime, that of causing unspeakable torture to helpless creatures, hitherto protected, even cherished by you.

This is no appeal to Englishmen. We know that many feel with us, and the braver men help us, but we also know that Vivisection is practised in our Training Colleges and Hospitals,—as a nation we are vitally guilty here. We turn to you, native gentlemen, and implore all who love, all who are proud of their country, to unite against this new fearful evil. Take everything that is valuable in our Western discoveries but judge of each one for yourselves, and refuse a deadly sin, one which not only inflicts appalling torture to its victims but does still more harm to human beings, whose best but miserable plea is the prospect of possibly somewhat prolonging their own life. A low ground surely for any wrong! The end of it all must be the hardening of the heart, the extinction of all noble feelings, a moral death.

We call on every educated man in and around Calcutta to use all legal means to stop the Alipur scandal. If laws against cruelty be not sufficiently stringent, do not rest until they are fully amended. You have the power and the responsibility of stamping out this disgrace.

And we appeal to every native Prince and Ruler. Each can say, No, I will have no such strange vice in my Territory. You will all thus have the moral courage by precept and practice to set us, Westerns, a much needed example. Many here, aroused by you will respond at once, and many more will learn from you what they ought never to have forgotten, we may not do evil that good may come. I remain, yours respectfully,

AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

London, April 9.

REPORT ON THE DRAINAGE OF CALCUTTA.

By Baldout Latham, Mem., Inst., C.E., Mem., Inst. M.E., F.G.S.,

I.S.S., F.S.I., President of the Royal Meteorological Society.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE CORPORATION.

I have the honour to report to you that I have very fully considered the question of the present and future requirements necessary for the sewerage of Calcutta, and have been fully informed as to the projects now before you for extending the present works of sewerage into the newly acquired area of Calcutta, and the proposal for an extended outfall into the Bidadihur River. I have also considered the various matters that have been brought to your attention, in respect to the completion of the works of sewerage within the city; such as the provision of more adequate flushing arrangements for the sewers, the ventilation of the sewers, the means of getting ready access to the sewers, the supply of gully-pits, and the kirbing and channeling of the roads.

2. In the course of my investigations I have received the fullest information and assistance from Mr. James Kimber, Mem., Inst. C.E., who has at my request ordered all the necessary experiments and examinations to be made, so that the fullest information should be laid before you.

3. I find that the works of sewerage are kept in as good a state as could possibly be expected, having regard to the disability under which these works are placed, owing to defects in their original design for which your present officers are in no way responsible. The pumping station at the outfall is a model of order and cleanliness, and the machinery is kept in a very efficient state, and reflects the greatest credit on those in whose charge it is placed. The coal consumption at this pumping station shows that the machinery is not economical in working, and it will pay to substitute more economical machinery in its place.

4. During my stay in Calcutta, while going over the district, I have been particularly struck in observing the number of men, I have seen from time to time, engaged in removing deposit from the sewers; and the quantity and decomposed state of this deposit convinced me there was something radically wrong with sewers that should allow so much solid matter to be retained in them. Now, a sewer of deposit is always one in which there has not been sufficient velocity of flow of the sewage to maintain the sewer free from obstruction. From your Engineer's annual report I also gleaned the fact that more deposit was removed from the sewers last year than the year previously; this of itself might only imply greater vigilance and more work done, but to whatever cause it may be ascribed, it establishes the fact that the sewers of Calcutta at the present time are not self-cleansing, but require the disgusting operation of sending men into them to collect and remove, as far as they can, the solids that should be removed by the flow of the sewage, or by ordinary flushing arrangements, or should never have been permitted to enter the sewers. An examination of the materials removed shows that there are substances in the sewers, such as broken bricks, that it ought to be impossible to pass into any sewer which has properly protected connections; the bulk of the material removed from the sewers is of such a character that the flow of sewage would remove it in the ordinary course, if the sewers are adjusted to the work they have to perform, especially when assisted by proper flushing arrangements.

5. I am aware that a system of sewers that has been designed to deal with the sewage of a given population, can never be perfect until the whole population is connected up to the sewers, and hence the necessity for flushing arrangements. I regret to find that the flushing arrangements that were provided for the Calcutta sewers in the original design and as now worked instead of flushing and clearing the sewers, does positive injury, and in my opinion is the direct cause of much of the deposit now found in the sewers as will be hereafter explained.

6. From the documents which I have read, it appears that the Calcutta sewers were designed to carry off the sewage, rainfall and sub-soil water. The sewers now carry at times sewage, rainfall, sub-soil water, flush water and tidal water.

7. The position of Calcutta in respect to the provision for drainage is peculiar, having the tidal river Hooghly forming its western boundary, and the tidal waters of Salt Lake and its numerous channels draining to the Mutlah River on the east of the city. The general fall of Calcutta is from west to east and south-east. The Salt Lake has been selected for the outfall for the sewers of the city. Calcutta is 86 miles distant from the sea and the Hooghly, but it is 106 miles distant from the sea and Salt Lake and the Mutlah River, and it will be noted that although there is this great difference in the length of the respective outfalls, that the Hooghly is a fresh water stream, except when the upland waters greatly diminish, it then becomes slightly brackish, while the waters of Salt Lake, as its name implies, are more or less saline and are charged with sea water. Lower low water levels are experienced in the Hooghly than in Salt Lake, while the high water levels of the Salt Lake are much lower than the high water levels of the Hooghly. There is also a difference in the time of the tides in the Hooghly and Salt Lake, judging from the papers placed before me the tides in the Hooghly are two hours earlier than in Salt Lake.

8. The difference in the time of the tides in the Hooghly and Salt Lake is no advantage to the sewerage of Calcutta, and at present this difference in the time of the tides very injuriously affects the flushing arrangements of the existing sewers, which are flushed at the high water from the Hooghly, and as a natural consequence no sooner does the flush water get through the sewers than it meets the high tide of Salt Lake at the mouth of the outfall sewer, which practically produces stagnation in the sewers intended to be flushed. I find for example, calculating on the sewer in Circular Road and assuming that if the sewage could be maintained at the outfall at a level of 10 feet above datum, and adding the mean depth of the flush-water to the level of the invert of the most northern cross sewer, the fall between these points would produce such a velocity of flow in the sewers that it would require 170 minutes for the flush to pass from this particular intake to the sewage pumping station; in actual practice this does not occur, for at the time the flush-water arrives at the sewage pumping station, the level of the tide at the mouth of the sewer is often some feet above the level assumed, sometimes standing at a level as high as 14.6 feet above datum, and on the average of last July the level of the high waters observed outside the penstock at the sewage pumping station was 13.03 feet above datum, while the mean level of the water at the same point in that month was 10.5 feet above datum. If the sewage and flush-water traversed the sewers mentioned with sufficient velocity of flow to remove deposit, or at the rate of 3 feet per second, as the length of the sewers from the Hooghly to the outfall at the sewage pumping station is 22,413 feet, the time the flush-water would require to pass through the sewer would be 124.5 minutes, or about the difference of the time of the tides in the Hooghly and Salt Lake.

9. Calcutta has been sewerage on what is termed the combined system, or the rainfall and sewage are both admitted to the sewers, the present outfall is subject to tidal influence, so that at the present time you have to contend with two uncertain elements--the tides and the rainfall. You may have your outfall blocked by the tide at the time of an exceptionally heavy rainfall, and this, I have been informed, not unfrequently happens in Calcutta. It was a fatal error in a district like Calcutta to combine rainfall with the sewage, and not provide the means of dealing with this mixed rainfall and sewage when the sewers were tide-locked.

10. The present pumping machinery at the sewage pumping station is barely sufficient to deal with the present dry weather flow of the sewage; it is totally unequal to deal either with rain or the present flush-water, and so when either of these waters are present in the sewers, pumping is suspended, and the penstock in the outfall is opened, and the city sewage is then controlled by the height of the tide in Salt Lake and by the volume of sewage and water in the sewers and outfall channels. I find that last July the penstock at the sewage pumping station was raised on 25 out of 31 days in that month for an average time each day of 5 hours 22 minutes. Mr. Kimber pointed out to me that this was not unusual for in the quarter ending September last year, his report shows that the penstock at the sewage pumping station was raised on 74 out of 92 days for an average time each day of 5 hours 7 minutes. In July of last year, as already pointed out at some period of the day, on the average of the whole of that month, the waters outside the penstock stood at over 13 feet above datum. Now, this level is above the level of the inverts of many of the existing city sewers, so that the sewers instead of always having a free outfall are very frequently water-logged. What happens in a time of a flush of water may be taken from the evidence of Mr. G. Wintgens, when describing the difficulty he had to contend with in entering these water-logged sewers after flushing, in spite of every endeavour having been previously made to pump the sewers out. He says--"I made the first attempt at 3 o'clock in the morning of the 2nd April having first arranged that the pumps at the drainage pumping station should be kept going all night to reduce the water in the sewer to the lowest possible level. Notwithstanding this precaution I found 8 feet of water in the Circular Road sewer and 7 feet in the Dhurrumtollah Street sewer; this I found in the course of the day to have been due to late flushing from the river on the previous day. On the next day, 3rd April, I again tried to get into the sewer after having stopped evening flushing until further orders, and found 6 feet of water in the sewer, although the pumps at Palmer's Bridge were kept going as on the previous night." The only remark I would make on Mr. Wintgens' observations is that it is quite obvious that, when the water stood 8 feet deep in the Circular Road sewer, every other sewer in Calcutta must have been water-logged. The first place I saw sewer cleaning going on in Calcutta was at Ambest Street at a point crossed by the new Central Road. On making inquiry I found the level of the invert of this sewer at the bottom of the street at Machoua Bazar Street was 10.4 feet above datum, the sewer is 3 feet by 2 feet in size, having an inclination on its invert of 1 in 5. Now, it is obvious that when the sewers at the outfall are put in communication with the tidal overflow at high water, there would be a reverse current up this sewer, and if we assume the average level at the outfall to be 10 feet above datum, or under the average level of last July, as the outfall is 8,980 feet distant from the point in question, the working fall from the invert level would be but 1.22,450, under such circumstances no wonder silt accumulates in this sewer, for it is a peculiarity to be noted that, when once a deposit occurs in a sewer, it is a very difficult operation to remove it. In Halliday Street sewer which discharges into Colabattollah Street sewer, the level of the invert of the latter sewer at the point of junction is 9.43 feet above datum, and of course at times it must be subject to reverse currents, and rarely could discharge at the rate of flow due to the gradient at which it has been constructed. At the flushing station in Halliday Street, the level of the invert is 12.10 feet above datum, the sewer is 3' 6" by 2' 3" in size, and the gradient at which it has been constructed is 1 in 600. A flush of water filled the sewer to a depth of 8 inches at the level of the top of this flush-water, the surface of the liquid in the sewer would be below the level of high water in Salt Lake, and on an average when the level at the outfall is at 10 feet above datum, the fall for this flush-water would only be 1 in 4,840. Numerous other examples might be selected in the city. The difficulty in this case would be to find sewers that are not under the pernicious influence of this frequent water-logging.

11. An error was committed in the design of the sewers of Calcutta by making all the inverts of sewers of varying characters at the point of juncture level or nearly level, so that when the sewage ceases to run parallel with the invert of the sewer, the velocity and discharge of the sewers is greatly retarded.

12. It should be thoroughly understood that gravity is the only cause of motion of the flow of sewage in sewers, and depends solely on the surface fall of the liquid. If the sewers are at any time submerged, the inclination given to the invert of the sewer exercises no control on the flow in the sewer. It may be observed that all sewers of varying character that are required to give the full discharge due to the inclination of these inverts, when running full, must coincide on the crowns of the sewers and not on the invert. If this course is adopted, the sewage will have an increase of velocity as the flow declines in the sewer which is an enormous advantage, especially in the case of large sewers conveying at times a proportionately small volume of sewage. By reference to the past reports on the sewage of Calcutta, I find that the eminent Engineers, Messrs. Rendel, drew the attention of the Calcutta authorities at the time the sewers were about to be constructed to the error in the design of the proposed sewers, but evidently not with sufficient emphasis to prevent the mistake being made. The sewers of Calcutta are submerged whenever there is heavy rain, or they are flushed from the river Hooghly, and hence a flush of water serves but little useful purpose, but is positively injurious to many of the sewers.

13. The sewers of Calcutta require to be efficiently flushed in dry weather, for otherwise the ordinary flow of sewage through them would be incapable of keeping them clear. As for example, the sewer in the Circular Road is an oval of the old sectional form, and is 9'4½" high and 7'3" wide; its inclination at the lower end is 1 in 2,640. If this sewer could discharge under the inclination given to its invert, it would carry 13,764 cubic feet per minute when running full, and the average dry weather flow of 1,100 cubic feet per minute would produce a velocity of flow of 153 feet per minute. With the dry weather volume in the sewer, the sewage would be 1875 feet deep, and to secure the above velocity, the sewage at the pumping station must not rise above 55 feet above datum which unfortunately is rarely the case.

14. The area of Calcutta originally intended to be drained by the original sewers, is stated to have been 202,656,150 square feet or 4,606 acres, and a ¼" of rain per hour from this area was said to produce 6,672 cubic feet per minute. The original outfall sewer, as it at present exists, will only discharge when running full 20,405 cubic feet per minute. The surplus had to be got rid of by storm overflows, some of which required to be specially opened in time of rain, but as these overflows communicated with the river Hooghly, it might happen that high tide and heavy rain coincided, then the amount of rain that could be got rid of by the overflows was very small, and at times nothing at all. The consequence is that, as I have been informed, much inconvenience is still occasioned in the lower parts of the city by the accumulation of rainfall, notwithstanding an 11 feet rainfall intercepting sewer* has been constructed to take the overflow from the Circular Road sewers. In fact it would be strange if flooding did not take place for the level of the crown of the outfall sewer at the sewage pumping station is at a higher level than the surface of some parts of the city located at a considerable distance from the outfall works, and the drainage of which has to be effected through this outfall sewer, so that the effect is that, when the outfall sewers are full, the lower parts of the city become the reservoir for storing the rain and mixed sewage that cannot escape until the sewers have been relieved by the comparatively slow flow from them owing to their water-logged condition in time of heavy rain.

15. The city area of Calcutta, as taken from the Census return of 1881, is shown to be 3,754 acres; the additional area recently added to the city is 8,201½ acres. The area of the Fort not included within the city, but which may require provision for drainage, is 1,283 acres; or the grand total of these areas is 13,241 acres. A quarter of an inch of rain per hour, the quantity, it was stated the original sewers should carry away in addition to the sewage, is equal to 15,112 cubic feet per minute from each acre; at this rate the following figures will show the provision required to be made for rainfall alone if the sewers of the extended area are to be constructed to carry the same amount of rain as was contemplated in the original scheme of Calcutta sewerage:—

	Cubic feet per minute.
City area of Calcutta 3,754 acres	56,760
Area between Circular Road and Canal 539½ acres	8,150
Southern and south-eastern amalgamated area 7,665 acres	115,895
Total from present city area	180,805
Fort William 1,283 acres	19,399
Grand total for all Calcutta	200,204

* This intercepting sewer can give no relief to the sewers in reducing the head of the flood in the district, and is water-logged at every high tide.

In addition to these quantities provision would require to be made for the sewage. I need hardly say that I could not recommend any scheme for further combining rainfall and sewage in Calcutta which would require works to deal with such large quantities that would lead to enormous expense, and still would be very unsatisfactory as the element of rain cannot be gauged by any such rule of thumb method as merely saying, we will provide for so much and make no provision for any greater quantity.

16. I have considered the question of rainfall and have made numerous experiments to determine the effects of rainfall on the flow on sewers, and I have found that the increase of the flow in sewers due to rain depends more on the intensity of the fall than upon the actual quantity falling as recorded in a day or an hour. When rain falls the rate of fall is frequently in excess of a quarter of an inch per hour. If in one minute 0.15 inch fall, which is not an uncommon quantity, it is equivalent to nine-tenth of an inch per hour. A quarter of an inch per hour is not equal to half of a hundredth of an inch per minute, a rate of all that is of common occurrence. Fortunately, in a large district a quarter of an inch of rain per hour flowing off means that a very much heavier fall could be accommodated in the sewers, and if the original outfall sewers of Calcutta had been able to carry away what was contemplated and at a sufficiently low level to prevent flooding, they would have been sufficient for all purposes, as it is the present outfall as I find it when full is only capable of carrying away 0.09 inch of rainfall per hour, and this it cannot accomplish until the flood water have risen over the surface of the lower parts of the city.

I find from Mr. H. F. Blanford, F. R. S., that in Calcutta on an average of 13 years there are 123 days per annum when rain falls on 62 of these days over a quarter of an inch per day, while the average annual rainfall is 65.5 inches. In heavy falls of rain as much as 4 inches per hour has been recorded, and over 6 inches per day has been repeatedly recorded, but the number of days, when these excessive quantities fall, are but few or about one day in three years. The records shew that rainfall in this district is an uncertain quantity, and if admitted to the sewers, the provision to be made for it is enormously in excess of that required for the sewage, and therefore the wisest thing to do will be to exclude it from the sewers as far as possible in the amalgamated area.

17. An exception will in my judgment have to be made in the case of rain falling on the roads and footpaths of this district, for the water flowing off these surfaces will at times be so impure that it should be classed as sewage. After a prolonged rain no doubt the water flowing off the roads is more pure, and in some cases a sort acting arrangement may be used, so that the small and impure rainfalls may flow to the sewers, while the larger falls can be diverted to the surface water streams of the district. The total area of roads and footpaths in Calcutta does not exceed 470 acres, while in the Suburbs at the present time the area is rather less than 200 acres; now a quarter of an inch per hour will be ample provision to meet the requirements of this case; the future area of the roads and footpaths in the amalgamated area I have taken at 320 acres.

18. In looking through the returns of the amount of sewage pumped at the sewage pumping station, I was struck by the enormous difference in the volume of the sewage from day to day in dry weather, and also in some special experiments that have been made at my request to determine the hourly rate of flow in the sewers; that at midnight in one day the volume of sewage increased, when, under ordinary circumstances, it should have diminished. After full consideration of the subject and knowing that the sewers of Calcutta had been constructed to carry sub-soil water, I found that not only does the volume of sewage in the sewers increase when the ground waters are high, and decline when the ground waters are low, but the volume of sewage increases with the heights of the tide when no flushing is taking place.

19. At my suggestion an attempt has been made to determine the rate of flow of the sewage and water supply of Calcutta at every hour of the day.

From the figures [thus prepared] it [is] seen that the water is supplied in 14 hours, but that it takes about 17 hours to flow off by the sewers. The figures also shew that practically one-half of all the sewage of Calcutta at the present time flows off in six hours, and that provision for this variation in the rate of flow must be made in all new sewers.

20. The fact that a sewer leaks and admits subsoil water is no detriment, but a positive advantage if the movement is always in one direction or from the outside into the sewer, but sewers like the Calcutta sewers that are likely to be gorged with mixed sewage and rainfall must let the sewage out into the subsoil, which becomes a reservoir for its reception when the flow increases in the sewers. This constant interchange of sewage, rainfall, subsoil water and tidal water between the sewers and the ground is in my judgment extremely prejudicial to the health of the inhabitants of Calcutta, and energetic means should be at once taken to remedy this evil.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—A frequent cause of gout and rheumatism is the inflammatory state of the blood, attended with bad digestion and general debility. A few doses of the Pills taken in time are an effectual preventive against gout and rheumatism. Anyone who has an attack of either should use Holloway's Ointment also, the powerful action of which, combined with the operation of the Pills, must infallibly effect a cure. These Pills act directly on the blood, which they purify and improve. Having once subdued the severity of these diseases, perseverance with the Ointment, after fomenting the affected joints with warm brine, will speedily relax all stiffness and prevent any permanent contraction.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE FLAG OF ENGLAND.

FROM MR. RUDYARD KIPLING'S NEW POEM.

"Above the portico a flag-staff, bearing the Union Jack, remained fluttering in the flames for some time, but ultimately when it fell the crowds rent the air with shouts, and seemed to see significance in the incident."—Daily Papers.

Winds of the World, give answer! They are whimpering to and fro—
And what should they know of England who only England know?—
The poor little street-bred people that vapour and fume and brag,
They are lifting their heads in the stillness to yelp at the English Flag.
Must we borrow a clout from the Boer—to plaster anew with dirt?
An Irish liar's bandage, or an English coward's shirt?
We may not speak of England; her Flag's to sell or share.
What is the Flag of England? Winds of the World, declare!

The North Wind blew:—"From Bergen my steelshod vanguards go;
I chase your lazy whalers home from the Disko floe;
By the Great North Lights above me I work the will of God;
And the liner splits on the ice-field or the Dogger fills with cod.
The lean white bear hath seen it in the long, long Arctic night,
The musk-ox knows the standard that flouts the Northern Light:
What is the Flag of England? Ye have but my bergs to dare,
Ye have but my drifts to conquer. Go forth, for it is there!"

The South Wind sighed:—"From the Virgins my mid-sea course was ta'en
Over a thousand islands lost in an idle main,
Where the sea-egg flames on the coral and the long-backed breakers crown
Their endless ocean legends to the lazy, locked lagoon.
My basking sunfish know it, and wheeling albatross,
Where the lone wave fills with fire beneath the Southern Cross.
What is the Flag of England? Ye have but my reefs to dare,
Ye have but my seas to furrow. Go forth, for it is there!"

The East wind roared:—"From the Kuriles, the Bitter Seas, I come,
And me men call the Home-Wind, for I bring the English home.
Look—look well to your shipping! By the breath of my mad typhoon
I swept your close-packed Praya and beached your best at Kowloon!
The desert-dust hath dimmed it, the flying wild-ass knows,
The scared white leopard winds it across the taintless snows.
What is the Flag of England? Ye have but my sun to dare,
Ye have but my sands to travel. Go forth, for it is there!"

The West Wind called:—"In squadrons the thoughtless galleons fly
That bear the wheat and cattle lest street-bred people die.
They make my might their porter, they make my house their path,
And I loose my neck from their service and overwhelm them all in my wrath.
But whether in calm or wrack-wreath, whether by dark or day,
I leave them whole to the conger or rip their plates away,

First of the scattered legions, under a shrieking sky,
Dipping between the rollers, the English Flag goes by.
The dead dumb fog hath wrapped it—the frozen dews have kissed—
The naked stars have seen it, a fellow-star in the mist.
What is the Flag of England? Ye have but my breath to dare, Ye have but my waves to conquer. Go forth, for it is there!"

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE good Queen-Empress has expressed to the Viceroy her deep sympathy with the relatives of the victims of the Manipur massacre. We have before noticed how deeply Her Majesty was affected when she heard abroad the melancholy news about Manipur.

THE Viceroy will hold a Levée at the Viceregal Lodge on Saturday, the 30th May, to be kept as Her Majesty's birth-day, which will be ushered by imperial salvos from all the military stations in the empire.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has gone into camp. He is now touring in Sikkim. Accompanied by Mr. C. E. Buckland, Mr. A. W. Paul, C.I.E., and an Aid-de-Camp, Sir Charles Elliott was to have left Darjeeling on the 12th and arrived at Kalimpong the same day. Passing through Pedong, Sadancha and Gnatong, he is due to-day at Jelapla. The party is expected back at Darjeeling on the 20th.

MR. W. E. Ward, the new Chief Commissioner of Assam, is expected at Calcutta tomorrow, on his way to Dhubri, where he takes charge on the 27th instant.

LAST week, on Friday, near Khetserai, on the Oadh and Rohilkund Railway, some carriages of the down mail were derailed and smashed, badly injuring several native passengers, one, it is feared, mortally.

A STUDENT of the St. John's Female Normal School, Nazareth, has been appointed in charge of the Post Office, Mandapasarai, in the Madura District.

WE are glad to see that meritorious native Civilian, Dayaram Gidumal, appointed to act as Civil and Sessions Judge of Shikarpore.

LOUIS SCHOLLIGER, a Government engineer, is being criminally tried at Ciacow, for selling to a foreign Government the plans of the fortress of Ciacow.

THE latest application of platinum is in the manufacture of mirrors. The new mirror both transmits and reflects light. Placed in the pannel of a door it will not only light up a dark room or corridor but act also as a reflector. Another advantage, or disadvantage if you will, is that a person on the platinized side of the glass, while seeing through it, is himself unseen. The Indian Mirror is neither mercurial nor platinized.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

AT an enquiry into the death of a milliner, at North Kensington, a chemist deposed that one of his customers spent for a week on laudanum to drink, and that another took as much as two ounces at a sitting.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Statesman lately wrote from Kandi, in the Moorshedabad District :-

"The public excitement is intense regarding the Consent Bill. The people look upon the Bill, passed in spite of the humble yet emphatic protest of a whole nation, as a death-blow to the authority of the sacred books of the Hindoos and Mussulmans, as an interference with religion and usage, and as a rude shock offered to our sense of the sacredness of the royal proclamation. A largely signed petition to the Secretary of State for India is contemplated."

A veracious reporter, to be sure ! Or, Kandi must be an exceptional spot.

WE commend the following subsidiary rules relating to public conveyances, just passed in practical Bombay, for the consideration of the Bengal Legislative Council now engaged on the reform of the law regarding hackney carriages and palanquins in Calcutta :-

"In every case in which a public conveyance is called for a distance exceeding half a mile to take up a fare, 2 annas shall be paid in addition to the authorized fare.

All return fares shall be one-half of the original fare as herein laid down.

The fare of a public conveyance for a whole day is Rs. 4 (ten hours to constitute a day), for half a day (five hours) Rs. 2-8.

All persons engaging a public conveyance may, before starting, arrange with the driver thereof as to whether he should be engaged by the day, half day, or by distance. If no such express agreement is come to between the parties, the driver shall be entitled to his fare according to the Distance Tariff. In the Fort only, vehicles can be engaged by the hour, fare for which shall be 8 annas per hour.

No fare for a public conveyance shall be less than 4 annas.

Any person having cause to complain against the driver of a public conveyance may take such driver to the nearest police station where a police officer will enquire into such complaint, and if possible settle it. Such persons may instead, however, take the driver before the nearest magistrate then sitting.

The following to be the scale of detention of conveyances :

Any period over a quarter and up to half an hour, 2 annas. Every succeeding half hour and fraction of a half hour an additional 2 annas."

THE Deccan Times reports the birth, in the village of Balapooram, a few miles north of Hyderabad, of a child of both sexes with four hands and legs. Yet the passion for natural wonders, and unnatural too, is represented to be the peculiar weakness of the native press.

DR. MacLaren, of Dehra Dun, is said to have treated cases of leprosy, with some success, with resorcin and ichthyol.

WHILE the position and prospects of Eurasians are being enquired into in Calcutta, the Auditor, Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, is making the best of his opportunities to give the question a practical solution. He has ruled that one-fourth of its employes must be Eurasians.

MR. W. Ross, Deputy Superintendent of the Presidency Jail Press, Bengal, having been appointed Superintendent of Government Printing, India, Mr. J. Petty, Superintendent of Assam Secretariat Press, has been appointed Deputy Superintendent of the Presidency Jail Press, Bengal, from the commencement of the present month.

DENTISTRY has made remarkable progress in Russia. According to the Konische Volkszeitung, a Moscow dentist has discovered a method by which false teeth will grow into human gums as firmly as natural ones. Dr. Zhamensky has performed several successful operations on dogs as also on men. The teeth are either of gutta-percha, porcelain or metal. At the foot of the false teeth holes are made which are repeated upwards into the jaw. The tooth being placed in the cavity, soon a soft granulated growth from the jaw makes its way into the holes in the tooth, this growth gradually hardens and holds the tooth in position.

SIRDAR Dyal Singh has done himself no good by his appeal against the decisions in the Tribune Libel case. The Chief Court upholds the conviction and, considering the scandalous nature of the writings against Mr. Warburton and the position of the proprietor of the newspaper, does not think the fine excessive.

THAT wretched man Raja Gobind Rao who is compromising the name of Holkar abroad, has not yet made up his quarrel with his wife. Ever since the couple were produced in court in connection with the attempted suicide in the Deccan, they have evidently lost their sensitiveness on that behalf. The Rani has sued her lord for maintenance before the magistracy at Allahabad. The case coming on for hearing, the Raja applied for and obtained ten days' postponement to produce copies of proceedings of the Hyderabad courts.

ONE Ebjee Visram wanted a servant, and meeting one day in the street with a man who impressed him as suitable to him, engaged him. Another day three months after, Visram returning home at night from a few hours' absence, found his cupboard broken open and its contents valued at Rs. 7,384 gone. He called out for his servant, but he too was gone. The sensitive fellow could not dare to face his unhappy master under the loss. The inappreciative and suspicious master has given information to the Police of his loss and against the servant.

Visram, of course, has been rightly punished for leaving his property to the mercy of a man whom he did not know and whom he employed without security or references of any kind. Yet it is one of the commonest forms of modern carelessness. We are all, or most of us, Visrams, more or less.

THE long pending feud between the Bally Bone Mill Company and the magnates of Uttarpara has at length gone to the civil courts. A suit has been filed before the Hooghly Sub-Judge by Raja Peary Mohun Mookerjee's sister, who has her house in the vicinity of the mill, complaining of its bone and coal dust as a nuisance prejudicial to the health, &c. The Sub-Judge went to the spot, visiting both the mill and the complainant's house.

THE following joke which is going the round of the press is not bad, though not new :-

"Heard lately in a Criminal Court.—Prisoner.—'Heaven is my witness, your Honor, that I am innocent.' Absent-minded Magistrate.—'Issue a summons at once for the witness.' Titter round the Court and rude awakening of the A. M. M."

That is not by any means so bad as the Civilian Magistrate, winner of premium for high proficiency in Bengali, on complainant deposing that the offence occurred before the Chandi Mandal (colloquialism for Chandi mandab—family hall for public worship, &c.) at once cried out "Take out a summons against the Mandal—Chandi Mandal."

THERE is no limit to the scepticism of the age. It is not only rampant on the great questions of Life, Death, Eternity, God and the Devil, it descends to the veriest trifles. It would appear from an article in the Daily Graphic of the 14th April last, that there is a difference of opinion as to the exact spot where Nelson breathed his last. It has always been understood that the great hero died in the cockpit of his vessel. The writer in the Graphic now asserts that "the balance of opinion seems in favour of the cabin rather than the cockpit." The Army & Navy Gazette, however, denies any diversity, and sticks to the cockpit.

MR. McLaughlan Slater, Manager and Actuary of the Oriental Life Assurance Company, Limited, applied and obtained on the last day of the last month from Mr. Cooper, Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, in chambers, a warrant against Dorabjee Dinjeebhoy Shroff, Assistant Secretary of the Company, for embezzling about three lacs of Rupees of the office money.

Distinct rumours of the loot were current in Bombay for the last two months. But such is the state of journalism in India that nothing was mentioned in the papers. Still to the credit of the Advocate of India, that journal more than a month back wrote to the Manager, but Mr. Slater bravely answered that, with the system of check employed, such a thing was simply impossible. Meanwhile, the truth, which was not to be suppressed, was all over the town. At last, the Assistant Secretary disappeared. Our contemporary, then again on the 27th April, wrote to Mr. Slater. It was no longer possible to poolpooh the matter. But though the embezzlement was admitted, the admission was saddled with a request, in the interests of the office, to preserve silence, specially as the unfaithful servant had offered to disgorge a part of his plunder. At the same time, Mr. Slater said that the loss will not hurt the Company; indeed that the defalcations do not touch the funds deposited with the Official Trustee, nor the capital invested in Government paper in the hands of the Company's bankers, &c. It is said that Shroff lost his takings, or at least a part of them, in speculation. The old story—the same at Bombay as at Calcutta. We understand that the Assistant Secretary made a clean breast of it to his chief. We hope Mr. Slater will come out of the inquiry sans tache. In the face of Shroff's admissions in his communications to Mr. Slater, it is expected that there will be no difficulty about the case. The lawyers know better. Have they no Woodroffe down on the Western Coast?

THE Indian Mirror is in sackcloth and ashes, and not to be comforted. On Tuesday last, our contemporary startled all Calcutta by appearing in triple black. Nobody could easily divine the cause of the

* * * inky cloak, * *

The customary suits of solemn black,
The windy suspiration of forc'd breath,
Yea, more, the fruitful river in the eye,
And the dejected haviour of the visage,
Together with all forms, modes, shows of grief, seeing that no public man of the first rank and the highest importance to India had been known to be in danger. Accordingly, it was decided to be a personal matter—a demonstration of filial duty. As the father (God bless his good soul!) has long since passed away, it must be the mother, everybody thought. And so it proved—though in a different sense from that of the public. Who but a Zadkiel or a Mahatma can imagine that all this ado is for the death of old Mother Blavatsky, the theosophist? No mother ever received greater homage from (to speak like a Hindu) the son whom she bore for ten mortal months in her womb. In the vehemence of grief, the editor chides the Hindus for allowing her to die out of India, thus losing the opportunity of making the land sacred. "Their land is not made sacred, as English ground has been, by her tomb or cenotaph." He of course concludes his tribute to the departed by calling for "a Memorial to Heliona Petrovna Blavatsky's memory as shall show the strength and extent of our repentance, and our appreciation of all that she ever did for India." The Ripon Memorial, the Knight Memorial, the Bradlaugh Memorial are all thrown overboard in the urgency of this call for immediate recognition of the claims of the Prophetess.

THE District Judge of Backerganj went the length of prosecuting a local native stable-keeper for injury to his property from a horse belonging to the other. The step involved a risk to a man occupying the position of head of the judicial department of the District. Luckily for the Judge, not only did he win his case but he also obtained Rs. 10 compensation for the injury. So far so good. Now comes the bad. His Judicial Eminence would not pocket the paltry amount. It was infra dig, we suppose. He threw the ten silver Victorias away—to a local charity. The fool!

Who are the "late Baboos Nundo Lall Bose and Pashooputt Nath Bose," of the National Paper, May 13, 1891, p. 145, col. 2, last line? It refers to the precious brace of brothers of Bag Bazaar, it is a serious outrage which can only be expiated in blood. A harmless allusion to the dramatic change of their situation in life was avenged with fire and sword as it were. But here is a case of downright slaughter—of the innocents.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE great Czar has been check-mated by the Rothschilds. Their Paris House refused to proceed with the issue of the new Russian Conversion Loan owing to renewed persecution of the Jews in Russia. The Russian Government saw fit to suspend the order of expulsion of the Moscow Jews for another two years. Verily, the Yankees are right in their phrase, the Almighty Dollar. Mammon is now the King of Kings, even more powerful than they.

A later telegram, however, says that the Government has ordered that the expulsion of Jews from Moscow and St. Petersburg is to be resumed.

JAPAN has won unenviable fame. Near Kioto, while visiting Lake Brewa, there was an attempt on the life of the Czarewitch by a Japanese. It is now explained that the attack was by an insane fanatic, by a sabre, on the head. Prince George of Greece intervened and prevented a second blow. The wound, at first feared to be mortal, is not serious.

INFLUENZA is spreading rapidly in London and the provinces. It is of a severe type, and has carried away many, high and low. The Archbishop of York is one of the victims, the final cause of the great prelate's translation to heaven being pneumonia. Seventy Members of Parliament are confined to bed. Royalty is not exempted from the rude handling of the bailiff of this formidable Power. The Prince of Wales has been slightly touched.

MR. Gladstone too is confined to his room, though not with influenza. On Sunday, the 10th, he was seized with a sudden fit of shivering followed by cold and fever.

THE Indian Civil Servant—unless he happens to be a native Indian—bears a charmed life. He is above crushing, or suppression. He may at worst be scotched—never killed. There is a divinity that doth hedge this king of men—the all-pervading divinity of an irresistible Bureaucracy. So Mr. Crawford is regaining the prestige of an Indian Civilian. His family have been already provided for and now he has won from the Secretary of State an allowance of £150 per annum. That is nothing for a modern Nabob. He will now be in a better position to pursue his divine rights, though.

THE virtue of the whole House—the piety of St. Stephen's Chapel—has been exploded—in the court of criminal judicature. Mrs. Grundy herself is in trouble. Everybody shapes his or her conduct by fear of Mrs. Grundy. At every step people continually ask within themselves, What will Mrs. Grundy say? Many have not seen her, but all regard her with some thing of the mysterious awe with which the old lady in Leadenhall Street was viewed, who was identified with the Company Bahadoor that ruled the Empire of the Moguls. Suppose now the tables turned—a terrible supposition! What will society think—what will the sinners say—if the staid elderly matron be caught in the act—of (say) eloping with a groom? The honourable and gallant member for North Buckinghamshire was as near being the Mrs. Grundy of the House of Commons as could be. A thorough Gladstonian, to begin with, he was the embodiment of all the proprieties. An elderly man on the wrong side of fifty, with a decided look of age, who would be venerable but for the disadvantage of person, he was a model of piety and probity. Of late, from last year, this moral son of Mars has not been happy. He had been attending to his various public duties fitfully, until he was non est in the very House itself. On important divisions this keen party politician was absent. The whip of his party knew not his whereabouts. That is always a bad sign. (We thought so in the case of Mr. Parnell when we heard that the Irish Leader did not let any body know his address.) At the same time, he was particularly wanted—not for his oration or even his votes, but for his explanation of certain transactions brought to light by a restless Police. Meanwhile, friends worked hard to stifle inquiry, but they failed. At last, regular proceedings were instituted. By that the accused had placed the seas between himself and the court. But there is no Hypnah for a Member of Parliament. In a moment of hesitation or over-confidence, he returned, and has now, in due form, in court of justice, ended his career as a public man.

WARRANTS were out on two members of Parliament for serious criminal offences—Captain Verney for conspiring, under an assumed name "Wilson," with a woman—Romuttan an old offender—to procure a girl under 21 years of age, and Mr. De Cobain for unnatural offences. Captain Verney surrendered himself, pleaded guilty and has been sentenced to one year's imprisonment. He has been expelled the House.

Mr. De Cobain keeps away. He cannot continue a member of Parliament.

A GREAT deal seems to be made, by those inclined to find fault with the action of Mr. Quinton and the Government of India in the unfortunate Manipur business, of the fact that Mr. Grimwood was kept in the dark as to the intentions of Government till the last moment. And to this fact is chiefly attributed the disaster, which, in their op-

nion, would have been averted if that gentleman had been fully and timely informed of the steps which had been decided on by Government regarding Koireng the Senapati.

But the character of Koireng has been well described by the ex-Maharaja in the communication made by him to the Reporter of the Statesman almost immediately after the occurrence of the disaster. The exiled chief distinctly and emphatically stated that Koireng was on the most intimate terms with Mr. Greenwood, and that the latter's friendship for that turbulent character prevented him from helping the Maharaja when the disturbance took place in September last.

The public were unwilling to believe that the Representative of the British Government had supported Koireng, directly or indirectly, in his intrigues for the deposition of the Ruling Chief. The doubt has, however, been dispelled by the "Story of Manipur" in the Englishman, evidently written under the inspiration, if not with the hand, of Mrs. Greenwood. That story clearly confirms the allegation of the ex-Maharaja, that both Mr. and Mrs. Greenwood were on the most intimate terms with the Senapati; so much so, that when Mr. Greenwood was at the last moment asked to carry out the orders of Government, both he and Mrs. Greenwood were much disturbed in their minds, and tried much to persuade Mr. Quinton that Mr. Greenwood should be excused the unpleasant task of doing harm to his friend.

The above will show, that the Government of India and Mr. Quinton, who must have been well aware of Mr. Greenwood's kindly feelings towards Koireng—unmistakably divulged by himself in his official and semi-official communications to the higher authorities—were fully justified in withholding the facts from him, until the eleventh hour, the most important information that it had been decided to sever Koireng's connection with the Manipur State.

People are even inclined to suspect, that "some expression used by Mr. Greenwood or his wife in an unguarded moment, to their intimate friend, of the British Government not being well disposed towards him, may have put him on his guard, induced him to make preparations beforehand to avert any calamity that might befall, and warned him against trusting himself in the hands of Mr. Quinton at the proposed Darbar. It is but natural for the press to blame the Government for withholding the facts from the public, but now that the Government have promised all the papers to Parliament, the world will soon have an opportunity of knowing the whole history of the matter.

THE Benares rioters are reaping the fruit of their rashness. Hari Ahir has been sentenced to transportation for life. He was charged with attempting to murder two constables and the Municipal Commissioner Sita Ram's servant. The jury found him guilty of only wounding one of the constables and in self defence. The wounded witnesses not being able to attend court, were not examined, but their evidence as recorded by the Magistrate was accepted by the Judge, who considered it inadvisable to postpone the trial when proofs against the accused were clear.

The trial of the fifteen for attack on the telegraph office has ended in the acquittal of seven and conviction of eight. Three have been sentenced each to fourteen years' transportation, two each to twelve, one to ten and one to seven. In addition, a sweepstake boy has been sentenced to thirty stripes.

ONE of our Calcutta dailies recently published a telegram from Hyderabad, announcing that a Hindoo gentleman from Bengal (Dr. Nishikant Chatterjee) was about to renounce his religion and adopt Mahomedanism.

Of late there have been so many signs of a Revival—English gentlemen and ladies born in the Christian faith have embraced the religion of Islam in the very heart of England, Mahomedan missionaries have been deputed to England to preach and convert the Christian world, and, last though not the least, English ladies of position have taken as their lords young Mahomedan gentlemen gone to England from India for the purposes of study: that there was nothing strange in a gentleman who is not a Christian and who is not a good Hindu adopting the faith of the rulers of the wealthiest Native State in India. But the fact is not so. The Bickampore friends of Chattopadhyaya will be gratified to learn that there is no danger. The telegram above referred to was no more than a hoax, and that the Hindoo Doctor has not the remotest idea of renouncing his own religion.

THE new Perfect Phonograph invented by Thomas Edison, and recently brought to Calcutta, although exhibited to limited audiences at the Asiatic Society, the Dalhousie Institute, and some other such places, was for the first time placed before the general public at the Mahomedan Literary Society's Conversazione at the Town Hall in March last. The large number of Native gentlemen who were present there and who had never before seen this wonderful invention, were very much astonished to hear it speak, play a number of musical instruments, imitate birds, whistle, &c. When the Viceregal party arrived in the room, Father Lafont in charge of it requested the Viceroy to speak a few words into the Phonograph. Lord Lansdowne, who took a very great interest in the exhibition, spoke the following words:—

"This is a wonderful invention, but before we can consider that it is 'thoroughly perfect,' we shall expect of it that it will do for us what a 'good reporter never fails to do and that is to correct the bad grammar of our speeches.'"

Sir Charles Elliott followed with the words:—

"This is the first time I ever had the honor of addressing an inanimate audience of this kind and I trust that it will receive my remarks with as much attention and that they will produce upon it as much effect as those remarks have often produced on a much more intelligent audience."

It was then the turn of Sir Frederick Roberts, who addressed as follows:—

"I am going to inspect the Volunteers tomorrow, and although I believe they will turn out in fair numbers, I hope that the next time I inspect them their number will be largely increased."

After this, Father Lafont turned the instrument, and it immediately reproduced the words of the speakers one after the other, in exactly their respective voices, to the great amusement and delight of themselves as well as the large number of gentlemen present.

WE were not a little startled at the news of the death of our excellent neighbour and friend, Ru Bahadur Suat Chunder Ghose at his residence at Faltollah, on Tuesday the 5th instant. He had visited us a few days previously, towards the close of the last month, hale to all appearance, and hearty beyond question. Unsuspicious of any danger, we led him through an acrimonious debate. He was quite equal to the occasion. Who could imagine that death was near. But the inexorable king had already ordered his victim's coffin. He laboured under a chronic complaint—diabetes. He had kept the disease under check and he went about in the world like other men. All the time the enemy was advancing his mines, and at last burst upon him with a tumour. Instead of letting it alone, he underwent an operation. A fatal mistake! Through the deep artificial opening made the lifeblood was drained. At last he expired.

He belonged to a respectable family of Chinsurah. He had received the best education of his day at the Hoogly College before the University was established. A good mathematician, he entered the Public Works Department and rose to the highest office open to men of his grade, and even obtained rank as an Honorary Engineer, receiving at the same time the important charge of the Akra Brick-fields. His services as a diligent executive or a civil engineer have been varied and in various parts of the country. He always served with credit. His superior style of living and his inclination towards cultivation and consequently his superior conversation all so rare in the native part of the service disposed Europeans to him. He was a genial kind man of much amiability.

On the recommendation of the Inspector-General, the Madras Government have sanctioned a special bonus of Rs. 550 for distribution among the Madras Special Police for special aptitude in the detection of dacoits and their successful prosecution. The Birthday or the New Year's Day Gazette may find Abdul Siban Sahib, the Special Police Inspector, at Khairatabad, for he is recommended for the honor.

Then for the other side of the picture! We do not know who is to be singled out for special mention—the Police or the committing Magistrate.

On the 24th February, in Bareilly, on the Queen's highway, near the District Jail and close to the police lines, a number of washermen just returning from a pran-huyet of their clan, elated with drink, fell upon an ekka driver and, in a row, despoiled his fare of a puggre and a stick. They were arrested and committed under sec. 395 of the Indian Penal Code as dacoits. After awaiting their trial in jail for two months, they have been convicted by the Sessions Judge of being drunk and disorderly in a public place and fined Rs. 15 each.

IN writing last week of the veteran Dr. W. H. Russell as the first and greatest of Special Correspondants, we forgot a curious fact which has been only lately brought to notice. The pedigree of this noble order of journalists is higher far. Its cradle was a palace—its founder the occupant of a throne. The Press is thus in a double sense ennobled by its war correspondence. The first war correspondent was a sovereign—one of the greatest sovereigns. When the other day the Kaiser of Germany showed his scorn for newspapers and editors, the wellknown Allgemeine Zeitung of Munich retorted on him by claiming his great ancestor and whom he professed to regard as his model, as a "gentleman of the press" and an able editor. The great Frederick was indeed an all round journalist, able to hit off an epigram, indite a smart paragraph, describe a military operation, or launch out a leader. Like Napoleon, Frederick the Great appreciated the power and potentiality of the press and, like him, utilised it in his interest. He kept himself informed of what was published in different parts of Europe, and employed special agents at the three centres—London, Hamburg and the Hague—to read newspapers for his information. Of course, he tried to influence the chief papers at home and abroad by communicating news and his views to them. He wrote a large number of articles which he got inserted by his charges d'affaires and other representatives in the journals of the various countries, besides those he indited for his own Prussian press. Professor Droysen, who collected a vast number of these articles for publication in a German military magazine, has given proofs of a great many of them being the productions of the monarch's own brain and hand. Lastly, to come to the point started by us, His Majesty contributed to the Spener Zeitung under the title of "Letters of an Eyewitness," describing the course of the two last wars in Silesia. Never before had military operations been minutely reported for a newspaper by one on the spot. Frederick the Great was thus the Father of this important branch of journalism—the War Special.

At Manchester, during an amateur representation of Romeo and Juliet, the fight between Mercutio and Tybalt proved true. The exclamation of Mercutio "I am hurt. A plague on both your houses," was no feigned ejaculation. The youth who personated Tybalt had so worked himself up for the play that he in right earnest stabbed his rival in the chest with a sword which penetrated his left lung causing almost instant death. The coroner's verdict was of course accidental death.

That is by no means a solitary example of realism in acting. Readers familiar with the annals of the stage will recall several notable incidents of the kind. Macready, for one, used to get dangerously excited inasmuch as quite forget that he was playing a play for amusement and instruction. On one occasion he had very nearly played himself into the hands of the Coroner and the court of Sessions. As Macbeth he came down upon his interlocutor with unaffected vehemence, and almost a fatal result.

THE young Emperor of Germany has indirectly done a service to England and mediately to all naval powers. He has lately been making a speech to the students of the Naval Academy at Kiel. He expressed his appreciation of the educational value, in training the Navy for actual service, of the sham encounters instituted in England in 1888. He was so satisfied with these English naval manoeuvres that he meant to introduce in his own country the same system of annually passing the German Navy through similar illustrations of naval strategy. That, he declared, was the only rational method of training officers and men for actual service.

AN event without parallel in the history of Calcutta has occurred today—a free fight between the Police and the citizens. Fighting with guardians of order is not a rare occurrence even in Calcutta, but never was it so determined or on so large a scale as today. The Benares Riot has, indeed, been repeated and in some respects, aggravated. The quarrel here as there is about a place of worship, only there it was a Hindu temple—here it is a Mahomedan one. The mischief had been brewing for some days. A Hindu who is known to our courts for his haste to be rich without regard to others, had purchased at a court-sale a piece of land in Ultadangi on the 24-Perganas side of Upper Circular Road, and had obtained formal possession. But the real possession was not so easy, as there was a mosque on the land. Instead of leaving the religious edifice alone, the purchaser purposed to demolish it. He was opposed in his attempt. He sought the assistance of the Police. The Mussulmans appealed to their brethren and prepared to resist the sacrilege. They raised an awning and unfurled a red banner. Yesterday there was some apprehension of a fight, but the Police were on the alert and all remained quiet. That quiet was the quiet before the storm. It burst this forenoon, in a desperate attack on the Police as the power which the Mussulmans thought supported the purchaser. First the few men of the local Police station were routed then a larger body was called into action, headed by Superintendent Srinath Pal. Meanwhile news flew to Head-Quarters and orders were telephoned to the different centres of the department to concentrate all available men on the scene of action. Alarming reports still came that the Police had been worsted and that Superintendent Pal was hors de combat. Then the Commander-in-Chief himself with his whole staff was drawn in haste to the field. Mr. Lambert, accompanied by his Deputy Mr. Barnard and Superintendent Robertson of the Detective Force, at the head of European constables and Mounted Police, hurried to the spot. They saw the desperate fighting going on, the Police scarcely able to approach the enemy, while they, a multitudinous lot, threw on them incessant showers of stones ready to hand, having been left on the wayside for repairing the road. The presence of the Chiefs of the Police and the demonstration of force made by them somewhat abating the conflict, Mr. Lambert called on both sides to desist, and leaving his dogcart he walked forward towards the mosque to see the priest or chaplain of the place. He told the people, if they had any grievance, to say so, he would try to see it redressed. While Mr. Lambert was parleying, one rascal from behind, with a sudden blow with a club, prostrated Mr. Robertson on the road. The others narrowly escaped the same fate. This was the signal for a general attack and the resumption of hostilities. More Policemen were called up from the various stations and the Head-Quarters were drained of the entire European element, still the Mussulmans fought with such determination and used their advantages so well, that victory inclined to them. Mr. Lambert thereupon sent to Fort William for assistance. A body of European troops marched out of the fort and reaching Dhurmtolla corner took possession of all the tram cars and proceeded. Their progress was intercepted at Cornwallis Square—not a mile from the scene—and sent back. This was about half past 3 O'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Lambert had succeeded in restoring order with his Police. All the Police engaged have been hit and most of them received injuries. A few will not live, we are afraid. Such resistance the Calcutta Force never encountered and was not prepared for. Mussulmans too have suffered.

There have been many arrests—some forty or fifty, we believe. The danger is not yet all over perhaps. Two Inspectors and a large force of the Police watch the neighbourhood tonight.

REPEATING the British history of often day, the Manipuris have given up their king to the vengeance of his pursuers. Koenig, the Senapati, still proves his title of a wanderer. The British victory in Manipur, such as it is, cannot be complete without him. The Government of India had marked him for banishment since the disturbance of September, but now he is wanted and he himself keeps away. Doubts are expressed that he is not to be had, it all to be had, alive. The Tongal Major is a prisoner in the hands of the British. Another Major, Ayia Garel, Minister of the Durbar, has also been arrested.

Enquiry shews that Mr. Quinton, Colonel Stone, and Messrs. Simpson and Cossins were beheaded by the public executioner, and that Mr. Greenwood was stabbed.

Lord Ripon drew the attention of the House of Lords to the reward proclaimed for the capture of the R. gent, the Senapati and others. Lord Cross replied that he felt sure the Viceroy never issued such a proclamation.

The Gazette of India of today published at Simla contains a selection of the papers that have passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State. The Englishman with its usual enterprise has this morning, in a telegram several columns long, given the best part of what has appeared. From this we regret to find that the Government of India have not cleared themselves from the charge of wheedling the Senapati into a meeting for the purpose of capturing him. The Government vehemently deny that they could ever plot such baseness on that Mr. Quinton could be capable of it, but they quietly proceed to describe how, under their instruction, the thing was tried by Mr.

Quinton without success. Such stultification we have rarely come across. We must reserve further notice of the subject till the arrival of the Gazette in Calcutta.

MESSRS. Schollay & Co. have resigned the Agency of the Pioneer Glass Manufacturing Company, Limited. It has been taken up by Messrs. Voigt & Co. The new Agents have brought new vigour into the enterprise. They have suggested a considerable increase of capital, to meet the higher cost of the machinery and the cost of purchasing the freehold property on which the buildings of the Company are situated at Tittaghur. The property consists of about nine biggahs of land with an annual ground rent of Rs. 20. The circular to the shareholders now issued by the Directors enumerate the following advantages of a glass manufactory in this country :—

Cheap raw material in unlimited supply.

Cheapness of Native versus English labour.

Saving in packing, freight, intermediate charges and breakage.

The adaptation of the output of the factory to local requirements.

A large building for the accommodation of the workmen and factory hands has been raised. The plant and machinery has been paid for and has arrived in charge of a professional furnace builder. An expert, both theoretical and practical, has been secured for five years as the Factory Manager. A professional crucible maker and two English glassblowers have also arrived who will train native workmen in their art. Of the four Directors, three, we find, are natives, Bengalis—two of them familiar with the launching of jointstock enterprise, and the third being a well-known Zemindar and merchant and a prominent member of the Native Chamber of Commerce. The company will manufacture medicine bottles and fancy glassware of various kinds. The plant now imported is capable of turning out, if confined to this work, 34,000 gross of medicine bottles—usually sold at Rs. 6 to Rs. 6.8 per gross. This is calculated to yield a net profit of from Rs. 40,740 to Rs. 57,740. The company must be warned against bringing into the market such a quantity and making a drug of drug bottles. They properly announce their intention to put the factory on different kinds of glass-work. The enterprise is essentially Bengali, having been originated by Bengalis. The name chosen is meant to indicate the first of many similar factories in this country. Here is a legitimate opportunity for genuine economical patriotism.

THE CENSUS.

WE have read the preliminary Census tables compiled by Mr. Baines, and more particularly his general comments, with great interest. The work could not be in better hands. He has done it excellently as one doing a thing con amore. The promptitude with which the returns have been abstracted is worthy of all praise indeed; it fairly took us by surprise. And yet the Census Commissioner is not wholly satisfied himself. As it is, it was within five weeks of the enumeration that the results were published. Mr. Baines, however, would have been ten days earlier, were it not for the unpunctuality of a single district officer in the Central Provinces. Nevertheless, the speed with which the preliminary compilation has been made must be regarded as highly creditable to the organising capacity of the Commissioner. It is also gratifying to have his assurance that this speed has not been secured at the expense of accuracy. Accepting this assurance as to the character of the compilation—a work presumably prepared by experienced abstracters—the question of the accuracy of the enumeration itself must remain one of which one cannot unfortunately be quite so confident.

The enumeration itself must be regarded as only of very approximate value. Nor is this any discredit to the Commissioner or the system he laid down for the work. In the very interesting letter with which he forwards to the Government of India his preliminary tables, he describes that system, and it is one, which, on the whole, must be pronounced as excellently devised for guarding against errors of calculation. But the initial stage was, we fear, not much guarded. The work of enumeration was often left to men with the slenderest qualifications for a task of such responsibility. From the opportunities we have had of testing the work done by these men, we have reason to suspect that, generally accurate as the census may be in regard to the population numbered and even as regards its division into the two sexes, much too great carelessness has been manifested in recording age. This is a particular of great importance. Conclusions of the utmost value, depend upon the age-tables, and even now Mr. Baines is hopefully looking forward to these to be in a position, with their aid, to explain many things which are, in their absence, inexplicable. Correct age-tables are of scientific value in various other ways. But so far as we can see, we must wait for some time before we have a Census conducted by a more intelligent agency than the army of unpaid, ill-selected and ill-supervised enumerators. On the question of age, even intelligent men have the vaguest notions. Ordinarily, educated men betray at times ludicrous ignorance of their own age. Our notions respecting the age of children are untrustworthy in the extreme. The age of women and particularly of Hindu widows is still more staggering a problem. Add to this, the well-known popular ignorance and even superstitious prejudice that prevail among the ignorant lower classes with respect to age. And we have a situation of difficulty far beyond the class of men whom we carelessly appointed to enumerate these particulars to grapple with. We make these comments in no cavilling spirit. The work of an Indian Census is of colossal extent and beset with peculiar difficulties which are absent elsewhere. The continental size of the country, with its divisions into British and Feudatory Provinces, and some of the territory like Baluchistan and Upper Burma only recently acquired, coupled with the endless complexity of its ethnic, linguistic and religious peculiarities, makes the work one of a formidable kind. No criticism of the results of the census will therefore be fair which fails to take note of these difficulties and to make ample allowances for them. We recognize this aspect of the subject fully and are quite disposed to be lenient with errors, but still the errors must be acknowledged as such and the character of the work truly appraised to ensure cautious use of its details and figures. We are afraid the same carelessness which we have pointed out in regard to the reporting of age has prevailed in other respects. Notably has this, we are afraid, been the case in recording the varieties of race, tribe, sect, &c.—distinctions requiring some degree of intelligence and education to understand and deal with.

Barring a few points like these in which the Census will reasonably be open to objection, the work has been done well. It is a great work, and Mr. Baines has great power of organization in dealing with it. He is himself far from confident that the rules and instructions he issued were observed in all cases. We know they were not. Any flagrant cases of wilful misconduct on the part of enumerators have not transpired, but the general low level of their intelligence is an unfortunate fact which is beyond dispute. For the rest, there has also been negligence on the part of supervisors and superintendents of Charges which there was no adequate means of preventing. These have vitiated the result, but with a generally unintelligent agency to do the first work of enumerating, nothing better could be expected. Still, however, we believe the main enumeration of the population is fairly reliable as well as the relative proportions of the sexes—a point of no mean value.

REGISTRATION OF CARRIAGES AND CARTS.

We are glad to see that Mr. Cotton has bethought himself, in his Bill, of the hard case of hackney-carriage owners in some municipalities adjacent to Calcutta. We have more than once pointed out their grievance, and it was removeable by executive order. Nothing, however, has been done so far. Well is it, therefore, that, though late, the remedy comes from the legislature.

Under existing arrangements, the owners of these carriages have sometimes to pay registration fees twice or thrice over to two or three different municipalities. A carriage, for instance, is kept in one Municipality, and used there as well as within other Municipalities. In such a case, if it is registered in only one place, it is not enough. This may sound preposterous, but the fact is even so. Not unoften is it arrested within other jurisdictions where it might be found plying for hire, and subjected to great molestation, blackmailing, and ultimately to fresh taxation. This is certainly a great hardship, the effect of which is seriously to injure the growth of a trade in our rising suburban towns, which it should be our aim to encourage rather than to repress. Fortunately, the evil is confined to two or three of the municipalities round about Calcutta. So far as Howrah, the late Suburban Municipality and Dum-Dum are concerned, their jurisdiction in regard to the carriage tax is common with the Calcutta Municipality, and this arrangement is as it should be. Under this arrangement, the Calcutta Corporation registers all carriages in these towns, and a rateable distribution of the registration fees, after deduction of the expenses, is made among these municipalities. The South-Suburban, and the North-Suburban, now called Baranagar, Municipalities were not included in this arrangement, and hence they have latterly claimed a separate jurisdiction from Calcutta in regard to carriages kept within their limits, while, as the chief place of business for these carriages, Calcutta continued to exercise her old jurisdiction over them as before.

This uncertainty and, above all, the splitting of jurisdiction in respect of these carriages, not only operated to the prejudice of a trade entitled to tender treatment at the hands of the local authorities: They were not only the source of great molestation and of excessive taxation upon owners of hackney-carriages, but they inflicted no small injustice on the smaller municipalities excluded from a common jurisdiction with Calcutta. These asserted, it is true, an independent jurisdiction of their own, but even this did not help them much financially. They made some small addition to their funds by registering their own carriages, but still they went without their fair quota of the fees due for carriages kept outside their limits in Calcutta and the late Suburbs, but habitually plying within those limits. A common arrangement as now proposed by Mr. Cotton will be fairer to all the municipalities concerned.

After this, could not a similar common system for the registration of carts in metropolitan and suburban areas be devised? The same hardships arising from the same division of municipal jurisdiction are suffered by cart-owners as by hackney carriage-owners, and it is high time that both the cases should be dealt with now and at the same time. This will require a slight change in the Calcutta Municipal Act, giving the Calcutta Corporation the same power of registering carts as is now proposed in regard to carriages.

THE TRIBUNE LIBEL APPEAL.

THE Punjab Chief Court, through Sir Meredith P Snowden, have thrown out the appeal of Sirdar Dyal Singh in the Warburton defamation case. The two main grounds taken and argued were decided against the Sirdar. They were (1) "that the Magistrate had, with reference to the provisions of section 198 C. P. C. exceeded his jurisdiction in taking cognizance of and charging the applicant with an offence falling under section 502, I. P. C., without complaint of an offence under these sections, and (2), that the conviction was bad in law because it was necessary to prove both that the applicant had abetted an offence under section 502, I. P. C., and abetment was not proved; and it was necessary to prove that he knew the matter published to be defamatory; and such knowledge was not proved." Regarding the first point, the court, without being technical, held

"Possibly the draftsman of the complaint and the complainant believed that section 500 was applicable to the proprietor as well as to the other persons charged, and as to the complainant, this view is supported by his examination. But it cannot be said that he complained against any one of the accused under that section only. In our opinion this is a complaint regular and complete as regards the offence under section 500 I. P. C., irregular and defective as regards the offence under section 502, I. P. C., but nevertheless, complaint of an offence falling under it, and we cannot therefore say that there is no complaint of an offence under section 502."

In addition, the Chief Court point out in our scientific code the loophole of escape for the careless magistrate and against the technical objecter, that a magistrate being competent to entertain a complaint, any irregularity or omission in the complaint is no ground for reversing the conviction, unless that omission or irregularity occasioned a failure of justice. Whatever omission there was in the complaint was supplied in the evidence tendered in support of it. We for our part have no objection to this liberality, if it were uniformly extended to all. In point of fact, the same objection which is overruled in one case, is allowed to prevail in another. This absence of fixity is a great reproach, and causes much heart-burning.

On the second point, the judgment says:

"We are of opinion that there is ample evidence that the applicant abetted the sale of the copy of June 7th which was purchased at the office of the Tribune by Mr. Russell. It is not denied that the applicant is not the proprietor of the newspaper, or that by his general authority and for his benefit copies of the paper are kept on sale at the Tribune office. Keeping an office for the sale of the paper and authorising a person to sell on his behalf are evidence that the applicant intentionally aided the sale of every copy of the paper that is sold at the office, according to the definition under section 107, I. P. C. of 'abetting the doing of a thing'—this abetment is distinct from abetment of an offence which is defined under section 108, but proof of it is a step towards proof of abetment of an offence. According to section 108 'a person abets the commission of an offence who abets the commission of an act which would be an offence if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence with the same knowledge as that of the abettor.'"

It does not appear to the Court that,

"for a conviction under section 502 I. P. C. it is necessary, in addition to proving that the seller knows the substance sold to contain defamatory matter, to prove also that he knows the matter to be defamatory. The section contains no express provision to this effect, and is in this respect in marked contrast to section 501. In that section the printer or engraver of any particular matter must be proved to 'know or have good reason to believe that such matter is defamatory to some person.' This provision defines the mens rea necessary to constitute the offence defined under section 501. Printing or engraving a particular matter is in itself a mechanical act and a workman may and often does print matter in a language which he does not understand, or may engrave a picture, i. e., a caricature, which is grossly defamatory, in total ignorance that it is so, and in either case he is not according to the code to be regarded as an offender. It is no doubt necessary, in order to substantiate a charge under section 502, to prove that the seller of a printed substance knows its contents, which imparts proof that he understood the language used, and to prove that its contents are defamatory. But there appears to be no need if the contents are defamatory to prove further that he knew them to be defamatory. In cases where it is necessary to prove against a person that he has committed defamation by publishing an imputation when the matter published is per se defamatory, all that the prosecution is bound to prove in the first instance is the fact of publication. When the tendency of the imputation published concerning any person is to harm the reputation of that person the court is fully justified in inferring from the terms of the matter itself that the publisher intended to harm or knew, or had reason to believe, that such imputation would harm his reputation. This is the doctrine of the English Courts as laid down in Regina versus Harvey (2 B. and C. 207). If any authority is needed for this proposition it is only a part of the general doctrine that every man may and should be presumed to know the natural consequence of his own acts.

The Sessions Judge was of opinion that the article had defamed the complainant himself, whereas, according to the Magistrate, the matter was defamatory of the complainant's mother. The Chief Court hold that it is good conviction, if there is defamation of any being in whom the complainant is interested.

"It is enough to say that both Courts were justified in finding it (the matter) to be defamatory, either to the complainant or to his deceased mother."

The Punjab Court thus supply the omission in the Penal Code of the definition of "defamatory matter."

"There is no definition in the Penal Code of the expression 'defamatory matter' which does not occur under section 499 or section 500, but is used in sections 501 and 502 I. P. C. But there is no difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of the expression from the context. Defamation we take to do any imputation made or published, in any of the modes described by section 499, concerning any person which tends to harm the reputation of such person subject to the explanations and exceptions appended to that section."

The contention regarding knowledge is thus disposed of :

"But here it is contended that something more must be shown, namely, that the applicant knew the article to be defamatory so as to render the publication of it an offence. This it is said is necessarily involved in the definition of the offence in the words 'knowing it contained such matter,' i. e. 'defamatory matter.' A mens rea it is said is necessary to constitute every offence. If it be necessary to found a charge under section 502 I. P. C. that the person who sells or offers for sale a newspaper containing defamatory matter knows the matter to be defamatory, there is in point of fact a finding to that effect in this case in the judgment of the Sessions Judge. The Judge finds that 'he,' that is, Sirdar Dyal Singh, 'received a copy of each issue as it appeared. He must therefore have read the libel complained of, and he could not have failed to see that the words were defamatory as regards the complainant. They appeared too at a time when a serious attack against complainant's character was being made in the columns of the paper.'"

The only fact found is that the proprietor received a copy of the paper and it is all presumption that he read it and found it to contain defamatory matter.

There is a gleam of hope for other sellers of defamatory matter.

"In regard to the contention as to mens rea, it may be conceded that generally, if not universally, a mens rea is necessary to constitute a criminal offence. But is there no mens rea in the definition of the offence falling under section 502? The definition requires knowledge that the printed substance sold contains defamatory matter. A person who conducts a business in the course of which he is liable to sell books, or papers, or the like which may contain matter which is injurious to the reputation of another person, and may be in fact defamatory as defined in the Penal Code is bound by reason of the penalty imposed by this section, if not otherwise, to abstain from selling any book or the like which, to his knowledge, contains matter which is defamatory. If he sells in ignorance of the contents he is not guilty of the offence under this section. If he sells notwithstanding the knowledge of the contents, and the contents are defamatory, he is guilty. The seller in India is, if I really understand the English law on the subject, in a better position than persons in England, who, in the course of their business, sell books or papers containing defamatory matter, for the latter are liable criminally as well as civilly whether or not they know the contents of the printed substance sold. On this point I will only refer to the Criminal Digest of Sir James Stephen, Chapter XXXII, and in particular to article 270."

There is no escape for the accused unless he can establish the defences in the Code.

"The argument that the offender under section 502 must know that the matter contained in the substance which he sells is defamatory for criminal as well as for civil purposes is not, in our opinion, of any weight, as we consider that it is not necessary to prove that he knows it to be defamatory. It is enough for the prosecution to prove that it is defamatory, and it is then open to the accused person to establish any of the numerous defences which the exception to section 499 grant to him, so as to show that the matter is not defamatory. If it is proved to be defamatory, and the knowledge described in section 502 I. P. C. is proved, this is sufficient for a conviction."

That may be tolerable "Justices' justice," but it is scarcely worthy of a superior court. British Judges are expected to be particular in exacting all the requirements of criminal jurisprudence. The Chief Court set their face against the orthodox doctrine that knowledge or intention is the essential ingredient in crime. So difficult is the question of defamation that many editors, without the slightest intention to libel, publish matter which a court may adjudge defamatory. The question as a rule is simply above the proprietary. The Chief Court doubtless aim at substantial justice, but it was scarcely their business to alter the law, though their views were certainly worthy of the consideration of the legislature. Even in that regard it ought to be remembered that defamation is a strange offence in the East, the creature of British law.

The Sirdar was fined by the Magistrate Rs. 3,000 in a lump on three charges. The Sessions Judge upheld the conviction on two charges and reduced the fine by Rs. 500, apportioning Rs. 1,000 to each of the charges. The Chief Court do not consider the fine excessive, considering the nature of the offence and the means of the Sirdar which last guided the first court in its sentence.

In fine, the Punjab Courts have done as far as lay in them to discourage the enterprize of the Press.

THE INDIAN ASSOCIATION FOR THE CULTIVATION OF SCIENCE.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

After the reading of the Report, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar addressed the meeting as follows :—

Your Honor, and Gentlemen,

The Report, which with your permission I have read, has been a rather tediously long one, and it would be cruel if I were to prolong the tedium by any idle words of mine. Before an audience like this, and indeed before any audience in the present day enjoying blessings which Science has made Nature scatter broadcast over the world, any attempt to discourse on the advantages of Science would be unjustifiable impertinence. And though in view of the progress, the very small progress, which this Institution has made in the course of upwards of fifteen years, during which time Science has made rapid strides in the favored countries of the West, giving birth to marvellous discoveries followed by equally marvellous inventions, all tending to the comforts and happiness of man, I say, though in view of this lamentable state of things in my own country, the temptation is great of re-iterating what I have been saying for nearly a quarter of a century, about the absolute need of the physical sciences for the regeneration of the Indian races, I must resist that temptation.

The time has come when I may fairly assume that all this is fully understood, that the utility of this Institution is no longer a matter of doubt, and that all that is needful now is to find out ways and means to bring out that utility. The Association has already a good lecture-hall which will serve its purpose for some time to come; and will soon have, through the magnificent liberality of His Highness the Maharaja of Vizianagram, a splendid building for the Laboratory. But the building, to use the words of Clerk Maxwell, is but the outward shell of the Laboratory proper. The life-blood, I need hardly say, is constituted by instruments of illustration and research, and the animating spirit must be the men who will devote their lives in it to use those instruments for the exploration of Nature. Through the munificence of one of Bengal's noble sons the Association has hitherto been enjoying the advantage of a good collection of scientific apparatus with which it is working up to this day. But when it is said that this collection is being worked for upwards of a dozen years, it will be easily understood in what state they must be now, and how needful it must be to replace and supplement them by newer and more modern instruments if the Association must keep pace with the progress of discovery.

This means the expenditure of a good sum of money, and the Association ought to be enabled to command it. It is due to Babu Kah Kissen Tagore who has hitherto helped us so generously and that at a time when without his help we could not have commenced operations at all, that our millionaires who have not yet come forward in aid of the Association should follow his noble example, and that others whose means will not permit them to imitate him in the magnitude of his liberality will not deem it unworthy to come forward each according to his means. Nothing, in my humble opinion, is a greater mistake than to measure the value of a charitable contribution by its amount. And I am afraid it is this mistake which prevents the majority of my countrymen from taking that active part in all movements for the public good which but for it they would take, and it is thus that this fatal mistake deprives such movements in our country of their really public character.

But suppose we succeed, as I believe we shall, in having a well-equipped Laboratory, there will yet be wanting some thing, the most essential thing, to vitalize it, that is, actual workers to work it. How to get them is the most difficult problem in our country. The time has not come when we may have faith in unremunerated workers. The men of leisure are not the men in any part of the world who contribute by their intellectual work towards the intellectual advancement of the race. The Counts du Moncel are solitary examples even in Europe. It is the poor student who must be furnished with leisure, that is with freedom from anxiety for the satisfaction of irresistible animal wants and cravings, in order that his mental energies may be conserved and utilized for the conquest and annexation of nature's domains in the service of man.

But this again means the outlay of a large sum of money, much larger than is necessary for the equipment of the Laboratory. The Report has told you what the state of the funds is for the endowment of a professorship to be called after Lord Ripon. At the time the proposal for such a professorship was made it was hoped that considering the imperative necessity of a professorship and the dear and honored name with which it was intended to be associated, the citizens of Calcutta would not allow a long time to intervene between the proposal and the endowment; and indeed to quote the words Sir Stuart Bayley used when presiding at our annual meeting in 1888, "if ever there was a project which deserved the enthusiastic reception of the people of this town it was one projected for their benefit by Lord Ripon, twice urged on their attention in public by him, subscribed to by him, and to be called after his name." In view of the project of the professorship falling through from want of funds, Sir Stuart was quite justified in reproachfully asking, "in this wealthy city is Lord Ripon's name then forgotten?" and in leaving us to draw the moral. Sir, I must confess I have been the principal delinquent in this matter. I am afraid I have not moved about it with sufficient energy to acquaint my countrymen with the project itself to gain for it their support and aid. And I therefore hope with the Committee that my countrymen will not allow it to remain a myth, but will now come forward the more readily to make amends for their past neglect and make it ere long a reality.

The Report has told you of His Highness the Maharaja of Cooh Behar's handsome monthly contribution towards the establishment of a permanent professorship, and also how the money, being as yet inadequate for the remuneration of a full-time professor, is proposed to be utilized for the present, till either the Association is in a position to add its own quota to it, or which is a greater probability till the Maharaja may see fit to increase the amount of his contribution. At any rate there seems to be every prospect of this professorship soon passing beyond the nebular stage and settling down into a permanent endowment.

In this way by a gradual but a very slow process the Association may rise to the dignity of a scientific institution, fulfilling in a humble way the functions of diffusing and may be of making small additions to scientific knowledge. But it must be remembered that by the time it attains to this dignity Science will not remain in statu quo in Europe and America but will have advanced, and if that advance be, as it is very likely to be, at its present accelerating rate, our poor institution will suffer immeasurably by comparison. To avert this catastrophe, for a catastrophe it will be in view of our glorious past and the promising present when the progress of enlightenment has become so rapid under the blessings of Western education and the fostering care of a beneficent Government, to avert such a catastrophe must be the earnest endeavour of every patriot. And the only way, which I can think of, by which this may be effected, is to set free and properly direct the two forms of energy that are to be found in the country, partly latent and partly working or rather being dissipated in wrong directions, I mean the energy of intellect and the energy of hoarded wealth. We have ample and satisfactory evidence of the existence of astonishing amounts of both forms of energy. To liberate and properly direct the former in order to get the maximum of work from it, it is absolutely necessary to liberate and properly direct the latter; and when this is done, when wealth becomes the help meet of intelligence, the arrears due to a variety of causes will be made up, and the time hastened when India shall regain her lost prestige.

"My people are perishing for lack of knowledge," is literally applicable to the people of India. Ignorance of the eternal laws by which the universe is governed has brought death into this country, death physical, death intellectual, death moral. And is this ignorance to continue here when the rest of the world is ablaze with the light of knowledge? The light of knowledge elsewhere, unless we can make it our own and add to it, will not avail us but will only render the darkness of our ignorance the more visible. It is to help in reluming the light of knowledge in the breasts of my countrymen that this Association has been established, and that I have nearly sacrificed a whole life time. I fear that I have not done so in vain, for I believe ever, one will admit with Shuk Saad that --

بنی آدم از علم یابد امان
نه از دلبش و نه از جاه و مال و منزل
چو شمع از بوی علم باید سوزد
نه از بی علم آفتابان خدایا سوزد

*The children of Adam through knowledge attain perfection,
Not through pomp or splendour, riches or possessions;
For the sake of knowledge you should consume yourself like a candle,
For without knowledge God cannot be known

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Sir Charles Elliott said :-

I feel rather embarrassed at having to address such an audience as this, because it is a well-established custom that a speaker ought to know more of his subject than the people whom he addresses; whereas it so happens that while almost all of those whom I see around me are old supporters of, or are familiar with, this Association, this is the first occasion on which I have been present at any of its meetings. I am satisfied, however, that I did not make a mistake in assenting to the request that I should become President of this Association, and so take the place of my predecessor in the Lieutenant-Governorship, Sir Stuart Bayley; for I see, on looking through your past reports, that for many years either the Lieutenant-Governor or the Viceroy has generally been present at your annual meetings; and it is quite right that Government should support and encourage everything that is done to promote the growth of the love of science in India. Now this Association has one peculiar merit, in that it affords opportunities to young men to pursue their studies in science after they have gone through their usual curriculum and taken their University degree, that is, at a time when many of them are apt to think that they have learnt all that there is to learn and know all that needs to be known, and that they may as well go out into the world and cease improving their minds and begin to earn money for themselves. But we who are old and grey-headed know that the time never does come when there is nothing left to learn or when education should cease; and therefore I think that the society of Bengal generally, and of Calcutta in particular, owes a great debt to those devoted and public spirited gentlemen who have carried on the series of useful and valuable, if somewhat austere, lectures of which we have heard an account given in the report which has been read this evening. Now, gentlemen, I am not going to say anything in praise of Physical Science to-night. Your presence here and your connection with this Association shows that you already know and realize all that I could say on such a subject. But I wish to submit to you one particular illustration of the direction in which a spread of the study of Physical Science must benefit this country. You have all of you read the results of the Census which has recently been taken, and you have no doubt pondered with some alarm and anxiety over the fact which it discloses, that the population of India has increased by 22 millions during the last ten years. Just think what an enormous figure 22 millions is; it is a larger number than the whole of England contained 20 years ago--a larger number than the whole of Great Britain contained 10 years ago. It is a very serious thing to think that every ten years this country has to provide additional food for such an immense population. It is a commonplace saying that India is a very poor country--so poor that it can hardly provide food for the whole of its population; and yet here we have an increase of 20 millions every ten years to scramble with the existing crowd for their scanty portion of food. I don't suppose anyone who is at all a student of Political Economy can look without anxiety on the prospect of what the country will come to if the population goes on steadily increasing at this rate. You have no doubt seen a letter which Sir J. Caird wrote to the Times, in which he urged that the difficulty should be met and the increase of food provided by introducing a more scientific agriculture. This recommendation of Sir J. Caird's makes one think of the saying, "Vous êtes ouvrier, Mons. Josse." Mons. Josse, you remember, was a jeweller in one of Molière's plays, and whenever any trouble happens to the house he is interested in, whether it be the illness of the daughter or the misconduct of the son or the incapacity of the head of the house, the only advice he can give them is to buy more jewels. Similarly Sir J. Caird is famous as a scientific agriculturist, and his advice is to introduce more scientific agriculture. Now I do not wish in the least to derogate scientific agriculture. I believe it will do much good; and I trust that one of the results of the lectures given here will be to direct practical chemical knowledge to the improvement of agricultural processes. But though I am not a jeweller, I have a notion of my own, and it is one that impinged its impression upon me when I was employed along with Sir J. Caird on the Famine Commission, and was led in that way to make a special study of this branch of economics. The doctrine which I specially recommend to the true remedy for supplying food to the ever-increasing population is the introduction of a diversity of occupations. The great misfortune of India is the absence of such diversity. Almost the whole of the population, or at least 90 per cent., is employed in agriculture; and hence it happens that if a drought comes, or a plague with the crops, I do not speak of any such calamity as a catastrophe to learn, but even if there is any temporary drought or any excessive flooding, prices go up, panic sets in, and a general distress occurs. Now the great object of those who are interested in the welfare of this country should be to take them off the land; to provide a diversity of occupations, through which they may ob-

Holloway's Pills. Pure Blood. When the blood is pure, its circulation calm and equable, and the nerves well strong, we are well. The Holloway's Pills possess a marvellous power in securing these essentials of health by purifying, regulating, and strengthening the fluids and solids. Holloway's Pills can be confidently recommended to all persons suffering from disordered digestion, or worried by nervous fancies, or neuralgic pains. They correct acidity and heartburn, dispel sick headache, quicken the action of the liver, and act as alteratives and gonorrhoeals. The weak and delicate may take them without fear. Holloway's Pills are eminently serviceable to invalids of irritable constitution, as they rouse the action of every organ to its natural standard, and universally exercise a calming and sedative influence.

tain wages and subsistence, irrespective of agriculture. And it is to Physical Science that we mainly owe the possibility of offering to the people these different kinds of occupation. Take railways, for instance. I dare say you know that the Indian railways employ about 200,000 Natives of this country; 200,000 people who, but for the railways, would be jostling each other on the fields, and by their competition would be raising the rate of rent and lowering the rate of agricultural wages. Now railways owe their entire existence to the Physical Sciences. Science invented the steam-engine—science taught how to roll iron and to cast steel for the girders and the permanent-way. But science has now done all that it can for railways; we do not hope for much further development in them, though we hope for an immense extension of them, and that there may be soon 10 or 20 miles of railway for every mile that exists now. In what other direction, then, could science promote Diversity of Occupations? There is the great field of mining to which science opens the door. You have, within 200 miles of Calcutta, one of the greatest coal fields in the world; and yet it has been so little worked that not many years ago more coal was brought to Calcutta from England than was excavated by the total output of the Bengal coal-fields. Already there has been much development of these mines. At the present day the whole of the railways in these parts are worked with Bengal coal, and 700,000 tons of coal are annually used by the steamers that leave this port. In a very few years I hope that the import of English coal will totally cease; and in this and many other ways there is immense scope for development in coal mines. For it is not in Bengal alone that coal is found; we have also found it in Palamow; we have found a large field on the skirts of Rewah, into which as yet we have only put down two or three insignificant borcholes; we have found it in Berar, and we have recently found traces of it at the foot of the Himalayas near Darjeeling. It is Physical Science that will teach your young men to go about with open and intelligent eyes to understand the stratification of the rocks, and to read the indications which the strata give as to the probability of finding coal or other mineral wealth; and wherever mineral wealth exists and is exploited, there a new source of employment is created which takes the people off the land. Then look again at petroleum. India some day will be an immense producer of petroleum. There are great areas of it in Beloochistan and near Rawal Pindi in the north-west, in Assam and Burmah in the north-east, which we are only now just beginning to touch, because although we have long known of them, we have not had the trained scientific and experienced men required to work them. Why, in upper Assam alone there is an enormous tract well known to be extremely rich in petroleum. I myself saw it 10 years ago, and its existence has been known for more than 30 years. But it was only last year that for the first time a successful experiment was made and a boring sunk which tapped the oil so that it spouted up just as you have read of it spouting up at Baku on the Caspian shores or in the great oil-fields of Canada. All we need is the growth of a knowledge of Physical Science to teach the Natives of India how to deal with these natural resources, and then we shall no longer import kerosine from Canada or from Russia, but shall produce all that is required for our own consumption, and in producing it shall afford employment to a great body of labourers who will be independent of agriculture. Thus far I have only spoken of mines; but I might have easily said just as much on the subject of factories, which, as you know, have provided a new source of employment which has added greatly to the well-being and comfort of the industrial population of this part of Bengal. And what could factories have done without science? Not only has it given them their motive power, the steam-engine, but the spindles which spin the thread and the looms which weave the fabrics in every part and detail of their machinery, owe their existence to the lessons taught in the laboratory or by practical mechanics. I think, gentlemen, that I have now said enough to illustrate this doctrine that the great want of India is Diversity of Occupations; that the growth and spread of Physical Science is the only means of relieving the competition among agricultural labourers and diverting them to other fields of useful work; and that few men can deserve better of their country than those who have devoted themselves by their support of this Association to the spread of science in India. The labours of such men as Father Lafont and Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar are given without remuneration for the pure love of their subject; and I trust that the benefits which will flow from their devotion will long be remembered among you, and that they will have the highest of all rewards, the reward of feeling that they have spent themselves for the good of the country, and not spent themselves in vain.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTORS

FOR THE

Bengal Bonded Warehouse Association

OF THE

Half-Year ended 30th April 1891.

1. Your Directors submit for examination and approval the accounts of the Association for the half year ended 30th April 1891.

2. On the 31st October last, the uncollected rent bills, amounting to Rs. 19,149-15-1, during the subsequent six months have been issued for Rs. 62,256-11-10. Of these two amounts Rs. 64,464-14-6 have been realised, leaving Rs. 16,941-12-5 outstanding.

3. The divisible surplus amounts to Rs. 37,885-2-7. Your Directors have set apart, as usual, the sum of Rs. 2,000 to the credit of the Repair and Building Fund.

4. Two of your Directors Mr. D. Cowie and Rajah Doorga Churn Law, C. I. E., retire by rotation. Mr. D. Cowie offers himself for re-election.

A Director will also have to be elected in the place of Mr. W. J. M. McCaw, who has vacated his seat on proceeding home.

5. The Hydraulic Lifts continue to work well and satisfactorily.

6. After deducting the sum set apart under the Act for repairs, the divisible balance will be Rs. 35,885-2-7. Of this amount your Directors recommend that Rs. 32,000 be applied in payment of a dividend of Rs. 16 per share, and the balance Rs. 3,885-2-7 be carried to the next half-year's account.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

ELIZABETH.

I.

DURING the weary months, when Paris, all closely surrounded,
Fought with starvation within, fought with the Germans without;
When, though the master of millions, no man could leave or re-enter
Were the need ever so great, were it for others or self;
When many knew that a word, if into the city transmitted,
Ruin would surely avert, fatal delusion remove:
Greater perhaps was the suffering, deeper perhaps was the heart-ache,
Caused by the stoppage of news, than by the stoppage of bread.
Those who were pining for bread were only the poor Parisians,
Those who were pining for news numbered both them and the world.
History, when wilt thou tell, how many the mothers too tender,
Who in that endless suspense died for the want of a word?
Nothing, however, so tragical lies at the root of this story:
'Tis but a straw I picked up, drifting about in the storm.
During the period of agony, when the political centre
Wandered from Paris to Tours, wandered from Tours to Bordeaux,
I was attached to an embassy which had, with other legations,
Shared in the fortune of war, moving as Government moved.
There at Bordeaux was the capital, and there in a heap were collected
All the official remains saved from the general wreck:
Over-worked public departments, embassies, bodies judicial,
Newspaper offices, banks, great Paris houses of trade;
Also a nondescript crowd of such as in time of invasion
Hang on the footsteps of power, feeding on public disgrace.
Place-hunters, demagogues, spies, soldiers of fortune;
All who had nothing to lose, all who had something to gain.
Somehow 'twas rumoured abroad, the embassy could, as a favour,
Letters to Paris transmit, over the enemy's lines,
Having been granted the privilege, by the high Prussian commanders,
Messengers thither to send bearing what letters it chose.
This was a cruel mistake, for we could no more admittance
Into the city obtain than could the rest of the world.
Letters, however, and messages, all of them destined for Paris,
At our office poured in in a continuous stream:—
Nearly all being accompanied by a most pressing entreaty,
Giving a view of the case, showing how great was the need.
Piteous, indeed, were the narratives, proving what suffering tortured
During that weary siege thousands within and without;
When all the notes to be forwarded treated of matters so urgent,
Friends and relations to save, heartrending fears to appease,
Difficult is it to justify what my attention could rivet
On a particular note, urgent far less than the rest.
Who can dissect all the principles which our feelings determine,
Fancy who can control, sympathy who can direct?
I know no reason to give, except individual humour,
What brings a smile to the one brings to the other a tear.
She who the letter had sent, by name was Elizabeth Burton,
Writing from England, I think much in the following terms:
"Humbly I beg of your lordship not to reject my petition, Merely to forward this note, which I have made very small;

'Tis to my landlord I write, but one little line of entreaty,
Just to take care of my room, saying that I shall return.
Ah! how little I dreamt, when but for three days I left Paris,
So many months would elapse ere I should see it again!
Not until now have I realised what a home Paris was for me;
Nor, till I saw it no more, how I that little room loved.
Carefully locking the door, I carried the key into exile;
There on the table it lies, useless but dear old friend.
Summer was hot when I left, the window remained wide open,
Now it is bitterly cold, snowstorm and rain must drive in.
Ah! how the scene must be desolate, where all was lately so happy!
Dead are the flowers I loved; starved are the birds in the cage.
Would I were back in the capital; fain would I share its privations,—
Sew for the soldiers all day—sit by the wounded all night.
Maybe of all that I left the landlord has taken possession
For the arrears of rent, thinking I shall not return."
As I this letter perused, and noted the writer's entreaties,
Sorry indeed did I feel that she had written in vain.
Much would I gladly have sacrificed but for the means to assist her.
Twice I the letter re-read, then put it by with the rest.
Who was Elizabeth Burton, who to high persons official
Wrote in this tone of romance, and to their feelings appealed?
Clearly the letter showed character, and a poetical nature:
Doubtless the writer was young—new to the ways of the world
Why did she live by herself, in one little room unattended?
All in the letter proclaimed free from all sin was her life.
Was she an artist perhaps, and studying painting or music?
Or a strange runaway girl, living alone and concealed?
Poor the maiden was probably—poor in worldly possession—
But all the richer in mind, if my own instinct told true.
Thus did I let my thoughts carry me, till an ideal Elizabeth
Grew and took shape in my mind, fair as the dawning of day.
Beautiful power of Fancy! Such are the slender materials
Which for a poet suffice, forming the base of his dream.
Still dost thou live in my memory, fair little airy enchantress,—
Such as I wished thee to look—such as I thought thee to be.
Sickened and fagged with my work—surrounded by minds uncongenial
Loathing convention and forms—yearning for leisure and friends—
Oh! in thy plain little room, how often in thought I took refuge,
Taking my place by thy side, tending thy flowers and birds!
Say, wast thou not a reality, when at Bordeaux I beheld thee?
Comfort and friend of those days, say, wast thou only a dream?

II.

Nearly a year had gone by, and Paris had fought and surrendered;
Those that were in had streamed out, those that were out had streamed in.
France was again with her capital, after their long separation,
Proud of its useless defence, eager to soften its wounds.
'Twas but a respite from suffering from the unfortunate city;
Yet had the worst to be felt, yet had the Commune to come.
Light-headed Daughter of Misery, issued of gutter and sewer,
Perfect indeed was thy work, sure thy incendiary torch.

When will the stateliest palaces, lately the models of beauty,
 Now shells empty and black, arise from their ashes again?
 Shattered the trees in the Tuileries, headless the statues of marble,
 Marked by the bullets each house, close as the holes in a sieve.
 Split was the frame of society down to its lowest foundation.
 Sullen and cowed were the poor; not reassured were the rich.
 Lost was the sense of stability, gone men's belief in the future.
 Everything still seemed to lurch, after the earthquake had passed.
 Yet to this dreary wilderness, life was not long in returning.
 Quick was the mind that creates, busy the hand that repairs.
 Scarcely the ever re-echoing deep-voiced cannon was silent,
 Industry took to her looms, Commerce reopened her shops.
 Luxury, treading uneasily in the late home of starvation,
 Silly returned in disguise, where she had openly reigned.
 Pleasure, quite modest at first, shy 'mid the general mourning,
 Now, by unnoticed degrees, sought her habitual haunts.
 Scattered about by the hurricane, men were still seeking each other.
 Friend was still looking for friend, nay, often father for son,
 Doctors were seeking their patients, lawyers were seeking their clients,
 Anxious to know who was ruined, anxious to know who was dead.
 Tradesmen were seeking their customers, teachers were seeking their pupils.
 Difficult task to retie all that the war had cut through.
 Since my return to the capital, where all was still so exciting,
 Seeing new faces each day, meeting again with old friends,
 Seldom indeed did my memory turn to the fair Correspondent
 Whom I had seen in my dreams during my stay at Bordeaux.
 Still, in her youth and simplicity, fair as an opening flower,
 Did she return now and then such as there had appeared;
 And I would catch myself wondering whether I ever should meet her,
 Now that she doubtless was back in her beloved little room.
 As I was sitting one day engaged on official despatches,
 One of the servants came in bringing a name on a card,
 Saying a lady was there who asked to see me on business.
 Brief would she be, had she said; only a minute no more.
 Carelessly taking the card, I read, Miss Elizabeth Burton.
 Written in ink were the words, in the same hand as of yore.
 As she those simple words wrote, little indeed she suspected
 What an effect they would have, how many thoughts they would waken.
 Little she guessed I should hesitate ere I the waiting-room entered,
 Hearing the beat of my heart as I the door-handle turned.
 She was alone in the room, nor heard she my step as I entered.
 But at the window she stood, watching intently the street,
 Where all the opposite houses, by fire and bullets disfigured,
 Still with a terrible truth told of the great city-fight.
 There as she stood unsuspectingly, graceful indeed was her figure;
 Yet, ere I looked on her face, instinct had told me the truth.
 Poor ideal Elizabeth! Youthful and beautiful being!
 Thou that my heart had conceived, thou wast a thing of the past!
 This was the end of the mystery! This was the end of the idyll!
 Angry I felt with myself, angry—God help me!—with her.
 How did she dare to be otherwise than as my fancy had painted?
 Or, at least, why had she come? Why had she broken the charm?
 But as I looked on the dress, all shabby and worn, she was clad in,
 And no that pale and thin face, worthier feelings returned.
 Might she not once have been fair, as fair as my day-dream had seen her,
 Ere she was faded by time, ere she was faded by want?
 And my ideal Elizabeth, were she now standing before me,
 Would she not wither one day, would she not look even thus?
 Softened I hope was my voice, gentle I hope was my manner,
 As I the window approached where the poor visitor stood.
 Simple and short was her narrative: she was a teacher of English,
 And had been teaching for years when the great war-storm burst forth.
 Little she earned by her work—her pupils were all of the humblest;
 Still she had managed to live, till all was wrecked by the siege.
 During the long months of idleness, all her small savings had perished;
 All she had left in her room, the landlord had sold for the rent;
 Sold was her small stock of books, all presents from dear old pupils;
 Sold was her small store of dress, cruelly needed, alas!
 All her old pupils were gone and scattered in different directions;
 Some in the war had been killed, some in the siege had been ruined.
 Vainly for new ones she sought; who cared to take lessons in English?
 No one had leisure to learn, no one had money to spare.

Therefore she offered her services, if I required a copyist,
 Or to do any small work, so as a trifle to earn.
 Poor pale real Elizabeth! frail withered leaf in the tempest!
 As I looked into her face, almost my dream I forgot.
 Something I gave her to do; and secretly vowed to befriend her,
 Half for reality's sake, half for the sake of a myth.

EUGENE LEE-HAMILTON.

REVENGE like Love is blind. But it need not be vile or horrible. Bacon has apologised for it as a kind of wild justice. But in order to merit the apology, the justice should not be executed at the expense of third parties. Precisely this sort of injustice, and that of the direst, most inhuman, was done in the case in which the Sessions Judge of Backerganj sentenced one Gyazuddin for murder of his own child. To revenge himself on his nephew, he killed the child and fathered the crime on him. In confirming the sentence, the Chief Justice remarked that if ever he had a case in which the supreme penalty of the law was demanded, it was the present, unparalleled as it was for cold-blooded premeditation and unnatural brutality.

During the three months, Mr. Westmacott will be both Excise Commissioner and Presidency Commissioner.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

BRITISH protectorate over Nyssaland has been proclaimed.

ACCORDING to Lieutenant-Colonel Fosbery, late of the Bengal Staff Corps, the British magazine rifle, specially that marked No. 2, is a splendid weapon and is sure to prove superior to the Foreign rifle in the next fighting.

AT a performance of "Alfiere" at the Cucus at Turin, Count Maffei, son of the Italian diplomatist, hissed the Russian horsewoman Baroness Rahden. The husband retaliated the hiss by a box on the Count's ear. The Count in reply challenged the Baron to a duel with pistols. Rash man! no bloodshed thereafter could wash away that prompt box on the ear.

THE Upper House in Convocation has passed a resolution for a Committee to suggest steps to repress the growing evil of betting and gambling.

THE origin of the assault on the Czarewitch is variously given. One account is that His Highness was attacked while entering a temple with boots on. A second report attributes it to an unruly behaviour of the prince and his party in a place of amusement when a policeman laid violent hands on him without knowing him. There's a smart Policeman X. He has made himself immortal.

ABNORMAL weather is reported from Great Britain and France. In the former, on Saturday and Sunday last, there were heavy snow and hail storms which severely damaged the fruit crop throughout the country. In France, snow falls and frost have taken place. The severe weather keeps on Influenza in England. There have been many relapses. As a result of its attack, the Prince of Wales is suffering from rheumatism in the legs. Mr. Gladstone is still confined to his room. Lord Edward Cavendish has fallen a victim to the disease.

A CONSIDERABLE event in Hindu society of the West is the remarriage of the widowed daughter of Dr. Ramkrishna Gopal Bhandarkar. We do not know definitely this gentleman's exact position among his people. The Hindu social economy is a difficult subject. There are windings within windings in the maze of Caste which baffle the comprehension of the foreigner. A great Pandit may be a small Brahman. A Maharaja may be a downright Pariah. According to circumstances, the same act is a burst of eccentricity or personal daring or a deed of public significance. Caste is the prime factor in the life of the Hindu community, hence the caste view of a transaction determines its relative importance or insignificance. The ignoring of this necessarily leads to error, and has led to no small mischief. The European ignorance on this head has been the parent of much misconception and consequent disappointment. Wanting this essential knowledge, how many mountains and hills have with serious sympathy been nursed in confinement to assist them in bringing forth their muscular abortions! How many a reform patronized by high officials and able editors has come to naught from misunderstanding the social position of persons and the relative influence of parties! In the absence of castal particulars, we are not in a position to appraise the moral worth of Dr. Bhandarkar's or his son-in-law's act, or the social influence of this widow marriage. But we know enough to be inclined to welcome it as a good and brave deed. Dr. Bhandarkar is known to be an orthodox, though not an irrational, Hindu. He is a Pandit of European reputation—one of the half a dozen or so critical Sanskritists among our people. Although he has been to Europe, on the national mission of representing Hindu learning at one of the meetings of the Oriental Congress, he went abroad not as a denationalised Indian, but a true Brahman Pandit. His fellow Congressmen must have been truly astonished at the abstemious yet portly apparition he presented among them, while their love of meat and drink must have reminded him of the Vedic Rishis of his own Arya Land. In short, he conforms to the rules of his caste and is a full member of Hindu society. Any deliberate departure from the Hindu practice of the day by such a man, himself a Brahman theologian of eminence, cannot go for naught. It must sink in the mind and heart of the unsophisticated and the candid parts of the Hindu community.

THE Ceylon Pearl Fishery, which closed on the 24th ultimo, has been an unprecedented success. It has brought to the Treasury a nice windfall. The Government receipts amount to over Rs. 9,60,000 or 140 per cent. of the original estimate. This is said to be the largest revenue derived in any single year from this source by any Government during the present century. Mr. Twynam, Captain Donnan and Dr. Attygalle and other officers, who by their zealous and efficient management no doubt contributed to the result, will most probably come in for special rewards. One indirect effect of their success will be, it is calculated, the pushing on of the Jaffna Railway scheme. The surveying ought to commence at once.

By an order dated the 15th May, 1891, published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 20th following, the Lieutenant-Governor has approved the election by the Commissioners of the Dacca Municipality of Khajeh Mahomed Azghar as their Chairman. On the 5th May preceding, the Commissioners held a meeting, at which, among other things, they confirmed their proceedings of the 3rd and 16th March and 27th April, 1891. The proceedings of the 5th May are subscribed by the Khajeh Saheb as Chairman. Was he the Chairman on that day, or could he sign himself as such before the publication of the Gazette of the 20th May? We shall not be surprised to find some bold spirits in Dacca contesting in a court of law the legality of the action of the Dacca Municipality done under orders of those dates.

A scandal connected with a late Mahomedan burial at Garden Reach is widely talked about. One of the sons of the late ex-King of Oudh died on the 13th instant at about noon. Under the rules laid down by the Government Solicitor for management of the property of the deceased Padshaw, it was incumbent on the relatives of the deceased to go all the way to the office of Mr. Upton, the Solicitor in Calcutta, to obtain his sanction for burial of the corpse in the graveyard attached to the Imambarrah of the ex-King situated at Muttiabooij. After considerable delay, Monmoth Nath Mookerjee, an employé under Mr. Upton, arrived at Garden Reach at a late hour in the evening, and ordered the officers in charge of the burial ground to allow the interment. Gravediggers were accordingly engaged and other arrangements made for the performance of the last rites to the deceased. While the mourners were thus proceeding with their sad duty, a new and unexpected difficulty arose. The Baboo conceived an idea and expressed himself to them, who not giving in, the Baboo stopped work and went away. Next morning a representation was made to Mr. Upton's office at Calcutta and the order was that the corpse could not be permitted to be buried until it was encased in a wooden coffin. This being against the Mahomedan religion, the relatives of the deceased applied to Mr. Baker, the Magistrate of the 24-Pergunnahs, stating that the corpse was putrefying and how the troubles had come upon them. Mr. Baker understood the situation and deputed Moulvie Abdool Jubbar, the Deputy Magistrate in charge of the Suburban Police Court, with instructions to see that the burial was duly made. The Moulvie promptly proceeded to Garden Reach, and gave orders for the burial without the coffin; it was concluded at 11 P.M., when decomposition had already set in.

The Baboo in the play is a son of Keder Nath Mookerjee, who was the chief clerk under Colonel Pudeaux and who has been long under suspension owing to an insufficiency of 10 or 12 thousand Rupees in his accounts to Government.

In this connection we would suggest enquiry into the following points:

Whether it is true or not, that Monmoth Nath illegally interfered with the burial of the dead?

Whether Mr. Upton's office refused to sanction the burial unless the corpse was placed inside a coffin? And if so, under what law or authority such a stringent condition was imposed, when it is wellknown that Mahomedans are not in the habit of using wooden coffins or any other kind of boxes for burial purposes, and when it was evident that such a delay in burial in the month of May was sure to bring on decomposition of the dead to the injury of the living?

What was the necessity for obtaining sanction for the interment of the remains of a Prince in a graveyard built at the expense of his own father?

What is the cause of this Imambarrah and burial ground being placed in charge of Mr. Upton, when the Magistrate of the 24-Pergunnahs is quite competent to look after those religious institutions, and is much nearer to the spot than the Government Solicitor?

There can be no rational objection to a Hindoo being told off to control the Imambarrah and the burial ground, provided he is of the true stuff. But surely no such person should be permitted to sleep inside the sacred building, much to the disgust and indignation of the Mahomedan community.

THE Anglo-Indian press is full of comments from different contributors on the late riot. Some are simply content with drawing the obvious moral that the Police should be armed with cutting weapons and specially fire-arms—for special occasions at least.

The most notable suggestion and most popular is the hydropathic treatment of popular tumults. Writer after writer recommends the utilization of the fire-engine as an instrument of war. The idea is that the Mussulmans are all badmashes—scoundrels. Who but the worst characters would think of making such a fuss over a two-penny half-penny mosque, and, above all, resisting the formidable Calcutta Police in making it? And badmashes require bad washes for their treatment. Such is the doctrine of cure. And the recipe is—A good stream of unfiltered water turned on the men from the hose of the fire-engine. One amateur doctor categorically sums up the effects of the treatment, which he expects to “be useful as a means at any future fracas (1) of cooling the rioters' ardour, (2) keeping the dust down; and (3) seriously injuring no one.” In his prolixion yet other considerations in favour of his cure for bad mushy are recommended. Nothing, indeed, like the steady douche—in the system of the Water Cure establishment.

SAYS “Fire Engine” in the Indian Daily News :—

“In my humble opinion if the Commissioner had taken the last new fire engine with hose cart, and turned a good stream of ‘unfiltered’ on those badmashes, it would have had the double effect of dispersing them and considerably ameliorating their sanitary condition! There is nothing like ‘cold water’ for these sorts of disturbances. I trust my suggestion may be useful as a means at any future fracas of (1) cooling the rioters' ardour; (2) keeping the dust down; and (3) seriously injuring no one.”

Such is the estimate of Fire Engine of itself. And it is characteristic. Although the doctrines of the two are different, Hydropathy and Homœopathy are allied systems. The one eschews all drugs, unless water be held one—the other using infinitesimal doses may be taken to do without drugs practically. The popular recommendation of each is that it is safe. Curiously, this administrative water cure is recommended on the same ground. The sneer at the sanitary condition of the people is gratuitous and comes with special bad grace from those who learnt the use of water from the East.

ANOTHER correspondent of the Indian Daily News who signs himself “A Volunteer of 1857 in Allahabad,”

“would suggest to our worthy Commissioner, Mr. Lambert, that he order up the ‘fire engine’ on the ground in which the mosque has been built, with the hose laid on in some tank or pipes, on a crowd collecting. A good wetting from the hoses would disconcert this rabble, and then the constable could rush at them, expediting their retreat.”

These heroes of 1857 are evidently in their anecdotalage. Whatever this Volunteer may have done or seen in the days of the Great Mutiny, he forgets the lesson of a few weeks back at Benares. Are these good people tired of their fire-engines? To bring the fire engine into the field and employ it against the people as a means of molestation, is the surest way to draw the popular ire on it. The fire-engine would not be spared any more than the water-engine was respected at the Holy City.

That such suggestions should be seriously offered as methods of practical administration! The prospect is not cheering. The way lies towards the darkest barbarism. From unfiltered to foul is but a step. In due course, we shall have some Anglo-Indian expert proposing the revival of Jaffer Khan's Baikunt.

Political hydropathy is the same, whether it deals in foul water or filtered, or for that matter rose-water. It can never be a substitute for statesmanship.

A GERMAN has come forward with a characteristic nostrum. He regards the fracas as a revolt, pure and simple, and is sorely vexed at its success. This gentleman had been on an excursion and on his return he finds that there had been war—to the defeat of the Europeans.

“I was really surprised to find that to all appearance the Mahomedans had by their revolt obtained what they wanted. Now this is very strange, indeed, for such a weakness shown by the British authorities simply amounts to the same as if they were to say, 'If any of you want to obtain anything which we do not feel inclined to grant, all you have to do is to revolt, and we being thus intimidated shall silently let you have your way.' I for my part should therefore deem it an imperative measure to have that mosque levelled to the ground immediately, as otherwise this affray might be followed by others similar, only more serious perhaps.

The simplest way would have been to have the mosque broken down last Saturday at the end of the affray, under the protection of the British bayonets, and it certainly would have been more effective, as it would have taught that Mahomedan mob that they cannot offer any resistance to the police or other authorities, without being punished for it on the spot."

"The simplest way," no doubt, if it could be done, but the question is—could it be done? It could not be tried! Under the present law, it could not even be thought of. The whole constitution of the land must be altered, or the metropolis must be placed under martial law, before this Teuton's idea could be carried out. Thank God, we live in a free empire and are protected by a just and equal Fundamental Law. That is more than the German could say at home. The foregoing quotation itself is proof. No citizen of a constitutional country would talk in that strain. It is only men used to dragging by a multitude of miserable princes that could think so.

Simple "A German's" policy is to be sure, but only in the sense in which murder or incendiarism is simple. Easy it is not, decidedly. We are not sure that even under the mighty protection of British bayonets, the mosque could be demolished. Perhaps "A German" and his fellow politicians are not aware of the strength of the British bayonets which protect us. Nor do they remember that the whole of it could not be sent out on this worthless expedition. That strength is sufficient for our protection under a wise good Government, but it is utterly inadequate to support a régime of religious persecution.

ANOTHER fire-eater in the same issue of Tuesday, under the threatening nom de guerre of "1857," discharges a volley of indignation. And why? Because, forsooth, because the Mahomedans were to hold a meeting "for the purpose of arranging for the purchase of the so-called mosque at Ooltadanga where the fracas occurred!" One would have thought that the idea was a fine one and just the thing and that the Mahomedans merited the highest commendation for having recourse to such a peaceful solution. But no. Here we have this writer crying:—

"Should such an arrangement be permitted? the matter has ceased to be one of a private character, and has taken a turn which involves grave issues. Are the decrees of our courts to be successfully set at defiance in the capital of our Indian empire?"

And why not? What harm if the parties come to an amicable settlement? As to the scandal of the decree of a poor Munsiff or Sub-Judge being successfully set at defiance, is it a phenomenon of so much enormity? On the contrary, is it not a common incident of life, specially in the country? And does not the Government itself frequently override the decrees of its own courts? The same writer continues:—

"The dispute about this wretched mosque has gone beyond the boundaries of any private arrangement to be come to between the parties, and though such an arrangement may be the means of settling the dispute for the present, the principles involved are wide reaching, and the precedent set too evil in its tendencies to be left to private arrangements."

That is the cry for law of the lawless. The respect for law is simply assumed for the nonce in order to bring on a scene of bloodshed and disorder.

AFTER an experimental trial for nearly a year, Mr. Harrington's Incinerator has been condemned. This condemnation has come not from the victims of Mr. Harrington's huge blunder in sanitary engineering. The people for some distance around the Incinerator have been crying hoarse against the intolerable nuisance created by it, and yet the Corporation of Calcutta, deaf to this cry, has allowed Mr. Harrington to go on with his experiment, in order that he may gain experience at the expense of the money and the comfort and health of the rate-payers. The condemnation has come from the Corporation's own responsible officers, from its Engineer and Health Officer. We have, in the present issue, space only for Mr. Kimber's opinion dated 19th March last:—

"I beg to submit my opinion at the request of the Commissioners that Mr. Harrington has not been successful with his incinerator in carrying out the agreement in two respects, viz:—

1st.—Article 2 of the agreement says—"The eight furnaces to be erected by the said contractor shall be capable of consuming 2,880 cubic feet of refuse during any 24 hours." Now the experimental working has shewn that in the rainy season, as given in my note, dated 18th November 1890, no more than 2,520 cubic feet can be expected during any 24 hours. Even this supposes all the eight furnaces to be at work, and there is no provision for stand-by in case of a break-down of any of the furnaces. The difference in these figures amounts to 12½ per cent. of the stipulated quantity.

2nd.—Article 5 of the agreement says that 'that furnaces shall be absolutely proof against the escape of noxious fumes.' Several complaints have been made by people in the neighbourhood of the incinerator of noxious fumes since the date of the latest alteration made by Mr. Harrington with the view of preventing them, and I myself have experienced such fumes on several occasions. I am of opinion that the alterations have made little or no improvement in abating the noxious fumes.

I am of opinion that to the foregoing instances of failure should be added the fact that Mr. Harrington has not burnt, nor made any provision for burning, the carcasses of animals, the disposal of which form so noxious a feature in the arrangements at the Salt Water Lakes, nor infected mattresses and such like articles, all of which I presume come under the denomination of 'refuse' in article 2 of the agreement.

The prevention of noxious fumes and destruction of carcasses and infected articles require the most intense combustion—a feature which is entirely absent from Mr. Harrington's incinerator."

FOR once the native has had a good word in an unexpected part of the press. He has got the advantage of company. The European's well-being and well-doing being matters of course, we are told the native too has behaved well—as Policemen in the late riot. So much the merrier for Khalifa Lambert! But was it such an all-round triumph? Far from it! The British legal superstition does not allow discussion of matters sub judice, but we hope Government will make the fullest inquiry into this riot.

We publish elsewhere the full text of the judgment in the mosque case which is the origin of the riot. It is a typical example of British judicature, but a most unfortunate judgment. We wonder whether the Sub-Judge has any religion of his own. The man decrees the demolition of a mosque as if he is directing the removal of a nuisance. Not one word of regret—not one expression of sympathy—escapes this veritable avatar of justice!

THE BRITISH JUGGLE IN MANIPUR.

THE SACRIFICE OF THE JUGGLER.

THE Manipur official papers intensify instead of abating the dissatisfaction already rankling in the public mind at the disastrous issue of events in that country. A deplorable catastrophe has taken place, but it would have been some consolation in our grief if it could be shown that it was an accident. Disasters will sometimes happen in spite of the best we could do. Would to God the present one were of this kind. Unfortunately, it is otherwise. The despatches published disclose a lamentable want of firmness and perhaps of adequate knowledge in the Foreign Department and an equally lamentable want of capacity and wisdom in the officers who had the immediate management of a delicate business. In fact, there is now no denying that a sad bungle has been made—a bungle all the sadder from being unrelieved by any single brilliant achievement by our political or military staff. Not only is it a bungle all through, unredeemed by brighter incidents, but one darkened still more by baseness.

Somehow or other there is a perceptible decadence not merely of political talent but of political virtue in these days. It was not discreet to entrust Mr. Quinton with a business requiring qualities of a different order to what, for aught one knows, he had ever given proof of. He might be the Ruler of Assam to which Manipur is subordinate. This, however, need not have been an insuperable objection to the deputation of a special officer of well proved political and military experience. We do not know that the late Chief Commissioner of Assam had evinced any aptitude for the intricate problems of the eastern frontiers. As it is, his appointment as head of the Manipur Mission has proved his absolute incapacity for a task lying outside the usual groove of a Civilian, and, in particular a purely Civil, administrator. From the first he appears to have underestimated the difficulties of the situation he was called upon to make and master. He failed to realise the character of the foe he had to do with, as well as the natural advantages of that foe in his own country and his own city and citadel from his position not merely as the head of the army but the real head of the State in everything else. So overweening was Mr. Quinton's confidence of success that in one of his telegrams he actually gives the date on which he expected to return from Manipur accompanied by his anticipated captive. The annals of Indian administration do not present such another case of counting your chickens before they are hatched. What incredible want of foresight is displayed in this confident miscalculation! The moving spirit of the late revolution in the State—the brave and turbulent “Koireng” was to submit to the order of deportation like a tame lamb, and, if not, to be arrested in the Durbar easily. Highly preposterous as both these assumptions must appear to anybody, what shall we say of Mr. Quinton's persisting in them in spite of the strong dissuasion of the Political Agent on the spot! Mr. Grimwood was not only against the plan of capture but his sympathies were actively engaged in behalf of the offender. From the moment the plan of operations was revealed to him, he was utterly unmanned. Both Mr. Grimwood and Mrs. Grimwood appear to have become nervous and thoroughly disconsolate at the prospect of injury to their friend and protégé. What help Mr. Quinton could expect from such a quarter can easily be imagined. For the rest, the military adviser of the Chief Commissioner also was not without his own misgivings. Judging from some earlier telegrams, Colonel Skene does not appear to have quite approved of the plan in all its details. In fact, the Civil, the Political, and the Military trio seem to have been a house divided within itself.

The plan of capture by inveiglement into the so-called Durbar naturally proved an abortion. Then followed the attack on the palace. This probably would have had the desired result if, instead of following, it had preceded the fruitless negotiations. It is inconceivable why an earlier opportunity of carrying out the main object of the expedition was not seized when the Senapati went out of Manipur to see the Chief Commissioner. He was, it is true, accompanied by two regiments, but this should have been provided against. And pluck and daring would have done the rest. By way of example of official reporting, we see that nowhere is the strength of the two regiments given. Presumably Mr. Quinton did not dare, or it may be, he postponed action from red tape punctiliousness to abide by the plan laid down of capturing in the Durbar to the letter. That plan is now condemned on all hands. It was strange as well as impracticable. Such scruples against the least departure from the plan of his own devising, supposing they determined Mr. Quinton not to anticipate the capture, must be absurd in the extreme. In any case, it would have been more honorable if the earlier opportunity were taken. Delay in such a case was peculiarly hazardous, as unluckily it proved in reality. Nor was this the only opportunity thrown away. There was another equally good opportunity offered by the Senapati coming up to the Residency gate apparently to the Durbar according to Mrs. Grimwood's account which is practically not contradicted on this point. This opportunity was also thrown away, and the reasons offered for not utilising it are almost ludicrous, if anything can be ludicrous in connection with a wholly heart-rending business. A document which was to be read at the ceremony had not been translated. The victim was at the shambles, but the priest was not ready with the sacrificial ritual. A more extraordinary plea for delay in circumstances in which time was an element of the utmost importance, can hardly be conceived. And it is only one of several indications of the lightness of heart, or, at any rate, the under-estimation of the enterprise with which the Civilian head of the expedition came to his task. In the first place, Mr. Quinton appears to have been wholly unconscious of the inherent danger of carrying out a most impracticable decision like the compromise into which his own persistence had wheedled the Government of India—namely, the decision to support the puppet without the puppet-man—to acknowledge the Jubraj who was nothing and deport the Senapati who was everything. In the next place, he was so possessed with the notion of being able to accomplish his mission with ease as to disregard the wise advice given by the Foreign Office of being accompanied by a sufficiently strong force, even if no great resistance were expected. Altogether, he seemed to be coming on a big royal sporting expedition without the least inkling of the danger of attacking an independent Prince in his own territory, or suspicion of failure from any possible accident, or the miscarriage of any of his calculations. We are deeply grieved to have to speak so plainly of a man beyond the reach of criticism whose mournful fate strongly appeals to our sympathy. But the actions of public men must be appraised at their true value in the interests of the general weal. The Manipur despatches are no vindication of Mr. Quinton. On the contrary, they establish his political incapacity beyond dispute. In regard to these details of Mr. Quinton's conduct, the Government of India must be absolved of blame. They gave him absolute discretion as to minor points of execution, and in these he blundered most miserably.

And yet the Government of India must incur no small share of the responsibility for the disaster, for their at last giving in to the influence of the local officials in regard to the main question at issue. It is the Supreme Government that must lay down the policy. And practically that is precisely what it did not. The question for decision was as to the character of the Manipur revolution of September. From the first and nearly all through, the Government correctly adhered to the view that the revolution was an act of defiance of the Paramount Power and that its authors should be punished, the deposed Maharaja being reinstated in the gaddi. The view of the Government was as just as it was prudent. The antecedents of the chief leader of the revolution were already viewed with the highest displeasure, and after this signal act of revolt, there was no room left for a lenient treatment of the man. But all in vain.

THE MANIPUR MUDDLE :

ITS CHIEF ADMINISTRATIVE LESSON.

THE Manipur disaster will not have been in vain if it serves to open the eyes of the Government of India to the viciousness of our Feudatory system. The publication of the Manipur correspondence makes one thing perfectly clear, viz., that in our relations to Feudatory Princes, the Political Agent is all in all, and the Foreign Office entirely at his mercy. In the case of Manipur, the omnipotence of Mr. Grimwood stands out in terrible relief. He makes an awkward situation, and yet he has his own way in everything, swaying the Local Administration and ultimately, if after long struggle, the Government of India, to his own counsels. He makes an easy conquest of the Chief Commissioner, and, through him, prevails over the Supreme Government, which, after offering long resistance, finally give in. The Government of India evidently suspected Mr. Grimwood as in some way or other mixed up with the business. He was, later on, found guilty of omitting to carry out Mr. Quinton's orders to mediate or, failing that, to send for troops from Kohima. This was a serious omission capable of only one interpretation. The Government of India clearly hold him responsible for committing himself to the Maharaja's flight and thereby admitting the success of the revolt. The Government, after going so far in the right direction, yield all the same to the sinister local influence which, here as elsewhere, has generally been more than a match for the Foreign Office. This is the blot and the grave danger in our Political system. The misery to our allied and tributary Princes, resulting from the practical irresponsibility of Political officers, is a pathetic chapter of a yet for the most part unwritten history. Copious are the tears in secret shed by these Princes and their Ministers, cut off from all chance of a hearing, at the hopelessness of their lot in the hands of these all-powerful Representatives of the British Power at their Courts. Probably their tears so long shed have at last moved a Higher Power. A terrible punishment has at last been visited upon the unbridled license of the Political Department. The Manipur tragedy is clearly a lesson taught by the Nemesis of a wicked system—one which hands over bound hand and foot our feudatories to the tender mercies of unsympathetic, and not unoften tyrannical aliens. If the consequences of this vicious system which have shown themselves in such an emphatic manner in the late events at Manipur led to its overhauling, there could still be some considerable gain out of a most disastrous occurrence.

The publication of the correspondence, if it clears up some points, also mystifies others. The question of the late Maharaja's abdication, for instance, is placed in great uncertainty. Maharaja Sura Chandra Sing explicitly and vehemently denies it, and he makes some statements and, above all, some innuendoes about Mr. Grimwood which suggest great suspicions about the character and conduct of that officer. Probably there was a talk of an abdication, but it was far from being as formal as such a ceremony should be. It is certain that the word does not occur in the letter which the ex-Maharaja, while in a state of great mental disturbance, addressed to the Senapati. He refers to proposal to make a pilgrimage to Brindaban and intended abandonment of hostilities with an enemy of acknowledged superiority. Admitting, against the categorical denial of the Maharaja, the truth of Mr. Grimwood's allegations, the renunciation still appears to have been a forced one and therefore of no validity. Mr. Grimwood's leanings for the Senapati are nowhere denied. Even the Government of India, evidently from the first, held him in suspicion. If he had not anything to do with the revolution itself, he might still have prevented its developments. At any rate, he did not raise even his smallest finger to help the Maharaja. On the contrary, he did everything he could to support or appear to support the other party with which his sympathies are well known. This appearance of his being in sympathy with the authors of the revolt would naturally weigh down the spirits of any Prince of whatever calibre in Sura Chandra's situation. The story, of his weakness of which so much capital is made, is irrelevant to the immediate question at issue. That question was, Were the authors of the revolution guilty of revolt or not guilty? Weakness in Native Chiefs would be a dangerous doctrine for justifying deposition or forced abdication. The Government certainly never think of applying such a revolutionary doctrine in our relations to Feudatory Chiefs at large. The theory of the Chief's weakness, and the consequent necessity of frequent armed intervention by the British in his favor being set aside, the fact remains—and even Mr. Grimwood cannot gainsay it—that there were great demonstrations of popular goodfeeling towards the Maharaja on the eve of his departure. The Maharaja himself is confident of being able to stand by himself, the turbulent Koirang only being out of the way. From the marked proof the people gave of their affection to him, this would seem to be no exaggerated statement of self-confidence. For the rest, there has not before this been any question of doing away with the ruling Maharaja on the score of weakness, while he has in other respects deserved well of the British Government by his services in critical times. Koirang on the other hand has been always in the bad books of the authorities, and his late revolt ought to have irretrievably marked him out for suitable punishment for the good of the State. The Government of India, it is true, have consistently held fast to this just view. But, in an unwary moment and under constant pressure from Mr. Quinton, they agreed to an absurd compromise. They threw overboard the ex-Maharaja and assented to the accession of the Jubraj, on condition of the Senapati being punished. This was an impracticable show. The puppet could not stand without the programme man. Neither the Government of India nor Mr. Quinton saw this. Mr. Grimwood evidently accepted the compromise in the hope of some chance turning up to avert the punishment of the Senapati. Both he and Mr. Quinton were for minimising the punishment and making it only temporary. They waxed eloquent in his praise, and Mr. Quinton even suggested the idea of appointing him heir-apparent after the ends of justice were satisfied by a moderate punishment. The Government, however, remained firm as to the punishment of the Senapati, which must be nothing short of deportation. This divergence of views between the Supreme and the Local Government was the chief cause of the disaster. If the earlier plan of the Government of reinstating the Maharaja had been adopted in entirety, without any quarter to any of his enemies, probably there would have been no catastrophe. Nor would there have been any, if, on the other hand, the Maharaja being altogether left out from the plan, success of the revolt were fully admitted and both the Jubraj and the Senapati left undisturbed to share its fruits. This indeed would have been very unjust and no less impolitic, still it would have quieted down matters. It was the half and half measure which led to the terrible catastrophe.

RECOGNITION OF INDIGENOUS LEARNING :

The Title of Shamsul Ulama.

We have heard a rumour, which for the credit of Government we earnestly hope to be unfounded. The rumour is that two unaccountable Mahomedan gentlemen have been recommended for the title of Shamsul Ulama at the next Birthday of her Imperial Majesty. One of them, we are told, is a petty litigious landholder of Bengal, with no pretensions whatever to Arabic scholarship, and the other, one who, for aught anybody knows to the contrary, may have studied Arabic, but who has by no means attained "eminent distinction in learning among the loyal Mahomedan subjects of her most gracious Majesty," or "rendered eminent services in the promotion of Oriental (Arabic) learning."

It is a well known fact that in earlier times the British régime was hardly in touch with the indigenous humanity—the literature and scholarship of the land. To the eminent Hindoo and Mahomedan scholars, who did not court or expect royal favors but who, nevertheless, by their vast learning and success in Sanscrit and Arabic literature or their remarkable teaching, exercised unlimited influence among their respective communities, the great enlightened and liberal British Government had nothing to say. A flaw so fundamental could scarcely escape the mature statesmanship of the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava, and he took the very first opportunity of remedying it, by creating the Titles of Mahamahopadhyaya and Shamsul Ulama, on the occasion of the celebration of the Jubilee of the Reign of her most gracious Majesty in February 1887, for the purpose of recognizing the merits of the most learned among the Hindoo and Mahomedan subjects in India, and thereby allowing them to take part in the rejoicings of that joyous and auspicious day.

This was indeed a most wise measure, and reflected great credit upon the political sagacity of Lord Dufferin.

The proclamation that was promulgated on the occasion runs as follows :

"His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General having taken into his consideration that adequate means do not exist whereby he can recognize eminent distinction in learning among the loyal Hindoo and Mahomedan subjects of her most gracious Majesty the Queen Empress of India, and being desirous to commemorate the event of the Jubilee of her Majesty's Accession to the Throne, has resolved to institute a new Title for eminent services rendered by Hindoos and Mahomedans in the promotion of Oriental learning.

2. His Excellency the Viceroy and Governor General directs that in the case of Hindoos the Title shall be Mahamahopadhyaya; and in the case of Mahomedans Shamsul Ulama."

The above distinctly points out the nature of the qualifications required for the high and honorable Titles devised for rewarding the most learned and eminent members of the two nationalities.

The first appointments to the above Titles were made on the 16 February 1887, with much discrimination; they were all, with two or at most three exceptions, most unexceptionable.

The measure was perfectly successful in attaining its object, as the gentlemen of both the Hindoo and Mahomedan communities felt fully satisfied that the eminent merits of those whom they highly revered were honored by Government.

But since then the appointments made to these two orders from time to time on the recurrence of Her Majesty's Birthday and the New Year's day, have been open to much comment and been the occasion of much dissatisfaction, among both communities, but chiefly among the Mahomedans.

It is a great pity that such a grand idea for bringing the learned Indians into sympathy with Government, has been frustrated by a want of care and discrimination in the selection of the later recipients of the honor. It is a matter of notoriety among the Mahomedans, that men of real learning and erudition have been neglected or ignored, whilst political adventurers and title-hunters, with no pretensions to Arabic learning, have, simply through the interest of their patrons among the high European officials, managed to smuggle themselves into this learned Order. These have not only become the laughing stock of their own community, but given great umbrage to those eminent men who were honored with the Title on the first occasion, and who consider it a great degradation to be bracketed with men not only far beneath them in learning, but even unfit to be classed among their pupils.

For this state of affairs, the Local Governments are chiefly to blame, as it was their bounden duty, before accepting the recommendations and sending up the names of unworthy candidates, to have made thorough enquiries into the right of their nominees to be vested with a title set apart only for men of the greatest learning. We have heard instances of District officers being taken by surprise on finding residents of their Districts figuring in the Gazette, whose names they had never heard as men of superior learning and eminence, and about whose qualifications they had not been consulted. We have a sanguine hope that in future His Excellency the Viceroy will avail himself of the services of the present Home Secretary, Mr. C. J. Lyall, who is a brilliant Arabic scholar, to personally enquire into and ascertain the merits of each nominee of the Local Governments, before conferring this academical distinction upon him.
